

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. SHERIFF COURT HOUSES (SCOTLAND) AMENDMENT BILL.—(No. 193.)

(The Earl of Dalhousie.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

THE EARL OF DALHOUSIE, in moving the second reading of the Bill, explained that certain changes were proposed by it in the interests of the Treasury, and certain others in favour of the local authorities, but that, on the whole, the Bill was favourable to the latter.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."
—(The Earl of Dalhousie.)

LORD ABINGER, in moving that the Bill be read a second time that day six months, said, there was a very strong feeling against the Bill amongst the landed proprietors of Scotland, who were the Commissioners of Supply of the counties. Under the Act in force, passed in 1860, the Government paid one-half and the counties one-half of the expenses of the Court Houses. The county of Inverness had expended a large sum of money under the Act of 1860, and he saw no reason why the Treasury should not pay one-half of that sum. That was the arrangement—i.e., the Government to pay one-half, and the other half to be provided by the Commissioners of Supply. He could not see on what principle of justice the Government now attempted to throw over the counties of Scotland, when an Act so recently as 1860 was passed for the purposes which he had mentioned. Unless the Government consented to strike out the clauses containing these provisions, he considered the Bill so objectionable that he should press his Motion for its rejection.

Amendment moved, to leave out ("now") and add at the end of the Motion ("this day six months.")—(The Lord Abinger.)

LORD ORANMORE AND BROWNE said, he concurred in the remarks of the noble Lord, and might add that many Court Houses had been built on the faith of the Government guarantee, and it would be very unfair now to withdraw it.

LORD ABINGER said, he understood the Bill, being a Money Bill, could not be altered in Committee; and, therefore, he felt obliged to go on with the Division.

On Question, That ("now") stand part of the Motion? Their Lordships divided:—Contents 24; Not-Contents 26: Majority 2.

Moved, "That the Bill be read 2^d this day six months."—(The Lord Abinger.)

EARL GRANVILLE said, with reference to the result of the Division, that he did not remember any purely Money Bill having been rejected by that House on the second reading, without any Notice whatever having been given.

THE EARL OF HARDWICKE said, he was in no way responsible for the result, as he did not vote; but if the Bill was one of great importance, why did not the noble and learned Earl on the Woolsack, or another Member of the Government give some explanation to the House; but no noble Lord got up to make any protest against the Amendment. Even if it were a small matter, the Government might have offered some explanation to the House.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, no doubt it was a small matter; but still it was most unusual to oppose, without any Notice, the second reading of a Money Bill. The opposition not being expected, no explanation was given further than by his noble Friend who represented the Department of the Government. It was not a comfortable thing that such a Motion could be carried without Notice, and the inconvenience of such an occurrence would be excessive.

LORD ELLENBOROUGH asked how they could have amended the Bill, as it was a Money Bill?

LORD ABINGER said, there was a strong feeling in Scotland against the Bill, and the Bill had only been set down on the Paper for that day.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL said, that was purely and absolutely a Money Bill, and no doubt it would be against Parliamentary usage to amend it in Committee; but Notice should have been given if it were wished to reject it on the second reading. He would mention this—that Money Bills were always closely discussed between the Lord Advocate and the Scotch Members; and as regarded this Bill, so far as he had observed, there had been no opposition to it in the other House. If there had been, he should have made himself acquainted with all the details of the measure. He thought it was objectionable to move the rejection of a Money Bill without any Notice.

THE MARQUESS OF LOTHIAN said, that what had occurred was another proof of the necessity for having a Secretary for Scotland. The noble Earl (the Earl of Kimberley) had complained of the inconvenience of rejecting the Bill; but he would refer the noble Earl to the inconvenience occasioned by the failure on the part of any Member of the Government to get up and answer the statements of his noble Friend. As the Bill could not be amended in Committee, noble Lords took advantage of this opportunity to record their votes in support of his noble Friend, whose statements had not been answered.

EARL GRANVILLE said, that, as this was a small Bill, there was not the slightest idea that it was to be opposed. It had been done suddenly, and entirely without Notice. The provisions of the Bill were explained by his noble Friend, who had charge of the Bills in that Department of the Government. It was against all precedent to throw out a Money Bill without Notice.

LORD ORANMORE AND BROWNE remarked that a great many of these Bills came on suddenly, and at the end of the Session, without anyone knowing when they were to be discussed.

THE EARL OF DALHOUSIE said, that this Bill had been down for second reading for some days, and everyone had had an opportunity of studying it.

LORD ABINGER said, he considered that the Bill had been brought in in a very improper way as far as the landed proprietors, who were Commissioners of Supply in Scotland, and who were interested in it, were concerned. It was introduced after the April meeting of the Commissioners of Supply; it was practically brought in surreptitiously. When it passed through the House of Commons, he received the strongest representations from his own county, Inverness-shire, regarding its provisions. He considered it was a very objectionable Bill, and its rejection would give great satisfaction to the Commissioners of Supply in Scotland.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, that the noble Lord appeared, from his own observations, to have meditated opposition to the Bill for some time. In that case he ought to have given Notice that he intended to move its rejection. But the noble Lord had neither given Notice of his Motion nor asked for a further postponement of the second reading. If the Motion that the Bill be read a second time that day six months were rejected, the only result would be that the Bill would be put down for second reading on another day.

On Question? Their Lordships divided:—Contents 29; Not-Contents 32: Majority 3.

Bill to be read 2^a on Thursday next.

OYSTER CULTIVATION (IRELAND)

BILL.—(No. 197.)

(The Lord President.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

LORD CARLINGFORD (LORD PRESIDENT of the COUNCIL), in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, that the measure was intended for the further promotion of the cultivation of oysters in Ireland. It was founded on the English Act of 1868, and would enable the Irish Commissioners of Fisheries to do what the Board of Trade could do in this country. He believed it would prove a useful measure.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."
—(The Lord President.)

THE MARQUESS OF WATERFORD said, he had much pleasure in supporting the second reading of the Bill, which he thought a very useful measure. But there was one proposal which he should like to make, and which he hoped that his noble Friend would accept in Committee. He did not know whether the noble Lord was aware that in the cultivation of oysters American and Portuguese varieties were laid down on the coast of Ireland. Now, there was a law in Ireland which made the sale of oysters illegal in the months of May, June, July, and August; but he believed that those oysters were totally different from the English oyster, and were not only fit to eat, but were at their best during those months, and were sold largely in London. He, therefore, desired to see a clause inserted in the Bill to enable Portuguese and American oysters to be sold in Ireland during that period. They could be easily distinguished, and there would be no difficulty in a Fishery Inspector giving an order for the sale of those particular oysters. If that were done it would encourage the growth of those beds of oysters which seemed to have taken to the shores of Ireland, and additional employment would thus be given to the people.

THE EARL OF COWTOWN said, he thought there might be some danger in carrying out the proposal of the noble Marquess. He hoped that nothing would be done which would in any way interfere with the preservation of the native oyster beds.

THE MARQUESS OF WATERFORD pointed out that the kind of oysters to which he had alluded were now allowed to be sold in London.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Thursday next.

PRIVATE BILLS (RAILWAYS) — NEW STANDING ORDER.—RESOLUTION.

LORD HENNIKER, in rising to move to resolve—

"That where a Chamber of Commerce or Agriculture, or other similar body sufficiently representing a particular trade or business, in any district to which any Railway Bill relates, petition against the Bill, alleging that such trade or business will be injuriously affected by the rates and fares proposed to be authorized by the Bill, or is injuriously affected by the rates and fares already authorized by Acts relating to the railway undertaking, it shall be competent for the Select Committee to whom the Bill is referred, if they think fit, to hear the petitioners or their counsel or agents and witnesses on such allegation against the Bill, or any part thereof, or against the rates and fares authorized by the said Acts or any of them ;"

and to move that the said Resolution be made a Standing Order of the House, said, that last year he brought forward a Motion which referred indirectly to that he now placed before the House. He need not trouble their Lordships with very lengthened remarks, as the subject had been fully discussed "elsewhere." The history of the case was, shortly, that last year a Resolution was carried in the House of Commons without objection. This year a Resolution, nearly the same as the one now submitted, was discussed in that House on May 21. It was objected to by the President of the Board of Trade, on the ground that it was only part of the question dealt with in the Report of the Railway Fares and Rates Committee, and the debate was adjourned in order that he might bring in a complete measure. However, there was no chance of this Bill passing—now, of course, it had been given up; and on July 9 the adjourned debate ended in that Standing Order being carried by a majority of 10. What he wished to do was to make the practice in both Houses alike. The Resolution was framed on the recommendation of the Committee to which he had referred, and on the Resolutions passed in the House of Commons last year and this. Its object was to place farmers and traders in a fair position with respect to the Railway Companies as to rates. Their Lordships were aware how powerless a trader or a farmer was against a great Company with a permanent staff to conduct their case. The Companies had all the experience gained by being very often before a Committee; and, as a rule, individuals were afraid to attack large Companies. They were not only handicapped heavily to begin with; but the question of expense was a serious consideration. It was difficult even for a body of men to deal with a Company. He had some experience of this, for some years ago he joined in a combination to ask for reduced rates. The large traders were aggrieved; but the moment the Company found the organization strong against them they offered the principal traders preferential rates, and so, in fact, did away with the general demand for a reduction of rates. This showed the power of a Railway Company. In fact, it might be said that Companies might almost paralyze an industry if they chose. On public grounds, as well as in the interests of single traders, therefore, he thought it a wise thing to give Chambers of Commerce and Agriculture a locus standi. They were public bodies, and if they took up a case merely to annoy a Railway Company they would lose credit at once. Again, they could not be subject to the operation of an offer of preferential rates to certain individuals. Such a provision as this would at any time be a great advantage; but just now, when trade and agriculture were suffering so much, the boon would be a very great one, particularly as there was a tendency to favour foreign trade as to rates to the injury of the home trade. The most important objection appeared to him to be that the Resolution would open the door to the whole of the rates of a large railway like the Great Northern being revised if they merely applied for some small power, which most large railways did every year. They were asked whether this would be fair. His answer was, certainly not. There should be strong reasons for such a course; but he must remind the House that it could not be fairly said that rates once introduced into a Bill should never be altered. On the contrary, a clause had always been inserted in Railway Bills for the last 30 or 40 years to give power to revise. It was admitted, too, that many rates were obsolete, were injurious to various industries, and required revision. Their Lordships would observe, too, that the Committee had power under the proposed Order only if they thought fit. The Business of that House was deservedly praised for the manner in which it was done; and he could not picture to himself any Chairman recommending a Committee to open the vast question of the rates of a great railway because some particular rates were objected to. Surely it was but fair that when a Company asked a boon from Parliament, when they applied for fresh powers, that others who paid these rates should have an opportunity of asking for a revision, particularly in some cases where the antiquated rates he had referred to were as injurious to the railways as they were to trade. A great deal was said about interference with Companies which had such an immense capital invested. But were not traders, who provided the dividends, to be considered? Railway Companies could ask for increased rates, but traders could not put the contrary case. It might be said that this Resolution would lead to frivolous Petitions. He thought this would not be so. The expenses of a Petition were too great, and the penalty of bringing forward anything frivolous too heavy. Again, it was said that this was only one recommendation, that they would be legislating piecemeal, and that they should wait till all the rates could be revised. How long might they wait for such a measure? Meanwhile, why should not the weaker party be protected? He had applied his remarks to existing rates, as he supposed there would be no objection to an appeal against new rates. All he could say was that he made a strong appeal to their Lordships to pass this Resolution. Mr. Chamberlain's Bill was no longer in existence; why not take a step in the right direction—a step acknowledged to be a good one by all except the railways? It was only optional to a Committee to hear a Petition; it was most important to trade and agriculture at all times to have fair rates; but just now, when they were suffering so much, of paramount importance; and any step in this direction would be received as a boon. They had heard a great deal lately of opening the door to agreement between the two Houses. If they could not agree in all things, yet he thought he might fairly appeal—and appeal strongly—to their Lordships to make the practice as much the same as possible in both Houses in a case of this kind. The noble Lord concluded by moving his Resolution.

Moved to resolve—

“That where a Chamber of Commerce or Agriculture, or other similar body sufficiently representing a particular trade or business, in any district to which any Railway Bill relates, petition against the Bill, alleging that such trade or business will be injuriously affected by the rates and fares proposed to be authorised by the Bill, or is injuriously affected by the rates and fares already authorised by Acts relating to the railway undertaking, it shall be competent for the Select Committee to whom the Bill is referred, if they think fit, to hear the petitioners or their counsel or agents and witnesses on such allegation against the Bill, or any part thereof, or against the rates and fares authorised by the said Acts, or any of them.”—(The Lord Henniker.)

LORD BRABOURNE said, he thought it was rather hard at this period of the Session, when their Lordships' minds were occupied with other important matters, that they should be asked to pass one of the most confusing and involved Standing Orders that it had ever been his lot to read. He pointed out to the noble Lord that Mr. Chamberlain had stated, when a similar Standing Order was brought forward in the House of Commons, that to pass such a Standing Order would be most unfair to the railway interest, and also that if anything was to be done in the direction indicated it should be done only as part of a large scheme. Indeed, he must apologize for rising so soon, as he could not doubt that the Government would take the same view as their Colleagues in the other House, and would oppose this Motion. It was quite true that, owing to a Cabinet Council being held at the time and other circumstances, the other House had passed the Standing Order by a very small majority; but, while he had great respect for the decision of the other House, their Lordships were not in the habit of always implicitly following their example, and he desired to point out one or two considerations that ought to weigh with their Lordships in the matter. In the first place, a Select Committee of the House of Commons had sat and fully inquired into all the circumstances of the rates and fares of railways, and had made a great number of recommendations. He thought it was a little too hard that his noble Friend should have embodied in his Standing Order one provision hostile to the railway interest, while at the same time he had omitted those provisions which were favourable to it. His noble Friend also made light of the objection to the Standing Order on account of its innovating character; but he would point out to him that it had hitherto been in both Houses of Parliament the wise and salutary rule that when a Private Bill had been brought forward for consideration in their Lordships' Committees or in those of the other House, the only thing that should be inquired into and decided and legislated upon was the contents of that Bill; that things extraneous to the Bill should not be brought in. His first objection to this Standing Order was that it violated that salutary provision. He asked, moreover, whether it was a just thing on the part of their Lordships, whether it was a wise or fair thing towards the Railway Companies to pass a Standing Order which, in the event of a Company merely desiring powers to alter a station or effect some trifling improvement would, expose them to the risk of having their whole system of rates and fares revised and possibly lowered? It frequently happened that the public desired a Railway Company to afford them some particular accommodation; but, if this Standing Order passed, the answer would be plain—namely, that the Company would have been very willing to grant the request, but that they could not run the risk of having their whole system of rates attacked. This could be done under the new Standing Order, although the Bill introduced by a Company had no connection whatever with rates and fares, and inevitably its effect would be to deter Railway Companies from coming to Parliament with the view of accommodating the public. In all these questions it was the fashion to talk about powerful Companies and Boards of Railway Directors; but it was not the power of Companies or the salaries of officials which were affected by anything which lowered the value of railway property—it was the dividend of the shareholders. Their Lordships must recollect that they were dealing in this legislation with a very large body of railway shareholders, and that while these men did not at all wish to avoid a fair fulfilment of the duties they had undertaken in seeking what was called a boon from Parliament, they at the same time asked, having sunk a large amount of capital in these undertakings, that faith should be kept with them. He would, moreover, say that in all their complaints against legislation recently proposed, the railway shareholders had never objected to having enforced the obligations they had undertaken; but they had insisted upon their right to have their causes tried by a competent legal tribunal, and to be treated like any other class of the community. If the rates granted to them by Act of Parliament were to be revised let it be by such a fair and competent tribunal acting upon definite principles; but do not let the whole system of a Railway Company be exposed to the will of such a fluctuating tribunal as a Parliamentary Committee. Some change might possibly be required with respect to the persons having a locus standi to oppose Private Bills in that House; but that change ought to be effected by some general legislative enactment, and not by a Standing Order such as this, only dealing with a portion of the subject. It was, no doubt, an advantage to have the practice with regard to Private Bills similar in both Houses; but a Standing Order carried in July by a narrow majority was not a circumstance that should lead that House to adopt it also. Possibly the House of Commons would be glad to recede from its position, and he hoped that their Lordships would reject this Standing Order instead of giving a locus standi to new Bodies, and would give the House of Commons a locus penitentie.

LORD SUDELEY said, this Resolution stood in a very peculiar position. When it came before the other House of Parliament, the President of the Board of Trade opposed it; but notwithstanding that the House of Commons determined that the Resolution should become one of its Standing Orders. The position, therefore, was entirely changed. The Government had considered the question very carefully, and they saw that if the Standing Order were not passed in this House, it might, on various occasions, place their Lordships in a very difficult position. At the same time, it was a subject on which great difference of opinion existed, and they thought it a question that the House should deal with entirely on its own responsibility, and that their Lordships were the best judges of the case. The Government had, therefore, come to the conclusion that it would be far better that they should not express any further opinion on the matter, but leave each Member of their Lordships' House to vote as he thought right.

LORD BRAMWELL said, he should oppose the Standing Order. The effect of its adoption would be to injuriously affect the railway rates and fares already authorized. It was said that the Railway Companies came to ask for a boon, and that, therefore, they could not complain if the boon which they asked was never granted unless it was also for the benefit of the public. Suppose Petitioners against a Bill made out that the railway rates and fares were, in some instances, excessive, and the Railway Company made out what they sought—perhaps an additional piece of land—was right and reasonable, what would the Committee do? Would they say that what the Railway Company sought in their Bill was very moderate indeed? But unless they made some sacrifice of the rates and charges they were entitled to levy by former Acts of Parliament, they could not grant the Bill. This Standing Order would give Chambers of Commerce and Chambers of Agriculture a locus standi; but such bodies were unknown to the law. Any gentlemen who associated themselves together might, if they pleased, call themselves a Chamber of Commerce, and ask to be heard. If there was some provision for inflicting costs on people who unreasonably, and on frivolous grounds, put Railway Companies to unnecessary trouble and expense, and for thus punishing the aggressors, he should not so much mind.

THE EARL OF MILLTOWN pointed out that the Committee already possessed the power of imposing costs on the promoters of frivolous or vexatious opposition.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN thought the House was entitled to more information as to the position and mind of the Government with regard to this matter. The Government opposed this Standing Order in the House of Commons. The House of Commons adopted it; but that was no reason why the Government should alter their opinion with regard to it. By the practice of their Lordships' House a great deal more power was given to Committees than in the House of Commons, and Chairmen of Committees did habitually decide questions as to whether persons should, or should not, be heard. It seemed to him quite right, when a Bill was put forward which contained new proposals and new rates, that a Chamber of Commerce, or a Chamber of Agriculture, should be entitled to be heard against it. Therefore, he did not himself see that his noble Friend was proposing anything objectionable in itself; but he would suggest that the words relating to existing rates should be left out.

LORD COLVILLE OF CULROSS wished to say a few words, as representing a great Company, against the Resolution. Notwithstanding what had fallen from the noble Lord who had spoken on the part of the Government, he really must ask the Members of the Government in the House to pay a little more attention to what had fallen from their Colleague, Mr. Chamberlain, in the other House. Remembering what had happened in the other House, and how the Resolution had been carried there, he really could not support the Resolution, which he regarded as a Motion to overturn Acts of Parliament passed years ago.

LORD HENNIKER said, he had, of course, expected to have considerable opposition from his two noble Friends near him, who represented the Railway Companies. With respect to what had been said about bringing on this Motion at the end of the Session, he had only to say that Private Bills were dealt with in November; and he thought that it would be more convenient to settle what was to be done now than at the beginning of a Session, and, as the House of Commons Standing Order existed, the position would be awkward. The difficulty with regard to public bodies becoming parties to the opposition to a Bill could be got over by mentioning the President or Secretary of a Chamber of Agriculture or Commerce in the Standing Order, for they were always men of position, and who would be admitted as opponents in their individual capacity. However, one point was to follow the Rule, as nearly as possible, laid down by the House of Commons, and the Standing Order there did not make this distinction. The noble and learned Lord opposite (Lord Bramwell) made a point of the power of raising the general question of rates over a large railway system. He thought that had been answered by the fact that the discretion was left to the Committee to hear the parties when they thought fit. The case put forward was, in fact, an almost impossible one. As to the power to appeal to the Railway Commission, the fact was that this power was not used. Parties did not apply to the Commissioners in the way suggested. With reference to the suggestion of his noble Friend opposite (the Earl of Camperdown) to take out the words affecting existing rates, he did not think there was any objection on the part of Railway Companies to allow new rates to be questioned; but the Motion would be valueless if it were not made retrospective, and did not affect existing rates. He made, again, a strong appeal to their Lordships to pass the Standing Order.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, although he did not in every particular approve of the Resolution, he would still support it, as it had passed the House of Commons. He had not for some time attended Select Committees; but his experience was that the great defect in the procedure of the House was that the public were never heard. It was all very well for Railway Companies to defend themselves; but there could not be the slightest doubt that the trade in this country did suffer most seriously from the nature of the rates now levied. The injustice of them was such that it pressed upon the trade of the country, and, in some cases, they were so injurious as actually to handicap our own trade in favour of foreign. On these grounds he should vote for the Resolution.

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET considered the Resolution most unjust, and he very much regretted that the Government had not acted in their Lordships' House as they had in the other House.

LORD WINMARLEIGH said, he thought it would be better that the Order should not be retrospective; and, therefore, he begged to move an Amendment to leave out all the words which would have that effect, so as to confine the proposed Standing Order to rates to be levied in the future.

Amendment moved,

To leave out ("or is injuriously affected by the rates and fares already authorised by Acts relating to the railway undertaking.")—(The Lord Winmarleigh.)

THE EARL OF REDESDALE (CHAIRMAN OF COMMITTEES) said, he could not acquiesce in the Resolution. He did not think that a Select Committee was a fit tribunal to settle the question of railway rates all over the country.

EARL FORTESCUE said, that when he was a Member of a Committee appointed many years ago to consider the Private Business of the House of Commons he was much struck by the inadequacy of the representation accorded to public interests as compared with private. Apart from the difficulty of getting individuals, each personally as one of the public but slightly aggrieved, to engage at short notice, either isolatedly or in a hastily-formed combination, in a costly conflict with a rich, powerful Company or confederation of Companies, the requirement of a locus standi he considered worked great injustice, and he welcomed any proposal which enlarged the representation of the interests of the public before Committees. He did not like, therefore, to vote against the Resolution, and, if it were amended so as not to have a retrospective character, he should have no difficulty in voting for it.

EARL GRANVILLE said, that, so far as he was concerned, he was prepared to vote for the Resolution if it were amended in the sense suggested by the noble Lord (Lord Winmarleigh).

LORD HENNIKER said, he thought the proposal now made to limit the Standing Order to new rates would not be accepted as a boon to the interests in question; but after what had been said by the noble Earl opposite (Earl Granville), and from the general opinion of the House, he would not trouble their Lordships to divide.

On Question, agreed to.

Then it was moved to leave out ("authorised by the said Acts, or any of them") and add at the end of the resolution ("proposed to be authorised by the same"); agreed to.

Resolved, That where a Chamber of Commerce or Agriculture, or other similar body sufficiently representing a particular trade or business, in any district to which any Railway Bill relates, petition against the Bill, alleging that such trade or business will be injuriously affected by the rates and fares proposed to be authorised by the Bill, it shall be competent for the Select Committee to whom the Bill is referred, if they think fit, to hear the petitioners or their counsel or agents and witnesses on such allegation against the Bill, or any part thereof, or against the rates and fares proposed to be authorised by the same.

Ordered, That the said resolution be declared a Standing Order; and that it be entered on the Roll of Standing Orders, and be printed. (No. 207.)

REPRESENTATION OF THE PEOPLE BILL—THE AUTUMN SESSION.

OBSERVATIONS.

THE EARL OF REDESDALE (CHAIRMAN OF COMMITTEES): My Lords, I have given Notice of the following:—

"To call the attention of the House to the proposed autumnal session, and to the only manner in which the extension of the franchise question can be satisfactorily dealt with."

I think it is desirable, in calling your Lordships' attention to this subject, to refer to the position in which the House stands, in which the Government stands, and in which the question of the extension of the franchise stands. Now, I believe that the relative positions are imperfectly understood throughout the country generally; and I think it very desirable, therefore, that something should be done to let us know the course to be proposed and the way in which the matter is to proceed. In the first place, I would refer to what took place yesterday. There was a great demonstration made in the Park, which was supposed to have some great effect on the conduct of this House. I was delighted to hear that a large number of persons assembled, and that the proceedings passed off in a satisfactory manner, and that those who came—some of them, I understand, were paid for their attendance—had a very pleasant day. And as all passed off so quietly I am induced the more to believe that those who attended will be induced to listen a little to reason on the subject, and that after all they will come to see that the real issue is very different from that which they are asked to countenance and support. The real truth, which has never been fairly brought before the country, is that this House has in no way refused the extension of the franchise. On the contrary, I believe it is generally conceded that this House has accepted the principle of the extension of the franchise. In fact, the persons who are really responsible for the non-adoption of the extension of the franchise in the present Session of Parliament are the Government, who presented a measure so imperfect that it was impossible for this House to agree to such a proposal. It is, my Lords, really much the same thing as a gentleman inviting you to dinner and then saying—"I have a capital haunch of venison and some excellent joints; but unfortunately my cook is away, and I cannot get them prepared, so you must eat them raw." The answer to that would be "No, thank you. I am glad you have an excellent dinner provided; but I must decline your invitation to eat it raw." In the same way the Government give your Lordships an excellent dinner, but ask you to eat it raw. This demonstration, as I have said, was to have had a great effect upon this House by informing us of the opinion of the country on the subject, and leading us to change our opinion, and bow to that of the Government on the subject. My Lords, I have been a long time a Member of this House, and I have seen a great deal of political life, extending over the whole period of the Reform Question, and I should just like to remind your Lordships of what took place in 1832. The question then was a very different one. Parliament met expressly for the purpose of considering that very question. The Bill was passed by large majorities, and it came down to this House perfect and complete in all its details, and it was rejected by this House. The consequence was popular feeling was extremely excited on this subject, and excited to a degree of which no one who has not witnessed it could form the smallest idea. Your Lordships all recollect what took place at Bristol, Nottingham, and other places where there was destruction of property and life, and altogether there was a feeling in the country of the strongest possible kind. Well, in the next Session the Bill was brought in again, and ultimately this House gave way to the popular feeling, and upon that Bill being passed a Parliament was returned which gave only about 150 Members to the Conservative Party, which had opposed the franchise. The consequence was that the whole command of the other House was in the hands of the Government of the day, and a great demonstration in favour of Radicalism was made, the effect being that in the course of another year some of the leading Members seceded from the Government. I refer to the late Lord Derby, the late Duke of Richmond, and Sir James Graham. In the next year after that the King became a little alarmed at the way things were going on, and he exercised the powers given him by the Constitution of changing his Ministers, which led to a Dissolution of Parliament, when it was found that the majority was materially changed. I mention this to show what was the effect of public opinion at that time. After the passing of the Reform Bill this House had continued carefully to watch legislation, and made frequent changes both by the Amendment and the rejection of measures; and, so far from losing in public favour in consequence, the Dissolution proved that it had gained by the attitude of perfect independence which it assumed. Sir Robert Peel, however, finding that the power which he had obtained in the House of Commons was not sufficient to enable him to carry on the government of the country, resigned. Three years after, the death of the King caused another Dissolution, and a Parliament was returned, in which Sir Robert Peel had a still increasing majority of his supporters; and after another Dissolution in 1841 the Government was turned out by a majority of 91 on a Vote of Want of Confidence on the Address in the Commons. Now, my Lords, that only shows how completely public opinion changes, and how little this House has to fear, if it is independent, and carries out its objects in a definite and just manner, from an assemblage of people such as that of yesterday. Depend upon it, my Lords, you have nothing to fear from the body which assembled in London yesterday. I believe they were, for the most part, a respectable body, and that when they come to consider the matter in an impartial manner they will find that the House of Lords has done perfectly right in rejecting an imperfect Bill. I remember that in 1832 the cry was "The Bill and the whole Bill." I hope that when we next meet Parliament may have "the whole Bill," and that this House will join with the other in considering the matter in a fair spirit. Now, my Lords, as to the question of the Autumn Session. I have no objection to it if, in the opinion of the Government, it is desirable to have one. Extension of the franchise is a subject which requires to be treated in the most careful way, and I think it is possible that an Autumn Session may be useful for that purpose, in order to insure that plenty of time be given to this question—namely, the question of the franchise, coupled with redistribution. The question of redistribution cannot be thought of until you have a measure before you; you must know in what manner it is proposed to treat the question of redistribution before you can express a decided opinion upon it. It is most objectionable to separate the two portions of the subject. It has always been the practice that the two subjects should be treated together; it is practically the same, and all you have to do is to introduce the Bill in two parts. Suppose Parliament meets in November, or whenever it may please the Government to call it together; the Bill would be brought in in the House of Commons, and the first portion would be the extension of the franchise. From the manner in which that has been treated in the other House, and from the really kindly way in which it was received in this, I do not think that the consideration of that portion of the Bill would give rise to any very lengthened debate, but would be settled before Parliament adjourned for Christmas. After Christmas the House would meet for the consideration of the other portion of the Bill. That will just allow about three months both for the country and for the House of Commons to consider the question of redistribution; and I think it will be absolutely necessary to have that time allowed to enable them to come to a fair conclusion connected with that most important subject. I may say that I expect that the question of redistribution will be fairly undertaken by the Government—I shall be extremely disappointed if it is not, and that such a measure will be proposed as may be fairly considered in both Houses of Parliament and accepted—and in that way I think the measure would certainly receive the approval of Parliament before the end of the Session. I believe there is not one noble Lord opposite, who is a Member of the Cabinet, who is not fully sensible of the extreme importance of this question of redistribution—not merely upon the next Parliament which may be returned, but upon the position of the country hereafter, and on the character of the Government who propose it. I trust, also, that the Members of the Government in the other House will be willing to give the same consideration to the public interest; above all, I hope and believe that my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister will himself be most desirous that whatever the proposals on that subject may be, they may be of a character that will reflect upon his Government, and upon his political career, a reputation for judgment and success in doing that which will be for the interests of the country at large, and for his own character as a legislator. I think it is desirable that we should know the course the Government are about to take with regard to the Autumn Session before Parliament rises; and I think the Government should be satisfied before they have an Autumn Session as to the manner in which they intend to carry out the question of redistribution; and if, as it seems to me, it is hardly possible to do that in the interval before the Autumn Session, they should postpone it until the ordinary time for the meeting of Parliament. It is most desirable that this question should be settled in the next Session; and I trust that noble Lords opposite will be induced to adopt this view, and to take care that they lay their proposals before Parliament in a manner which is likely to meet with the general acceptance of all Parties.

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, the noble Earl who has just sat down speaks with very great authority, not only from the Office which he holds in this House, but from the personal qualities he possesses in the estimation of your Lordships. I am always desirous of carefully considering anything which he says which at all affects the character of this House; and I am bound to add that the remarks he has just made have been characterized by great moderation. But, my Lords, I am sorry to say that his speech has somewhat disappointed me. I was rather in hopes, from the Notice he gave, he was going to suggest some mode of adjustment of the differences which exist between the two Houses which has not occurred to either of the two sides of the House up to this moment. The noble Lord made a becoming allusion to the character of that remarkable demonstration which took place in the Metropolis yesterday. I believe that that demonstration, and others which are likely to follow, are very much owing to the observations of the noble Marquess, who is not here to-night, that there is indifference in the country on this question of the Representation of the People Bill. The noble Earl went on to give us a history of the first great Reform Bill, which I and other Members of your Lordships' House remember, and which all of us have read about. I doubt whether any of the details he mentioned are new to any of us, and I hardly understand the drift of those remarks. He spoke of demonstrations, not orderly and peaceable, as that of yesterday, but of great violence, all over the country. He talked of the concession this House subsequently made to the feeling of the country, and then he explained to you very clearly that the result was not so revolutionary as the opponents of the Government of that day sincerely believed to be the case. But then the noble Earl goes on to suggest that we should give up at once what I know is the opinion of the majority of your Lordships, because that very question has been discussed twice and voted upon twice within this month, and that we should go against what is the opinion of the Government and of the enormous majority of the other House. I have spoken in the two debates, and I do not think that I am called upon on this occasion—and I think I can gather from the disappearance from the Front Opposition Bench of all the noble Lords who usually occupy it that they are of my opinion—I do not think that I am called upon to re-enter, or that there would be any great advantage in recommencing, a debate on exactly the same subject. The noble Earl speaks of redistribution, and appeals to us as to the manner in which we should undertake it. I assure him that he is not mistaken in believing that we all feel that a great responsibility lies upon us in regard to it; but when he makes this allusion I cannot help reminding your Lordships that Mr. Gladstone, on the very first stage of the Representation of the People Bill, speaking then for himself, gave the general character of the principles which ought to govern a Redistribution Bill—a Bill of a very different character from that which has sometimes been advocated by the Members of extreme Parties in this country. No Member of the Government objected to it, and Mr. Chamberlain took an early opportunity of expressing his accordance with those principles. On the other hand, we heard some vague objections to what may be done; but we have not heard one word as to the lines on which redistribution should take place. Therefore, I hope that the noble Earl, while giving us advice, which we will carefully consider, will, at the same time, weigh that advice and give it to his own political friends, in order that we may be enlightened a little more than we are now as to the character of the redistribution to which they look forward. The noble Earl stated that there was a misunderstanding in the country as to the position of this House and the Government. Is it really a misunderstanding that it is the House of Lords and not the Government who have delayed this Bill? I am very much afraid that there is not much chance of the country in general thinking that it is the fault of the Government and not of your Lordships' House when exercising that kindness to the Bill which has been so nearly fatal to it, and has been practically fatal to it this Session. I trust I have said nothing that will lend excitement or unnecessary vigour to the agitation which is going on. The duty of the Government is, I think, very clear, and I cannot depart from it.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL: My Lords, I am not surprised that the noble Earl has paid the compliment which he has done to the noble Earl the Chairman of Committees for the able and conciliatory manner in which he has spoken to-night. I came down to this House to-night with very great curiosity; because the noble Earl proposed to call the attention of your Lordships to the only manner in which the extension of the franchise question can be satisfactorily settled. Now I have a much less ambitious object in view in the few words I wish to address to your Lordships to-night. But I think that it is not an unfitting occasion to point out to both sides of the House the nearness of the position of the two Parties, with a view to conciliatory action. In the first place, I ask myself what the Government gained as a result of the action of the two Houses. The common impression seems to be that the Government have been defeated in the main object of their policy. I cannot accept that view. It appears to me that the Government have gained their main object. They have secured from this House a distinct and emphatic assent to the principle of the Franchise Bill. I must say that I do not at all share in any doubts, hinted at or expressed, as to the sincerity of my noble Friends opposite. My noble Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs referred the other night to the contrast between the earnestness of the Prime Minister and the want of earnestness shown on the other side. I must say that there are very few who can rise to the enthusiasm of my right hon. Friend. I must point out to the House that in the eminently able speech in which the Franchise Bill was introduced in this House there were no wild or extravagant views expressed as to the immense advantage to be gained by this great addition to the franchise. I am not quite sure, if I were to examine closely the interior feelings and sentiments of my noble Friends on the Liberal Benches, whether I should not find simply that assent and consent which men of business give in important matters of this kind to a great movement for the public benefit. I believe that most of us accept it, some as an act of justice, but more as an act of obvious political necessity. It was pointed out in the introduction of this Bill that when Mr. Disraeli introduced his Bill extending the franchise to all rateable householders in the boroughs all saw that it was merely a question of time before its extension to the counties. I myself have always said that the population of the country were quite as fitted for the franchise as those of the towns. Well, this great principle having been admitted and accepted by all sides of this House, I say that the Government have gained immensely in the course of action which they have taken. They must not consider, and the country must not consider, that they have been defeated in the measure they have brought forward.

That is a great point; but there is another point which, in my opinion, has not been sufficiently looked at. I think that the Government have not only gained in that particular matter; but I think that they have gained the main object which Mr. Gladstone had when he separated the two Bills. I think that great misunderstanding has prevailed with respect to the language of Mr. Gladstone. My right hon. Friend has been quoted by the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Salisbury) as having, in his speech in Downing Street, admitted that the separation of the two Bills was a preconceived scheme, as if it were a trap for the Opposition. If you will look at the words of the Prime Minister you will find that that is by no means a just construction to put upon them. In his speech in Downing Street he wished distinctly that all Parties, and not only the Opposition, should be placed under pressure to accept a fair Redistribution Bill if the Franchise Bill passed. The passage which was considered by the noble Marquess as a trap for the Opposition was distinctly and candidly explained in the speech which the Prime Minister made in the House of Commons, a corrected report of which has been published. What the Prime Minister said was simply this—a Redistribution Bill is a Bill which, of necessity, touches personal interests, while the Franchise Bill does not necessarily touch the personal interests of anybody. In the House of Commons there are those who represent small boroughs which are likely to be disfranchised; there are those to whose constituencies other boroughs may be added; and others who may be affected by any Boundary Bill that may be introduced. Mr. Gladstone's argument is that so many are the persons on all sides of the House whose interests will, of necessity, be touched by the Redistribution Bill, that nothing can be easier than for the various sections of the House to combine to defeat such a Bill unless they know that the Franchise Bill is practically passed. That is an avowal of tactics on the part of the Leader of a great Party. But it refers not only to the professional opposition, but to the necessary opposition which must arise on so difficult and complicated a measure. It appears to me that by the action of this House in accepting the principle of the Bill the Government have practically gained their object as regards redistribution. What is the effect? We are now sitting in a room with the doors ajar, and 2,000,000 of eager faces are looking into the Chamber for admission. Does any Member of this House think that any power or Party in the State can long leave that door ajar? No; it is not possible. And what would be the effect of it? Many of your Lordships will remember a celebrated phrase of Lord Palmerston, who was himself personally opposed for many years to any great extension of the franchise. Somebody was arguing that it would have a very small result, and that the same class of men would come in as before. "Yes," said Lord Palmerston, "the same men will get in, as before; but they will play to the 1s. gallery instead of to the boxes." That was a somewhat rude and rough expression; but most of your Lordships will recognize the truth of it. Members of Parliament who are now sitting for the present constituencies will, undoubtedly, be affected by the admission of these 2,000,000, their conduct, their language, and their votes will no longer be the same as before. Therefore, the pressure which you wish to put on Members of the House of Commons upon all sides towards a compromise on the question of redistribution is a pressure which you have already secured. That is a consideration which I wish to point out to my noble Friends on the Treasury Bench. There is another point to which I wish to direct the attention of the House, and all the more because it was touched by my noble Friend who has just sat down, and that is the language which Mr. Gladstone held in regard to the principles of redistribution. And I am bound to say that I myself feel strong confidence—although it is impossible for me to convey to other Members of the House that confidence—in the reasonable and moderate opinions of the Prime Minister on this particular question. I have that confidence as strongly as any man may feel it who looks merely at the character of the Franchise Bill, because it is eminently moderate and conservative as far as it is possible to make any Bill conservative which makes such an enormous addition to the electoral body. But Mr. Gladstone has gone to a very great extent in indicating what are his opinions as to redistribution. As his speech has been carefully republished and edited, I took the trouble this morning to extract from it the propositions which he has laid down in regard to redistribution. They are these—First, that the change which is to be made is to be inside the magnitude of the great change of 1832; but, nevertheless, it is to be large in order to secure permanence and stability. The second is that it is not to be based upon, and is not to include, the principle of electoral districts. The third is that there is to be no pure population scale. I cannot sufficiently impress on the House the immense significance of that principle. The element of population must always, of course, be of importance; but what Mr. Gladstone laid down is the negative proposition, that as to the basis of redistribution there is to be no pure population scale. The fourth is that the old Constitutional distinction between town and shire is to be retained. The fifth is that individualities are to be respected. Here, again, is a principle of extensive significance. And I beg the House to observe that in this principle of redistribution you are acting strictly on the ancient lines of the British Constitution, and following precedent. Mr. Gladstone says individualities are to be respected—that is to say, where a town or a borough has been long regarded and represented as an individuality it is not to be dealt with loosely on a mere population scale. The sixth principle which he laid down is this—that the great cities are not to have quite so high a proportional share of representation as the rural dispersed population. Here, again, we have a principle that is eminently moderate and Conservative; and I say I believe that there is no Member of this House who might set himself to devise a scheme of redistribution who would not gladly accept that principle as one which ought reasonably to guide us. Then Mr. Gladstone says—and on this there may be considerable difference of opinion—that in your redistribution the total number of the Irish Members is not to be disturbed—is not necessarily to be disturbed; but, then, that was coupled with another principle—namely, that some addition might be made to the total number of Members of the House of Commons with the view of considering the claim of Scotland to some additional representation. The last proposition was that the small boroughs must be the places from which the new seats are to be obtained. You can hardly expect the Prime Minister, who has not actually drawn up a Redistribution Bill, to go much further than he has done in these declarations on the subject; and I would point out to noble Lords on both sides of the House, and also on the Cross Benches, that this is a basis of redistribution as regards principle, on which I believe it to be perfectly possible for the two sides of the House to agree. My Lords, I will only add that the two Houses of Parliament, having agreed in respect to the extension of the franchise, and having had outlined to them a plan of redistribution which, at least in respect to principles, will, I am satisfied, be generally accepted, I think it would be a great failure of Constitutional government—a great scandal to the Constitution of England—if some scheme could not be devised by which this great reform of Parliament may be peaceably accomplished.

LORD DENMAN said, a fear had been expressed that if a Redistribution of Seats Bill were placed before Parliament before the Franchise Bill was read a second time, or even passed, that a combination of parties interested might defeat it in "another place;" but in the Reform Bills of 1831-2, drawn by Sir Thomas Denman, the whole of the schemes were complete; and one Member (Mr. Hawkins) gave up his exclusive interest in a borough and his seat, for the more just representation of the people, and the present Members of the House of Commons might be trusted by frankness. In 1859 the Franchise Bill was debated separately, and an hon. and learned Member, a relative of his own, was afraid of an education franchise, and then believed that "Jem Penman," capable of forgery, might command votes by voting papers; also in one debate the present Premier said notice might be given for the payment of rates by a certain day, and if they were unpaid the householders should be incapable of voting—from his neglect, after one Government had been beaten on Reform, and another formed. Reform was mentioned in the Queen's Speech; but it was dropped, on which he (Lord Denman), on the 12th of August, promised to bring in the rejected Reform Bill, if not revived by the Government. In 1860, however, Reform was again mentioned in the Speech from the Throne, and a Bill was framed containing a redistribution of seats, and the franchise was reduced in counties from £50 to £10 rental, and in boroughs from £10 rental to £6 rental; but it was withdrawn by the Mover of the Amendment and author of the new Reform Bill (Lord John Russell), in consequence of the large number of Amendments and the lateness of the Session. Lord Palmerston had asked—"Is the House prepared to say there shall be no reform in the representation of the people? It is impossible." In 1866 a Redistribution Bill was forced on the Government, who were only in a majority of 5 (against Earl Grosvenor's Amendment); and the present Premier, in his (Lord Denman's) presence and hearing, in answer to Lord John Manners's quotation from Tennyson's poems—

"A land of settled government,
A land of just and old renown,
Where Freedom broadens slowly down
From precedent to precedent."

said—"It did not suit the noble Lord to go on; he ought to have said—

'And statesmen at her Councils met,
Who knew the seasons when to take Occasion by the hand, and make The bounds of Freedom wider yet,
By shaping some august decree
Which kept her Throne unshaken still,
Broad-based upon her People's will,
And compassed by th' inviolate sea.'"

That appeared in Hansard, June 4, and in The Times, June 5, 1866; but the quotation was from a poem, "You ask Me why, though ill at ease," in page 70; and the passage required to follow was in the epistle dedicatory to the Queen. As the truth only appeared in Hansard some time after the debates, he (Lord Denman) expressed his belief that two Bills dealing with the subject of Parliamentary Reform might be brought in early in the Session, six months from the present time, and that then all parties would clearly understand what was best to be done in the matter by reading all the debates on the subject.

ARMY—PAY, PROMOTION, AND NON-EFFECTIVE PAY—THE REVISED ROYAL WARRANT.—QUESTION.

THE EARL OF LONGFORD asked the Under Secretary of State for War,

When the revised Royal Warrant for pay, promotion, and non-effective pay of the Army (which has effect from 1st April 1884) will be issued and be available for reference?

THE EARL OF MORLEY said, the Warrant in question would be printed and circulated early next month. He was afraid it could not be got ready before. Although there had been delay, there had been practically little inconvenience caused. The Warrant was a consolidating Warrant, and it repealed all the Warrants in force up to the present time.

SWINE FEVER—CIRCLES OF ISOLATION.

MR. R. H. PAGET asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, If he will consider the propriety of granting to local authorities the power to create infected circles in cases of swine fever, immediately after the outbreak, in order to obviate the delay which would be caused in making separate application to the Privy Council for the setting up of an infected area in each case?

The Earl of Longford

MR. DODSON: An Order in Council is in preparation, and will be issued almost immediately, which will give effect to the suggestion of my hon. Friend.

FISHERY PIERS AND HARBOURS (IRELAND)—AUGHIRIS PIER, COUNTY SLIGO.

MR. SEXTON asked the Secretary to the Treasury, with regard to the erection of a pier at Aughris, county Sligo, Whether, as appears by the Schedule, at page 28 of the current Annual Report of the Irish Commissioners of Public Works, the request for survey was made by the Fishery Piers Commission on the 4th of October last, and the plan and specification were forwarded by the Board to the Commission on the 12th of February last; whether the plan and specification have been returned to the Board, and how long they have lain in the hands of the Board since the Commission last heard of them, and what department is responsible for the delay of nearly half-a-year since the plan and specification were completed; whether new boats and nets purchased by Aughris fishermen in the expectation of the prompt erection of the pier are being seriously damaged by want of proper accommodation; how soon the work will be begun; whether any of the 39 piers recommended by the Fishery Piers Commission up to the close of the year ended 31st of March last have yet been put in course of construction; and, if not, what explanation can be given?

MR. COURTNEY: Since the Board of Works sent the plans in this case to the Fisheries Commission on February 12, there have been at least three references from the latter to the former suggesting alterations; the last one, received about four weeks ago, refers to a letter which never reached the Board, and suggests a new design. The Board of Works have always answered the references to them with reasonable promptitude; and the delay in this case, which I join with the hon. Member in regretting, can certainly not be laid to their charge. A telegram just received states that the plan is in hand; but the Board have not yet received from the Commission the limit of cost to be sanctioned. With regard to the general Question put by the hon. Member, I have to point out to him that only two cases were finally settled by the Fisheries Commission before March 31, and both of these are now under construction. They are Ballinagaul, in County Waterford, and Inniscrone, in County Sligo.

THE ROYAL UNIVERSITY OF IRELAND.

MR. KENNY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether the Senate of the Royal University (Ireland) allow medical men who studied in Ireland, and were qualified before the passing of the Royal University Act, but were prevented from obtaining University degrees owing to the state of things which the Royal University was created to remove, to present themselves on condition of their matriculating for the final M.B. examination; and, if not, whether steps will be taken to institute this measure of reform?

MR. TREVELYAN: The statutes of the University empower the Senate to act as suggested in the case of gentlemen who have passed a course in arts and medicine in certain institutions; and the Senate have, in several cases, exercised the power given to them, and allowed gentlemen who had gone through a course of arts in the Catholic University, prior to the establishment of the Royal University, to obtain the degree in medicine upon passing the matriculation and degree examinations in the Royal University. The Senate have not thought it right to grant any such privilege to medical men who had not pursued arts studies in some University or College, or other cognate institution.

ARREARS OF RENT (IRELAND) ACT— JAMES FARRELL.

MR. KENNY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether James Farrell, Poor Law Guardian of the Mohill Union, a tenant of the Earl of Granard, obtained the benefit of the Arrears Act in virtue of a joint application made by himself and his landlord; whether, in support of the application, he made and lodged an affidavit declaring that he did not hold land of the annual value of more than £30; whether, at the time of making this affidavit, he held two farms in the Mohill Union, fully stocked and of the annual value of £58; one under the Earl of Granard, the other under Mr. Webber, of Mitchelstown Castle; and, what action the Government propose to take consequent on this state of facts?

MR. TREVELYAN: Two of the Earl of Granard's tenants, each named James Farrell, obtained the benefit of the Arrears Act. Their applications were supported by the usual affidavits. The Land Commissioners were not previously aware that either of them possessed another holding; but they have made inquiry, and have been informed that it is a fact that one of the tenants in question holds a farm under Mr. Webber, and that the valuation of both holdings, taken together, is in excess of £30. In these circumstances, they will feel it their duty to make a Report of the case for the consideration of the Law Officers.

POST OFFICE (IRELAND)—THE DUBLIN POST OFFICE—SUBSTITUTION OF GAS FOR STEAM ENGINES.

MR. SEXTON asked the Postmaster General, Whether gas engines are being substituted for steam engines for working the pneumatic system in the Dublin Post Office; whether the condemned steam engines did the work to the satisfaction of the Post Office authorities; whether the Technical Department is opposed to the alteration, and whether Mr. Preece, the chief electrician, upon being consulted, reported against the change; what is the cause assigned by the Board of Works for the alteration; were any experts consulted; and, if so, would he state their names; what is the estimated cost of the work, and was it regularly advertised or given away by private tender; and, whether the condemned engines and boilers are already sold; and, if so, who are the purchasers, and what is the price?

MR. FAWOETT, in reply, said, that there were gas engines used in the Post Office, as additional room was very much wanted. The steam engines did their work very well, and the experiment with the gas engines would be, therefore, to see how they would work. Steam engines were still being used, and it was not the case that they had been sold, as supposed by the hon. Member.

THE IRISH LAND COMMISSION (SUB-COMMISSIONERS)—SITTING AT TUAM.

VISCOUNT ORICHTON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If it is the fact that the Sub-Commissioners, on the 18th June last, ordered the police to clear the Court House at Tuam, county Galway, in spite of the remonstrances of the secretary to the grand jury, who was holding a special sessions for the barony of Clare, for the purpose of taking tenders for eighteen roads that were out of contract, and perfecting bonds for those who were accepted as contractors; whether it is the fact that at least a hundred road contractors who attended to put in tenders had to go home without having done their business, and were consequently put to great expense and inconvenience; whether the grand jury for the county Galway pay rent, taxes, and insurance for this Court House and a salary to the Court House keeper; and, whether the Sub-Commissioners had any legal right to take such a course, and to disarrange the fiscal business of a large portion of the county?

COLONEL NOLAN said, he would like to ask the right hon. Gentleman, whether any complaint had been made by the cesspayers, or whether any great inconvenience had been experienced; and also if he had any authentic information as to the number of contractors concerned?

MR. TREVELYAN: It is the fact that an unfortunate difference occurred between the Presentment Sessions and the Sub-Commissioners Court as to the occupation of the Court House at Tuam. This matter had already engaged the attention of the Government before the noble Viscount gave Notice of his Question, and an explanation was received from the Chairman of the Sub-Commissioners, from which it appeared that, although the Sub-Commissioners did decline to yield to the representations of the Secretary of the Grand Jury, it is not a fact that they ordered the Court to be cleared. When they entered the Court House the Bench was unoccupied, and they believed the persons present to be the usual assemblage at their Courts. The persons whom they ordered to move were occupying the seats usually occupied by professional men, and the Commissioners thought that they were farmers who had cases in their Court. The Government think that the use of the county Court House for county purposes ought not, in any circumstances, to be interfered with, and that the Sub-Commission ought not to have continued to occupy the Court until assured by the Secretary of the Grand Jury that arrangements could be made for the transaction of the county business. The Government have expressed to the Land Commissioners their hope that steps will be taken to prevent any similar misunderstanding occurring in future, and they trust that no serious derangement of the county business will result from the present occurrence. I have not heard of any representation from the cesspayers, such as was referred to by the hon. and gallant Member.

THE MAGISTRACY (IRELAND)—THE REV. J. B. FRITH.

MR. SEXTON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If the Rev. John Brien Frith, of Enniskillen, against whom a charge of having acted partially and corruptly in his capacity as a magistrate, has been maintained by the verdict of a jury at Derry, and whose motion for a new trial has been refused by the competent tribunal, has yet been superseded from further acting in the Commission of the Peace?

MR. TREVELYAN: This case, I understand, is still sub judice, and while it is so no action can be taken by the Government in respect to it. If, however, during the next Sessions no steps be taken to prosecute the appeal, it will be properly considered whether the case can be referred to the Lord Chancellor.

MR. GIBSON: Does the right hon. Gentleman accept the statement in the Question, that any jury has ever maintained a charge against the rev. gentleman that he has acted partially and corruptly? Was not the verdict upon the plea of fair comment? I have made that correction before.

MR. TREVELYAN: The finding of a jury in civil cases might have too much weight given to it with regard to persons against whom the finding is given. The Rev. Mr. Frith, in the whole business, is open to possible exception in other respects than as to his conduct as a Judge on the Bench with regard to which I express no opinion at all; but there are certain other elements in the business to which I have previously referred, which might possibly be brought before the notice of the Lord Chancellor. The real fact of the jury having found as they did in a civil case, undoubtedly by no means is in itself sufficient ground for referring to the Lord Chancellor.

MR. GIBSON: That is not an answer to my point. I put a precise question to the right hon. Gentleman. It is the second or third occasion I have put it. Is or is it not a fact that there was no plea of justification, and only a plea of fair comment, and it was upon that plea the jury found?

MR. TREVELYAN: I do not in the least say I approve of the wording of the question. In saying Mr. Frith's conduct might ultimately have to be referred to the Lord Chancellor, I do not by any means say it is on the same grounds as the hon. Member for Sligo thinks it should be referred.

MR. SEXTON: I wish to ask the hon. and learned Solicitor General for Ireland, who has a knowledge of this case, whether it is not the fact that Captain M'Ternan swore that the Rev. Mr. Frith had acted corruptly and partially, and that his conduct was a pollution of the justice seat; and, whether, upon the issues raised, the jury found for the defendant; whether it is not the fact that the time allowed by law for appeal has not now lapsed, and that it is impossible to reopen the question?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER): The time has not passed by for appeal. The way the matter stood was this. The issue was not whether Mr. Frith had acted corruptly, but whether a public journalist, on the information before him, was justified in statements which he had made. Captain M'Ternan, in cross-examination, did state that Mr. Frith acted corruptly and partially. That was forced from him on cross-examination; but that was not technically the issue before the jury.

MR. GIBSON: Was it the issue at all?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER): No.

VISCOUNT ORCHTON: Is it the fact that the Judge before whom the case was heard, and the two Judges who heard the appeal, expressed themselves strongly to the effect that there were no grounds for the charge of corruption and partiality?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER): I heard the Charge of the Judge; but I cannot confirm what the noble Viscount has said regarding the appeal. I was not there, and I have not read it.

MR. GIBSON: Oh; everyone has read it.

MR. SEXTON: Is it a fact that a Judge wept on the Bench on that occasion?

[No reply.]

LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)—CASE OF JOHN DONOGHUE, A LUNATIC.

MR. HARRINGTON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is a fact that a young man named John Donoghue was in May last committed to Mullingar Gaol on a charge of murdering his father; whether the verdict of the coroner's jury stated that this young man was a lunatic; whether, notwithstanding, the governor of the gaol allowed him to exercise and work with other prisoners; if it is true that, while so engaged, he made an attack with a spade upon the life of another prisoner, named Dillon, and inflicted upon him injuries so severe that he was confined to hospital for several weeks; has the Prisons Board taken any action to ascertain what official is responsible for allowing a dangerous lunatic, committed on a charge of murdering his father, to associate freely and without restraint with other prisoners; and, will any compensation be given to the young man Dillon, whose health was so seriously impaired by this neglect of the prison officials?

MR. TREVELYAN: John Donoghue was committed to Mullingar Prison on the 25th of April, under a Coroner's warrant, charged with the murder of his father. The warrant contained no reference to the prisoner's being insane, though it is a fact that the verdict of the Coroner's Jury did contain such a reference. For a month following his committal, the prisoner was associated for two hours daily at exercise with the other prisoners of his class, and always conducted himself quietly up to the 27th of May, when he made an attack on the prisoner Dillon. The Prisons Board, at the time, conveyed to the Governor of the prison, who was the responsible official, an expression of their disapproval of a prisoner with such antecedents as Donoghue's having been placed in a position which enabled him to commit the assault. No permanent injury was inflicted on Dillon, and no question of compensation has ever been raised or considered.

MR. HARRINGTON asked, was the young man Dillon at present a prisoner?

MR. TREVELYAN was understood to reply in the affirmative.

THE BOARD OF WORKS, (IRELAND)— CASE OF M'HUGH, OF BOLINTAFFY.

MR. DEASY asked the Secretary to the Treasury, If Patrick M'Cue, a tenant farmer, of Coolaght, Claremorris, county Mayo, made, about half-a-year since, an application to the Board of Works for a loan; whether his landlord is Mr. John P. Ormsby; whether the landlord's son, Mr. Charles C. Ormsby, is the Inspector for the Board of Works in the barony in which his father's property is situate; and, whether the Board will transfer Mr. C. C. Ormsby to another district?

MR. COURTNEY: If the hon. Member alludes to the case of M'Hugh, of Bolintaffy, I beg to inform him that his loan has been sanctioned, and an issue can be made when M'Hugh has produced his rent receipts subsequent to May, 1883. The Board of Works do not know whether their Inspector, Mr. Charles Ormsby, is son to Mr. John Ormsby; and I do not see that it matters whether he is so or not, as there is no conflict between the interests of landlord and tenant in these cases.

ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY—PRO- MOTIONS—SUB-INSPECTOR FRENCH.

MR. DEASY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether any facts have come to the knowledge of the Irish Government recently such as to lead them to deem it advisable to institute an inquiry into the cases of promotion in the force at the instance of James Ellis French since he held the rank of Sub-Inspector?

Mr. Trevelyan

MR. TREVELYAN: The Inspector General informs me that no facts have come to his knowledge which would render it advisable to institute such an inquiry. Very strong grounds would be required to justify such a course. The period embraced by the Question would be about 20 years.

OVERHEAD TELEGRAPHIC WIRES— LEGISLATION.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON asked the Secretary to the Local Government Board, Whether Her Majesty's Government will next year introduce a Bill to give to the Local Authorities of the Metropolis and other towns such a power of inspection and control over the construction and maintenance of overhead telegraphic wires as will tend to protect the public using the streets from the dangers incident to such aerial fabrics?

MR. GEORGE RUSSELL: The Government cannot at present give any undertaking as to Bills to be introduced by them next Session. There would probably be an advantage in the appointment of a Select Committee to inquire into the subject of overhead telegraphic wires, and the question whether such a Committee shall be moved for next Session will be considered.

VACCINATION ACT, 1867—EVESHAM BOARD OF GUARDIANS.

MR. HOPWOOD asked, Whether, legislation or discussion being impossible this Session, it is intended to take any measures, by circular to guardians or otherwise, to discourage the repetition of prosecutions and the infliction of cumulative penalties upon parents declining to submit their children to vaccination?

MR. GEORGE RUSSELL: The letter of the Local Government Board of September, 1875, addressed to the Evesham Guardians, sets forth the considerations which it appears to us should be weighed by Boards of Guardians in determining whether or not they should take further proceedings in any particular case where a penalty has already been imposed under Section 31 of the Vaccination Act, 1867. That letter was issued as a Parliamentary Paper, and has been widely circulated. We have no doubt that Boards of Guardians, generally, are aware of the views expressed in it; and we do not propose to issue any circular letter as suggested.

NAVY—THE DOCKYARDS—THE VISITING TIMBER INSPECTOR.

MR. PULESTON asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether the office of Visiting Timber Inspector is vacant; and, if so, how long it has been vacant, and for what reason; whether the amount of pay attached to it has been regularly appropriated; and, whether it is proposed to fill it?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: The office has been for some time vacant, pending the settlement of the reorganization of the Constructive Department of the Admiralty. As now decided, the office will not be filled up. During the vacancy the amount of the pay has not been appropriated, but merged in the general saving on the Vote.

NAVY—THE DOCKYARDS—COMMISSION ON DOCKYARD WORK.

MR. PULESTON asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether the Report of the Commission on Dockyard Work has been presented; and, when it will be laid upon the Table of the House?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I presume my hon. Friend refers to the Committee recently appointed to advise the Admiralty on certain matters connected with shipbuilding. The Report of that Committee has not yet been forwarded to the Board; but I am told that it will be finished very shortly.

PUBLIC HEALTH — IMPORTATION OF BUTTERINE AND OLEOMARGARINE.

MR. GUY DAWNAY asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, Whether the Return of the Imports, under the head of Butter, in Table 10, Group 2, of the Agricultural Returns for Great Britain for 1883, includes also the substances termed Butterine and Oleomargarine; and, whether, in view of the disclosures contained in the Copy of Correspondence lately issued by the Privy Council Office in Paper No. 275, steps will be taken for the future to give separate Returns of the Imports of Butter and of the spurious and often deleterious and poisonous compounds of fat and acids imported into this Country under the name of Butter, to the detriment both of the health of the consuming population and of the prosperity of the home butter trade?

MR. DODSON, in reply, said, the Return to which the hon. Member referred included spurious butter under the head of butter. Oleomargarine was not included under that head, being classified by the Customs Department under the head of animal fat. The Customs were now, at the request of the Treasury, endeavouring to secure a separate classification of butterine and other imitations of butter, and they hoped to be able to distinguish them.

LAW AND POLICE (METROPOLIS)—THE REFORM DEMONSTRATION.

MR. GUY DAWNAY asked the First Commissioner of Works, Whether the iron hurdles, posts, and seats in Hyde Park were removed by his orders in order to facilitate the so-called Reform Demonstration on Monday the 21st; and, if so, by whom the expense of such removal and subsequent restoration will be defrayed?

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: The posts in question were removed by my orders. It was represented to me by the organizers—

MR. WARTON: Who were the organizers?

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: It was represented to me by the organizers of the demonstration that there would be serious injury and damage to the individuals forming the procession if the posts were allowed to remain, resulting from the crushing of so large a body of people through the posts. Acting upon that representation, I gave the necessary order, and the posts were removed by the ordinary labourers of the Park. There will be no expense caused to the public. I may add that many other demands were made upon me by the organizers of the demonstration, such as were made recently in the case of the meeting at Edinburgh; but I declined to admit them, on the ground that they were contrary to the Regulations of the Park.

MR. WARTON: Would the right hon. Gentleman be good enough to say who were the organizers?

MR. J. LOWTHER: Do I understand the right hon. Gentleman to say that the workmen whose time is paid for out of the Estimates were employed in this service for political purposes?

[No reply.]

Mr. TATTON EGERTON asked the First Commissioner of Works, Under what head in the Civil Service Estimates the expenses came, incurred in preparing Hyde Park for the reception of the mass meeting of 21st July, and repairing and restoring the Park in a proper condition for Her Majesty's peaceable subjects?

Mr. SHAW LEFEVRE: I think I have already answered that question. There will be no Estimate under which it will be necessary to vote money for the purposes mentioned. I think the House will be glad to know that no damage has been done to the Park.

Mr. J. LOWTHER: The right hon. Gentleman has not answered my question which I asked him just now. I do not know whether he caught it, owing to the rather disorderly cries of Members below the Gangway on the other side of the House. [Cries of "Order!" and "Withdraw!"]

Mr. JESSE COLLINGS: I rise to Order. I wish to ask you, Mr. Speaker, whether it is in Order for a right hon. Gentleman to describe certain Members of Parliament as being "disorderly?"

Mr. J. LOWTHER: Before you reply, Mr. Speaker, to the point of Order, I wish to state that I am prepared to name the hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway who did make a disorderly cry.

Mr. SPEAKER: The word "disorderly" is relative. I think the right hon. Gentleman meant to complain of the noise which may have prevented his being heard.

Mr. J. LOWTHER: The question which I asked the right hon. Gentleman was, whether I was to understand his answer as meaning that the workmen employed by his Department, which is connected with the Public Service, were engaged for these special purposes; and whether, that being so, they were not really paid for out of the Estimates?

Mr. GLADSTONE: For political purposes.

Mr. J. LOWTHER: Very well—political purposes; that is to say, they were employed in work which the right hon. Gentleman told us he was requested to undertake by organizers of a demonstration which has been avowedly—rightly or wrongly—of a political character. I must ask the right hon. Gentleman to answer the question.

Mr. BROADHURST: Before the right hon. Gentleman answers that question, I should like to ask him whether the men employed in removing the hurdles for public convenience yesterday are the same men who are employed constantly in keeping a special track of a large portion of the Park for a special and select class of horse-riders?

Mr. SHAW LEFEVRE: I have already explained that I ordered the work because I considered it to be necessary for the public safety.

Mr. TATTON EGERTON: I should like to ask whether, in any future demonstration, the First Commissioner of Works will be prepared to arrange the Park for political meetings?

Mr. SHAW LEFEVRE: That is a hypothetical question which I really cannot undertake to answer.

Mr. TATTON EGERTON: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether the police guarding a procession on Sunday passing through Onslow Place were employed on special duty, and by whom paid; and, whether he approves of the Metropolitan Police being employed for the protection of mendicity?

Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT: As to this affair in Onslow Place, if the hon. Member will give me further information, I will make inquiries. All I know is that no special police were employed, and that no special cost was incurred.

Mr. TATTON EGERTON: That only shows the ignorance of the Secretary of State as to his work. I wish further to ask the right hon. and learned Gentleman, whether the refusal of a superintendent of police to enable a Member of the House of Commons to cross Piccadilly in the crowd, before any passage of the procession of 21st July, is in accordance with the pledge given by Her Majesty's Government?

Mr. R. N. FOWLER (LORD MAYOR): Before the right hon. and learned Gentleman answers, may I ask him whether it was by his orders that Members of Parliament were prevented from passing through the Strand on their way to the House yesterday?

Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT: No, Sir, certainly not; more particularly, I should never have thought of stopping the Lord Mayor. As regards the question of the hon. Member for Cheshire (Mr. T. Egerton), I must have some further information on that matter before I can answer it. I really do not know who the person was, or the time or the place. If he will give me particulars, I will inquire into the matter. I have received an amusing letter from a gentleman as to a scene of that kind; but I will not read it to the House. With reference to these various charges as to the conduct of the police, I would suggest to hon. Members opposite that, as a right hon. Gentleman on the Front Opposition Bench has given Notice that he intends to move the rejection or the reduction of the Vote for the payment of the Metropolitan Police, these questions should be reserved until then. Of course, a Motion of that kind, coming from the Front Opposition and Conservative Bench, is a very serious matter; and when the Conservative Opposition proposes to refuse the pay of the Metropolitan Police, I shall be prepared to meet the charges against the police, and to maintain that they deserve the approbation, and not the censure or punishment, of this House.

MR. J. LOWTHER: Can the right hon. and learned Gentleman give any indication when that Vote is likely to be reached? I would also ask whether he misunderstands me in saying that I propose the rejection of the Vote?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: No; the reduction.

MR. J. LOWTHER: I undertook, in a formula well known to the House of Commons, to move the reduction of the Vote solely for the purpose of putting myself in Order. If the right hon. and learned Gentleman will put me in a position to move the reduction of the Home Office Vote, that would really meet my views much better.

MR. TATTON EGERTON: I will give the Home Secretary, categorically and in writing, the cases mentioned in my two Questions, and I shall expect to get a categorical answer.

MR. B. N. FOWLER (LORD MAYOR): Is the right hon. and learned Gentleman aware that a Member of this House was stopped yesterday in the Strand when on his way to the House by the police, and that when the hon. Gentleman said he was a Member of Parliament, and was going to the House of Commons, the answer was—"I do not care who you are; my orders are to stop the Queen if she comes this way?"

MR. J. LOWTHER: Will it suit the right hon. and learned Gentleman's convenience to make some fixed arrangement for taking the Metropolitan Police Vote? As the Home Secretary appears to consider it a matter of importance, as no doubt it is, it will perhaps be for the convenience of the House that some definite arrangement should be made. Will he take it at the beginning of a Sitting?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: Certainly, Sir; if I understand that this is an organized attack on the Metropolitan Police by the right hon. Gentleman opposite, I will take very good care that the Vote is not decided without sufficient Notice.

MR. J. LOWTHER: I must have some explanation of this. Does the right hon. and learned Gentleman still misunderstand me, and say that I mean to attack the Metropolitan Police when I have more than once disclaimed it? My attack is really on the Home Secretary.

PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—ROYAL COURTS OF JUSTICE BILL.

MR. WHITLEY asked the Secretary to the Treasury, What course the Government intend to pursue in reference to the Royal Courts of Justice Bill?

MR. COURTNEY, in reply, said, the matter was under consideration, and he hoped very shortly to be able to inform the hon. Member of the result.

NAVY—COLLISION BETWEEN IRON-CLADS IN BANTRY BAY.

MR. W. H. SMITH: I wish to ask, Whether the Secretary to the Admiralty can give any information as to the alleged collision between two of Her Majesty's ships off the coast of Ireland?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: Information has reached the Admiralty of the circumstances referred to by my right hon. Friend; but the information does not extend much beyond what appears in the newspapers. The ships are proceeding to Plymouth, where an investigation by court martial will be held into the cause of the collision.

EGYPT (EVENTS IN THE SOUDAN)—GENERAL GORDON.

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: I have to inform the House that Mr.

Egerton, in an important telegram, dated yesterday, states that a merchant has arrived at Assouan, 60 days from Kordofan, and 17 days from Dongola. He reports that Gordon left Khartoum and got as far as Shendy, but had to return, as there was not enough water. Khartoum had been surrounded by the Mahdi's followers; but they had been utterly defeated by Gordon, and their leader killed. Letters passed regularly between Gordon and the Mahdi; and there are many of the Mahdi's people round Khartoum, but his influence is on the wane. Major Ohermside also reports that he learns from his spies that Arabs are much afraid of Gordon, who has defeated four tribes between Khartoum and Berber.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES.

SUPPLY—considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

CLASS II.—SALARIES AND EXPENSES OF CIVIL DEPARTMENTS.

(1.) £1,337, to complete the sum for the Charitable Donations and Bequests Office, Ireland.

(2.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

Mr. SEXTON said, he was under the necessity of asking the Committee to agree to postpone this Vote, because it was desirable, in the public interest, that time should be given for the Local Government Board to consider and for the Government to announce the decision they arrived at in the case of Mr. Elliott, a servant of the Board. Mr. Elliott was a rate collector in the service of the South Dublin Union, and in that capacity he held office under the Local Government Board. The greater part of a year had passed since the auditor of the Local Government Board in Dublin discovered that, in his capacity as rate collector for the Blackrock Commissioners, Mr. Elliott had misappropriated moneys to the amount of between £2,000 and £3,000. Of course, if the ratepayers of Blackrock and the Commissioners were willing that their money should be misapplied, he would not ask the Committee to interfere; but what he did ask was, that the official who had committed this misappropriation of public money should be dismissed from the service of the Local Government Board, and deprived of his position of rate collector. It appeared that the misappropriations had extended over a series of years, and for some months the Commissioners had been holding private inquiries, and had been endeavouring to realize the assets of Mr. Elliott, in order to make good the deficiency of public money which had been discovered. The Lord Lieutenant had asked the Commissioners whether their attempt to realize Mr. Elliott's assets had been rendered necessary by any misappropriation or malversation of money on his part? Up to the present moment the Commissioners had not returned an answer. They were continuing their private inquiries. Neither Earl Spencer, as Viceroy, nor himself, as a Representative of the public, asking for information, in that House, had been able to obtain any satisfactory explanation from the Commissioners. It was not necessary, for a moment, to point out how desirable it was that the purity of the Public Service should be maintained in Ireland, especially in regard to the character of officials intrusted with the collection of public money; and the President of the Local Government Board had himself admitted that if an officer was untrustworthy in one capacity, it must be assumed that he would be dishonest and untrustworthy in all. The Chief Secretary, when the matter was mentioned the other day, named the 23rd instant as the day upon which he would explain the course the Local Government Board proposed to take in regard to Mr. Elliott. They had now reached the 22nd, and he should like to hear if the material for enabling the Government to arrive at a decision had yet come into the hands of the Chief Secretary, and, if not, how soon such material might be expected? As the question was one of principle, affecting the whole character of the Public Service, and the nature of the terms upon which trusted officials would be allowed to continue to hold their offices, it would be for the convenience of the House and of the Department if the Vote were postponed until the decision of the Government was announced. If the decision of the Local Government Board should be such as they had a right to expect, discussion on the Vote would be greatly shortened; but if, on the other hand, it were unfavourable, or unjust, it would be necessary for him to go into the case of Mr. Elliott at length, and with a particularity of detail which he would otherwise desire to spare the Committee.

MR. TREVELYAN said, they would all cordially agree with nearly all the hon. Member had said, except that in the present stage of the investigations he was unwilling to declare confidently that Mr. Elliott had misappropriated the public money. He thoroughly agreed with and approved of the canon the hon. Member had laid down—although there were not many occasions on which he did agree with him—that where a public servant had proved himself to be untrustworthy in matters connected with Public Business, he should not be continued in the Public Service. He could hardly accede to the proposal of the hon. Member to postpone this Vote in order that they might await the reply of the Blackrock Town Commissioners, for this reason—that the hon. Member and he were perfectly at one upon the action which it would be necessary for the Local Government Board to take, if that reply was unfavourable to Mr. Elliott. The long and the short of it was this—it appeared to him a very simple case, either that Mr. Elliott had misappropriated the public money, or he had not. Defalcations of this nature were very simple to ascertain. If he had, he would not be continued in office by the Local Government Board—if he had not, of course they should take no notice of his conduct. The hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) had no reason to doubt, from his (Mr. Trevelyan's) previous action in matters to which he and his Friends had called attention, that if a charge of malversation or fraud was proved against a public servant, however slight the sum of money concerned, he had invariably acted with rigour. The case of Mr. Byrne was as strong a case as could possibly be brought forward. Mr. Byrne had, by gross irregularities, to say the least, put into his pocket the sum of a few shillings, and, in consequence of having done that in his private capacity, he was deprived of a position which brought him in £1,200 a-year of the public money. Painful as his (Mr. Trevelyan's) duty was in the matter, he felt that his course was perfectly clear. On that principle he had acted then, and on that principle he should act now. Undoubtedly, if he did not fulfil his intentions in this particular, the hon. Member would have a right to complain, and to call him to task. He thought the Blackrock Commissioners had not shown a proper sense of the gravity of the position. If their ordinary meetings were not sufficiently frequent to enable them to consider this matter promptly, they ought to have met specially to consider it. He had every reason to believe that on the 23rd instant the Government would have the Commissioners' final answer. If they did not get a final answer, he should certainly be prepared to take extraordinary means, because the circumstances were extraordinary. He hoped, after that statement, hon. Members would allow the Vote to proceed.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR pointed out the importance and seriousness of the case. The short sketch which had been given of it by his hon. Friend had been practically corroborated by the Chief Secretary. Of course, the right hon. Gentleman would not admit the actual charge—that a public officer, who was supposed to have been guilty of misappropriating large sums of money, was at present retained in his position. The facts more than suggested the idea that someone connected with the Local Government Board, who had supervision over this gentleman, had not performed his duty in such a manner as to make Mr. Elliott responsible for the acts of which he had been accused. Upon the actual facts of the case, the right hon. Gentleman and his hon. Friend were agreed. The right hon. Gentleman said the Blackrock Commissioners were acting in a sluggish way, and he (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) thought the right hon. Gentleman would agree with him that their action in the matter ought to be stimulated. He had not the smallest doubt as to what the intentions and inclinations of the right hon. Gentleman were in regard to it. The right hon. Gentleman had always distinguished himself by the rigidity of his judgments upon improper conduct such as this, and in all offences against the public morality by officers in the Public Service; but the right hon. Gentleman, being President of the Local Government Board, asked the Committee to pass the Vote for that Department before he had declared his ultimate decision upon a most important question of policy. That demand was most unreasonable, and it was made more unreasonable by the right hon. Gentleman reiterating the statement that he expected to be able to announce his decision on the 23rd.

MR. TREVELYAN: No, no.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: That is what I understood the right hon. Gentleman to say.

MR. TREVELYAN: The Board have called a meeting for the 23rd. I suppose we shall get their answer on the 24th. Suppose they give very clear proof that there was no suspicion of defalcation, or, on the other hand, suppose they thoroughly admit that there was malversation, in that case the matter might be settled in two or three days; but suppose there are still delays and doubts, the Local Government Board would then be entitled to take action of their own. The probable action we should take would be to call upon Mr. Elliott for an explanation.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, the impression in Ireland was that the Blackrock Commissioners were determined to keep Mr. Elliott in his office, at all risks and at all hazards, by every possible means in their power. He thought the Committee ought to insist on retaining its control over the matter, by postponing the Vote until it had been decided. That was the single point between his hon. Friend and the right hon. Gentleman, and there ought not to be two opinions about it, for his hon. Friend had proved to the hilt that the House of Commons ought to retain this power. The only objection of the right hon. Gentleman was, that there were well-known principles which guided the action of the Local Government Board in such cases, and the Committee would be justified in assuming that the course the Board finally took would be the proper one. No one had a higher opinion of the right hon. Gentleman than he had; but, under the circumstances, he hoped his hon. Friend would press his objection to a Division.

MR. MOORE said, he desired to make a few remarks upon the Vote generally. There was no doubt an opinion, gathering in all quarters and increasing in volume and size every day, that there must be some radical change in the administration of the Irish Poor Law. He, for one, was inclined to attribute the existing undesirable state of things very much to the action of the Local Government Board, who always displayed a narrow-minded spirit in administering this Vote, and he was satisfied that the present workhouse system worked most unsatisfactorily in the case of the really deserving poor.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR expressed a hope that the hon. Gentleman would postpone his remarks upon the general question until the Committee had disposed of the case of Mr. Elliott.

MR. MOORE said, he had no objection to do so; but it would be absolutely necessary that he could refer to the defects of the present Poor Law administration in Ireland before the Vote was disposed of.

MR. COURTNEY wished to point out that no Motion for the postponement of the Vote could be made. When the Vote had once been put from the Chair, there were no means of proceeding in the way suggested by the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton). What the hon. Member would have to do would be to induce the Government to withdraw the Vote. As he understood the issue between the hon. Member and the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary, it was that the House of Commons should not lose its control over the Vote until it was assured what action the Department intended to take. But what was at present in doubt was not the action of the Department. That had already been fully explained by the Head of the Department; but what was in doubt was the action which might be taken by the Blackrock Commissioners. If the Vote were deferred, it would only be because there was some uncertainty in that respect. He thought the statement of his right hon. Friend on the part of the Local Government Board was perfectly plain and clear, and the course now suggested to be taken was not only inconvenient, but displayed a certain amount of distrust in the bona fides of the Head of the Department. It was practically contended that the Vote ought to be withdrawn until that distrust was removed; but he failed to see why any distrust whatever should be felt.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, he had not expressed any distrust of the Chief Secretary. What he had said was, that he had no doubt the right hon. Gentleman entertained proper ideas of his duty in the matter, and would be prepared to deal with it rigorously; but he had pronounced no opinion as to the steps which ought to be taken with regard to compelling the Blackrock Commissioners to come to an early decision on the subject of the alleged defalcations, and that in that respect he had displayed a want of energy. The right hon. Gentleman himself, in the course of his remarks, had neither directly stated nor hinted that he was prepared to act with such energy as to compel the Blackrock Commissioners to come to a decision at once.

MR. COURTNEY said, the explanation of the hon. Gentleman was to the effect that he was perfectly satisfied with the bona fide intentions of the Chief Secretary in dealing with the case on its merits; but, of course, the steps to be taken must depend upon the action of the Blackrock Commissioners. If they reported against Mr. Elliott, of course he would be removed from the Public Service. His right hon. Friend had distinctly assured the Committee that unless all suspicion of defalcation was removed from this public officer, he would at once be informed that his services would not be retained. After a declaration of that kind, and having informed the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) what would be the action of the Local Government Board, he trusted the withdrawal of the Vote would not be persisted in.

MR. SEXTON said, he was obliged for the explanation the Secretary to the Treasury had given on the point of Order—namely, that the postponement of the Vote could not be moved. It was, however, all the same to him (Mr. Sexton) if it were decided that the Vote itself should not be passed at the present moment. He thought the argument of the hon. Gentleman was a somewhat specious one. The right hon. Gentleman said the Local Government Board were committed to the principle on which they would act, and that nothing remained but to ascertain the facts to which that principle was to be applied. Now, he (Mr. Sexton) thought there was something more than that to be considered. The right hon. Gentleman spoke of "defalcation" and "fraud;" but he (Mr. Sexton) did not feel quite sure that he and the Chief Secretary would attach to the word "defalcation" the same meaning. If Mr. Elliott, in the course of a few years, had collected moneys from the Blackrock ratepayers and had given receipts for them, and instead of lodging such sums to the credit of the township in the bank he had put them in his own pocket, and used them for his own purposes, even if he had not forged or falsified any entry or receipt, if he retained in his own possession the moneys of the township and appropriated them to his own use, and was unable to make them good when called upon, he would, in the opinion of hon. Members, be guilty of defalcation. He did not know whether the Chief Secretary so understood defalcation. What was the course which the Blackrock Commissioners had taken? They had made themselves partizans. They had referred the case to a Committee who were carrying on a private investigation. They had converted themselves into a Committee of Liquidators in regard to Mr. Elliott, which they certainly ought not to have done; they had taken over his stocks and shares and houses, and they were now engaged in a vain and futile attempt to realize the amount of his defalcations. There was, therefore, no reason for postponing a decision on the case. Indeed, it ought to have been given long ago. The public proceedings of the Commissioners already revealed the fact that Mr. Elliott owed them £2,600, and that they had only been able to realize from his assets £1,300. That was the broad and glaring fact—that after all Mr. Elliott's assets were realized, £1,300 still remained due to the Commissioners. What more was there necessary to prove defalcation? Was not the fact abundantly proved? What was the meaning of this delay and this shilly-shallying on the part of the Local Government Board? The Local Government Board and the Lord Lieutenant were the only parties who remained unconvinced. The Lord Lieutenant had allowed half-a-year to go by without action, and the Blackrock Commissioners for weeks and weeks had withheld a reply to the question of the Local Government Board whether there had been defalcations or not. He, therefore, felt no confidence that the authorities had the power, even if they had the will, to drag a truthful answer from them; and he certainly had no confidence as to what the result would be if the House of Commons gave up their control over this Vote. This was the only Constitutional occasion for raising the grievance, and as the right hon. Gentleman refused to answer the direct question put to him, he (Mr. Sexton) felt that he had no alternative but to resist the Vote. If he sacrificed the present opportunity, however shameful the ultimate decision in regard to Mr. Elliott might be, he would have surrendered for 12 months the right of raising the question. As they were, in a few days, to have the answer of the Blackrock Commissioners, no practical inconvenience would result from deferring the Vote.

MR. TREVELYAN said, that, after the speech of the hon. Gentleman, he could not consent to postpone the Vote. The hon. Gentleman had given a colour to the transaction which compelled him to take issue with him regarding the action of the Irish Executive. In the first instance, the hon. Member put a Question upon the Paper containing several important allegations. The Irish Executive referred it to the Blackrock Commissioners, stating they were aware they could not call upon them officially for an answer, but that as it concerned the honour of one of their officers they ought to reply. The Commissioners sent a letter answering the questions categorically, and in the course of their letter it was stated that they had been endeavouring to realize the assets of Mr. Elliot. That was the first intimation which the Irish Executive had implying that Mr. Elliot had been guilty of defalcation. The Commissioners then wished the Government to wait for the Report of a Committee which was then sitting; but as the Report of this Committee did not appear likely to be forthcoming, the Government thought it better to call attention to this statement about the realization of the assets, and to ask what was the meaning of it, and what had been the conduct of Mr. Elliot, in regard to public money, that it should require the Commissioners to realize his assets? That letter was now before the Blackrock Commissioners, and was the letter to which the Government now awaited reply. They had decided that, if a proper answer did not come, they would act on the information they had already received, and call upon Mr. Elliot to explain. He did not understand how the Government could have acted in a more rapid manner. Unquestionably, in doing what they had done they had broken through the usual rules which guided the action of independent Departments. Instead of waiting until the case was brought before them, they had put it forward themselves, and had insisted upon having an answer to the specific charges made against Mr. Elliot. With regard to the course which the hon. Member wished the Local Government Board to take in reference to this Vote, he must ask the hon. Member what it implied? There were a large number of Votes in the Estimates which concerned the salaries paid in various Departments, which had an enormous amount of business to do. But take the Department of the Local Government Board in Ireland. There had been no time in which, in the House of Commons, the proceedings of Public Departments were so carefully watched, and there had been no time when so many controversies were pending between certain persons and the Department. For instance, the hon. Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy) was taking a great interest in the action of a Board of Guardians in Donegal. A letter of his (Mr. Trevelyan's) was now before that Board, and whatever the answer to that letter might be, he should have to take some action upon it. There was no period when they could not find a subject of pending controversy between private Members of the House and the Local Government Board, with regard to nearly every Public Department; and if they consented to tie up this Vote because a certain controversy was pending, in a few days they would be asked to tie it up on account of another. Therefore, when they approached the consideration of the Vote again, some other pretext would be put forward for putting it off; it would be said that there was some other question to be settled, which hon. Members wished to have settled in a particular way. No good object could be attained by deferring the present Vote, because he had already explained, in the clearest manner, the line of action the Local Government Board intended to take.

Mr. MOORE said, that as he understood it would not be in Order to postpone the Vote, it would simplify matters if he were to move the reduction of the Vote by the sum of £1,000.

THE CHAIRMAN: Does the hon. Member make that proposition?

Mr. MOORE: I have no wish to interfere with the action of my hon. Friends.

Mr. T. P. O'CONNOR said, he would appeal to his hon. Friend not to interpose at present. As the Government were disinclined to give way, it was desirable that a distinct and definite understanding should be arrived at. When this matter had been fully discussed, there would be nothing to prevent his hon. Friend from making his Motion. He (Mr. O'Connor) wished to say a few words in answer to the Chief Secretary. When the Secretary to the Treasury addressed the Committee, he confined himself to the difference of opinion between the Irish Members and the Chief Secretary as to whether the Vote should be postponed or not. The Chief Secretary seemed to entertain the same view they did as to the principle upon which the charges against Mr. Elliott should be decided; but the conversation which had since taken place showed that there was even an element of uncertainty as to whether the Chief Secretary and the Irish Members really did agree upon the important question which had been raised by the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton). He distinctly challenged the right hon. Gentleman to give his idea of what constituted defalcation.

Mr. TREVELYAN: I quite agree with the definition of the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) on that point. Defalcation is a definite crime, and it has been extremely well put by the hon. Member.

Mr. T. P. O'CONNOR said, he might, then, assume that his hon. Friend's idea was satisfactory, and a correct definition. What his hon. Friend insisted upon was that defalcation meant the withholding of money by a rate collector, even though he might have made it good afterwards. That was his hon. Friend's definition; and, therefore, it had already been proved that defalcation had occurred. The whole action of the Chief Secretary dated from the time the Blackrock Town Commissioners were attempting to realize the assets of this gentleman; and, therefore, it was admitted on all sides, according to the interpretation of his hon. Friend and the right hon. Gentleman, that defalcation must have taken place. His hon. Friend had accused the Commissioners of sluggishness, and he joined his hon. Friend in reiterating the charge, and in applying it to the Government as well. Elliott was a rate collector of the South Dublin Union, and, therefore, immediately under the control of the right hon. Gentleman. If, therefore, the Chief Secretary had no power over him as collector for the Blackrock Commissioners, he had perfect power to dismiss him as collector of the South Dublin Union; yet, though the right hon. Gentleman knew Elliott's position for two or three months, he had taken no action whatever. The right hon. Gentleman knew, at least, two months ago that there was a prima facie case of defalcation against this man, according to his own definition of that offence, and the officer was directly at the disposal of the right hon. Gentleman.

Mr. TREVELYAN: Not two or three months ago. I had no knowledge of the matter before the Question addressed to me by the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton). That was the first occasion on which the attention of the Local Government Board was called to the matter.

Mr. SEXTON: The Local Government Board had knowledge of the essential facts at a date long anterior to my Question.

Mr. T. P. O'CONNOR said, he thought it was perfectly clear that for two or three months, at least, this man was retained in a position under the control of the Local Government Board, although a prima facie case of defalcation rested against him. Elliott held two positions—one as rate collector of the South Dublin Union, which placed him directly under the control of the right hon. Gentleman and the Local Government Board, and the other as rate collector for the Blackrock Town Commissioners. Therefore, as rate collector for the South Dublin Union, he could be dismissed at any moment by the Chief Secretary, although, as collector for the Blackrock Commissioners, he was, of course, independent of the right hon. Gentleman. The right hon. Gentleman had, however, fully accepted the canon that an official who misconducted himself in one office thereby incapacitated himself from serving in another; and, therefore, if Mr. Elliott had been guilty of defalcation in connection with Blackrock, he ought not to be retained for the South Dublin Union. It was an admitted fact that the charge of defalcation against this gentleman had been brought indirectly before the attention of the Local Government Board months ago, and even two months ago in the House of Commons; and yet the right hon. Gentleman asked his hon. Friend to give up the only Constitutional means he had of questioning the propriety of retaining this man in the Public Service by allowing the Vote to pass, and thus removing the matter from the supervision and control of the House of Commons before the right hon. Gentleman gave his decision finally upon a most important question of principle, which could only be raised in connection with the Vote. He thought it was utterly unreasonable for the right hon. Gentleman to expect them to forego their right to pronounce an opinion upon this important question; and he therefore thought that his hon. Friend was justified in pressing the point.

MR. MOORE said, he had no wish to interrupt his hon. Friends in this interesting discussion, and he hoped the question might be brought to an issue between the Treasury Bench and the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton). He had risen, however, to move the reduction of the Vote by the sum of £1,000, in order that he might be in a position to make a general statement as to the working of the Poor Law in Ireland, and the treatment of sick, aged, and infirm paupers, especially lunatics, whose condition was the most pitiable of all. The general feeling throughout Ireland was that the institutions known as workhouses were rapidly degenerating into cesspools of crime, vice, laziness, and hereditary pauperism, instead of being suitable asylums for those who had a legitimate claim upon society for support. What they in Ireland wanted was that these workhouses should be made vastly more strict and penal in their administration as regarded the idle, worthless, and dissolute classes, and that they should be made more useful and humane for those who had a legitimate claim upon the community for support and assistance. According to a Return which had just been presented, the total number of inmates in the workhouses was 56,572; and the Committee would be astonished to hear that 20 per cent were described as able-bodied persons. He thought that was a fact well worthy of attention. The number of men whose misconduct was sheltered within these institutions was not only very large, but absolutely monstrous. Many of them were brought up in pauperism; they went out of the workhouses for a short time, but invariably returned again; and when asked what it was that brought them back, they said that they had come to regard it as their old home. Even men, who had gone out as soldiers to India, on their return to Ireland re-entered the workhouses. They had been so accustomed to lead an idle, worthless life, that the moment honest toil and honourable labour become irksome, they returned to their old home, although it might appear extraordinary that they would desire, of their own accord, to return to short rations and uncomfortable accommodation. He presumed that a disinclination to work was at the bottom of it, and that after a very short time they relapsed into habits of idleness. Out of the total of 56,000 inmates, 12,000 were entered as able-bodied. As the figures were taken in the winter—namely, in February, 1883—of course, that would indicate a time of year when the weather was severe, and a good many people were out of work; but, at the same time, during the winter in question there was abundance of food to be obtained, and, therefore, the one fact would counterbalance the other. He strongly objected to the way in which the workhouses were made to shelter vice and profligacy. The number of women of bad character who inhabited them was perfectly astounding. Out of 30,000 women in the workhouses, 20,000 were returned as the mothers of illegitimate children. He believed that by far the great majority of women who visited these institutions were women of bad character; and he was of opinion that in cases of such gross immorality the ratepayers ought not to be bound to provide for them in the way they were provided for now. He felt that some stronger obligation of the law to throw the burden of these illegitimate children upon the fathers was necessary; and there ought to be some provision to prevent the pauper class from constantly converting the workhouses into a refuge in the winter, and going out of them in the summer. In the Northern workhouses the number of women of bad character who made use of them was very extraordinary; they went into them only for a few days. He remembered a case in connection with the Belfast Workhouse where one of these women was reported to have been an inmate of the workhouse 57 times. Persons of that class were called "revolvers;" they were kept and maintained at the expense of the public, and they treated the workhouses simply as lodging-houses. He complained of the laxity and want of vigour displayed in the administration of the Poor Law in Ireland. Idle people were allowed to frequent the workhouses, and to throw themselves on the rates, without any attempt being made to discriminate between their cases and those of the deserving poor. He had spoken of the large number of able-bodied persons who became inmates of the workhouses. A few years ago he visited the South Dublin Union, and noticing a powerful man passing into the house, he asked who he was. He was told that he was a pauper, who was engaged in some manual work in the workhouse, and that he had never been out of it during his life, although he was 45 years of age. He asked if there were many more men in the same position, and he was told that there were many who had never been out of the workhouse, but who had been born, bred, and reared there. He thought there could not be a more striking illustration of the evils of the system than the fact that persons were allowed to grow old in the workhouses, and to become a burden all their lives to the ratepayers, many of whom were in circumstances very little above pauperism themselves. He believed the hospitals of Ireland were very much behind what they ought to be, although they had made considerable advance; and with regard to the religious institutions in many of the workhouses, they had the assistance of religious persons who undertook the care of the children. He was sorry to say that they had not had very much assistance from the Local Government Board in that direction; and, indeed, as far as his experience went, he never remembered the Local Government Board doing anything whatever for the benefit of the poor. He complained, further, of the want of classification. Young persons were constantly placed in the common room with idlers and criminals. There was no other room they could frequent; and although the deserving poor were invariably treated with scant courtesy, he thought that some such provision ought to be made for the aged poor as that which was made in France. In France, when an aged person fell into poverty, and was unable to provide for himself, the State undertook to make provision for him. The principle acted upon was that these persons had a right to relief unless they had brought their pauperism upon themselves by vice or laziness. When once a man fell into a condition that he was no longer able to help himself, he ought to be supported at the expense of the State. Then, as regarded pauper lunatics, there was much room for reform. Their condition was more distressing than that of any other class. There were 1,800 of these lunatics who were inmates of the workhouses. Their treatment was a matter upon which more than one Commission had reported. He remembered a person who gave up the best part of his life to visiting these institutions, and in trying to do something for the benefit of his fellow-men, finding one of these poor idiots chained to a pillar.

MR. KENNY: In what district?

MR. MOORE said, the incident he referred to occurred in the county of Clare some years ago, and the condition of the lunatics who were inmates of the workhouses generally was such as to call for immediate attention and reform. There was a wide distinction to be drawn between the lunatics in the county lunatic asylums and those in the workhouses. No institutions in the Kingdom were better managed than the Irish county asylums, and he had known frequent cases in which persons had been recovered from what was supposed to be a perfectly hopeless state of lunacy.

The provision, however, which was made for the lunatics received in the Irish workhouses was most defective. There was no attempt whatever to cure them, and they were left to live their wretched lives in a hopeless state of imbecility. Of course they were harmless, because if a pauper lunatic attempted a crime he was at once transferred to the county lunatic asylums. He came next to the instruction given in the Irish workhouse schools. According to the last Return, which, however, was not very recent, there were 42 teachers engaged in instructing the children in the workhouse schools, the whole of whom were unclassified and uncertificated, notwithstanding the ready means provided by the law for ascertaining the capability and qualifications of these persons to teach. He thought the matter was one for inquiry at the hands of the Local Government Board, who had a right to see that no unqualified teacher was appointed. They ought to refuse their sanction to such appointments; but he was sorry to say that he had witnessed in his own district the slowness of the Local Government Board in dealing with proved cases of incapacity. Where the teacher was incapable of performing the duties required of him, the Local Government Board ought to come forward and imperatively put an end to his employment. As to the inspection of the workhouse schools, it was of a two-fold character, and consequently came to nothing. The inspection of the school building came under the Poor Law, whereas the inspection of the educational qualifications of the children came under the National Board. The Inspector of the National Board went down to inspect the schools; but he had no authority to enforce his orders, and therefore the standard of education was below par, and the condition of the children was one of entire neglect; because there was no authority whatever, either direct or indirect, to enforce a better state of things. Very numerous complaints had been made to the Local Government Board, but without effect. If the inspection of the workhouse schools was was not to be an absolute farce the Inspector ought to have power to enforce his orders. As he had said, the inspection was of a two-fold character. The school buildings and materials, and the condition of the children were under the Local Government Board, whereas the educational arrangements were under the National Board; and the result of this two-fold inspection was that the interests of the children were altogether neglected. No doubt, the great defect in the Irish workhouses was that the children were brought up in idleness from the very first day they entered the house; and hence it was found that, even in the case of men who had served the Queen with distinction, it was almost impossible to make them respectable members of society, and they consequently returned to what they regarded as their home. Some of the children were occasionally employed in picking a few weeds, or in some of the minor branches of agricultural labour; but there was no pretence of teaching them any industrial work whatever. The children were brought up in idleness, and this idleness acted upon them in a most deplorable manner, owing to the associations among which they were thrown. There was only one corridor and one recreation ground, and the morals of the children were corrupted by requiring them to mix with able-bodied paupers, whose whole life had been spent in vice and immorality. It was impossible to keep the whole of the pauper inmates of a workhouse in the same building without some contamination; but in the Irish workhouses there was little or no classification at all. He had watched the matter himself and had inquired into it closely, and he was prepared to say that there was no real classification whatever. He was only talking the other day to the manager of one of the reformatory schools in Ireland. That gentleman spoke of the satisfaction and pleasure his work gave him, when he found that many of those who passed through his hands were brought to a better state of mind and became useful members of society; but he added, that of all the classes which came under his hand, the most difficult to deal with, or inspire with any sense of self-respect, were the pauper criminals. When the children were hired out to farmers for a month or two in the summer time they were lost sight of, and nobody seemed to care what became of them afterwards. The Local Government Board had given statistics to show the number of children who had been hired out to farmers in that manner; but there was no confidence to be placed in them. The children themselves were sent out recklessly—hired out for short periods to persons who had no interest in the children themselves, and who could not be expected to place them in such a position in life as would make provision for their future. The Vice President of the Local Government Board not long ago told a Royal Commission that out of 300 children sent out from the South Dublin Union 78 per cent did not return. The right hon. Baronet the Member for East Gloucestershire (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) asked the witness what reason he had for supposing that that 78 per cent of the children were doing well; and his only explanation was that as they did not turn up at the workhouse it might safely be presumed that they were going on all right. The right hon. Baronet asked if it were not equally possible that this 78 per cent, in regard to whose future such confident hopes were entertained, might be in prison; and this gentleman representing the Local Government Board, after having made a statement that 78 per cent turned out satisfactorily, was bound to confess that his whole reason for believing they had become good citizens was that he knew nothing whatever about them. That showed the extent to which the bigotry of officialism would descend in order to bolster up a bad system. He did not wish to press the Committee further. The House had been saved from an inflection from him on the same subject last year by a "Count-out." He had now had an opportunity of laying the matter before the Committee, and he trusted they would turn their attention to this great social question. He believed that so long as they required these poor people to be brought up in a common life with adult paupers the consequence would inevitably be that they would become criminals. What he wished and hoped was that, sooner or later, the Government would take up the question of the reform of the workhouse system in Ireland. If necessary, he trusted that a Royal Commission would be issued, so that they might get at the bottom of the Poor Law question. The feeling was very strong in Ireland that something ought to be done. They did not ask the Treasury for anything; but it was their own money which they proposed to spend in bettering the condition of these poor people. Surely they ought to be entrusted with the expenditure of their own money.

THE CHAIRMAN: Does the hon. Gentleman move the reduction of the Vote?

MR. MOORE: Yes; by the sum of £1,000.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

MR. KENNY admitted that the administration of the Irish workhouses was not satisfactory; but he could not altogether agree with the hon. Member in the charge of immorality which he had brought against the female inmates of workhouses. He was well aware that there were many young men in the workhouses whose moral character was not irreproachable; but the vast majority of the women in the workhouses were old women who were there through poverty, against whom no reasonable charge of immorality could be brought. The hon. Member had cited an instance of a Union in the North of Ireland—in the county of Tyrone; but he should be sorry to take that Union as a criterion, as it was well known that that was the most immoral part of the country. It must be borne in mind that these workhouses were the only refuges for women in Ireland who were forced to betake themselves to them for a time; and it was unfair to draw a conclusion of general immorality from a single instance. There was, however, another offence which was, to a great extent, perpetrated in connection with the Irish workhouses—namely, the practice of smuggling whisky into them. Friends who came to visit the pauper inmates constantly brought whisky with them. It was also a fact that many of the employés in the workhouses were persons of objectionable character; and, owing to the introduction of whisky, and a neglect of duty on the part of the officials, no doubt scenes of drunkenness did take place. He was glad to find that in the South of Ireland, at any rate, the introduction of nuns as nurses into the workhouses had caused a beneficent change in the morals of the inmates. It was a practice which could not be too highly recommended and too warmly advocated, and he urged upon all the Boards of Guardians in Ireland the desirability of securing the services of nuns as ordinary nurses. He had no doubt it would remove a good many of the very discreditable scandals which were not unfrequently brought to light in Ireland. A very important question had been raised by the hon. Member in regard to the manner in which the children in these workhouses were brought up; but although the teachers employed in the workhouse schools might not have received class certificates, he did not think that any serious charge of incapacity could be brought against them. He had seen a number of workhouse children in a variety of places who had been remarkably well educated as far as reading, writing, and arithmetic were concerned; but he complained of the absence of technical education. The children were taught to read and write, and so on; but the idea of teaching them a trade never appeared to enter the mind of the Local Government Board; and when they went from the workhouses the only employment they were fit for was that of farm servants. All the deserving boys went out as farm labourers; very few of them going into the cities, and the girls were either sent into the country as farm servants or into the towns as housemaids. He thought the workhouses in Ireland were institutions which afforded excellent facilities for the establishment of technical schools. If these young lads were taught trades which they could turn to account afterwards, it would go a long way towards defraying the expense of their maintenance in the workhouses, because they would be learnt how to occupy a very useful future life, instead of being consigned to the miserable fate of a farm servant until they could scrape some money together to take them away to America or one of the Colonies, there to be nothing more than hewers of wood and drawers of water. It was an undoubted fact that children who were brought up in the workhouses had a direct stigma attached to them. They were neglected by the Guardians, or by the Local Government Board, who really directed the actions of the Guardians.

Mr. Kenny

Their technical education was altogether neglected. They were taught nothing but to read and write, and nothing was left for them but the most menial occupations when they left the workhouse. He thought the subject of the technical education of the children in the Irish workhouses was really most important; and he was of opinion that the Government ought to take it in hand, and that the Chief Secretary, as President of the Irish Local Government Board, and those gentlemen who acted with him, should take into consideration some scheme for the technical education of these children which would give them a better chance of future success in life.

COLONEL COLTHURST said, he agreed with the last speaker as to the bad state of technical education; but he desired to express his opinion that a great deal could be done by the Guardians as the law now stood in Ireland. Where the law was at fault was in not empowering the Local Government Board to act where the Guardians would not act. It was very well known that the Guardians had power to board out the children, and boarding out had been found to be the best way of disposing of orphan and deserted children from the workhouses. But what were the facts of the case? In more than one-half of the Unions of Ireland the Guardians did not board out a single child; but they kept them in the workhouses in the state in which the hon. Member for Clonmel (Mr. Moore) had described. That was the fault of the Guardians, who had full power to board them out. He thought the hon. Member had misunderstood the evidence of the Vice President of the Local Government Board before the Commission of which he (Colonel Colthurst) was a Member. The evidence of Mr. Robinson was to this effect—that, as far as his experience went, where the boarding out system was practised the results were invariably good, and the children in many cases had been adopted by the families to which they were sent. He did not know any reason why the system should not be adopted in every Union in Ireland. As to industrial training, it was difficult to carry it out in the small Unions; but he saw no reason why there should not be Poor Law Schools in Ireland as well as in England, where the children could be collected and taught trades. In the large Union of North Dublin some years ago, a real attempt was made to give industrial training to the children; but the master—a man of great experience—told him himself that, in spite of all he did, he never wished to see a child placed in the workhouse. There could be no doubt that boarding out was the proper thing to do. It stood to reason that if they were boarded out among the people from whom they sprung, they would be restored to the condition which Providence intended them to occupy. He hoped his right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary would at least do what he could to give effect to some of the suggestions which had been made by the hon. Member for Clonmel. Among other things, he would ask the Government, when they dealt with the question of Union rating in Ireland next Session, to give effect to the recommendations of the Committee, so as to give unadulterated Union rating, and not the Union rating proposed in the Bill submitted to Parliament two years ago, in which the administration of outdoor relief was excluded from the operation of the Bill. If his right hon. Friend would give a satisfactory answer on that subject, he might spare him (Colonel Colthurst) the necessity of bringing forward a Motion which stood in his name for Friday.

COLONEL NOLAN expressed a hope that the Chief Secretary would answer the questions which had been brought before the Committee in the valuable speech of his hon. Friend the Member for Clonmel (Mr. Moore). He (Colonel Nolan) only proposed to discuss the workhouse system in connection with one particular point. Of course, his hon. Friend knew a good deal about the poor, having paid considerable attention to the subject, and having brought in two or three Bills to remedy the position of children in workhouses; but he thought that there had been one omission in all the speeches which had been delivered upon the question—namely, that no one had gone into the question of pounds, shillings, and pence. Special education and training for workhouse children, together with looking after them when they left the workhouse, would be a very excellent plan if they had unlimited funds to draw upon; and he believed his hon. Friend had brought in a Bill to make provision for deaf and dumb children, by which they were to be sent to institutions specially provided and paid for. No doubt they would be liberally treated and properly looked after there; but they would become extremely expensive to the Unions, and he hoped that in any scheme which might be put forward, and any pressure that might be placed upon the Chief Secretary, the question of the ratepayers would not be altogether neglected. At the present moment the rates were exceedingly heavy; and he had no desire to rush hastily into any project which would largely increase the rates. He thought that was a point which it was quite possible to reconcile with the good administration of the workhouse system. He did not think that many of these children would be better off if they had more opportunities for learning a trade. He did not agree with the hon. Member for Eunis (Mr. Kenny), or the hon. Member for Clonmel, that their employment as herds or farm labourers was bad work for these children. On the contrary, he thought it was proper work for them in the agricultural districts. The great bulk of the community in those districts had to herd stock, or attend to farming operations; and he did not see why these children should not be put out to the same occupation in an agricultural community. Certainly, they ought not to be made pets of, or put in a better position than the children of people who managed to keep out of the workhouse. During the last six or seven years, instead of increasing the industrial schools in Ireland, the Government had limited them. That was not the policy of the present Government alone, but in their action they had merely followed the policy of their Predecessors. Six or seven years ago it was announced that no contribution from the Treasury would be given except to certain existing schools; and the Government had carefully limited the contributions which they gave even to existing schools. He had himself applied for an industrial school in Clifden—at least, he had been made the medium of communication on several occasions between the district and the Government; but he was sorry to say that, although that district was very much in want of an industrial school for boys, the necessary assistance had been repeatedly refused by the Government. He thought if the Local Government Board would extend the system of industrial schools in Ireland, a great many of the objections which were now urged by different Members would be met. Not only might they extend the system, but it was also desirable that they should change the law. The law which at present existed was absolutely absurd. It was necessary that a child should commit some offence, even if it were only begging, before he could be sent to an industrial school; and it was perfectly well known that the solemn farce of committing a child for some trifling offence was frequently gone through in order to get him admitted into one of the existing industrial schools. He did not think it right that the committal of a crime should be a qualification for admission to an industrial school, and he regretted to say that it was exactly the same in regard to the lunatic asylums. Criminal lunatics were sent to the county asylums, but other lunatics were not; and perfectly harmless lunatics suffered in consequence. He was strongly of opinion that this foolish rule ought to be abolished. There was one point in which he differed from the hon. and gallant Member for the County of Cork. (Colonel Colthurst)—namely, that the Local Government Board should have power, in an ordinary case, to override the decision of the Guardians. Of course, if there was a case in which religious prejudices had been allowed to operate, or a pauper had been unfairly treated in regard to his religion, the Local Government Board should have power to demand explanations, and even to override the decision of the Guardians. But for the decisions of a Board of Guardians, who, as a general rule, looked after the finance of a district, to be overridden by the Local Government Board, sitting at a great distance from the Union, was absurd, and would be so great a reflection upon the Guardians, that he hoped no Government would adopt the suggestion. There was another point in which he should like to receive an explanation from the Chief Secretary, and it had reference to the possibility of Ireland being visited by cholera. He trusted that precautions would be taken to prevent the spread of disease, and he hoped Parliament would not be allowed to break up before hon.

Colonel Nolan

Members were told exactly what was intended to be done in Ireland. Had the Local Government Board any policy in regard to the rural workhouses? Did they intend that the cholera patients should go into the workhouse hospitals, or be placed in detached hospitals? He was in favour himself of having them placed in detached hospitals as far as possible. He believed that in many cases it would be a good policy to erect temporary huts at a distance from the Union Workhouse, and such temporary huts could be so arranged as to prevent the affection from being communicated through bad water or otherwise, and thus of reducing the chance of the disease spreading to a minimum. He should be glad to know from the Chief Secretary what it was intended to do with the hospital question? What he was afraid might happen was this—that if the cholera visited Ireland, many clever letters and minutes might be written with the object of throwing the responsibility upon the Guardians, and of avoiding the responsibility themselves. He did not care who was responsible—whether the Local Government Board or the Guardians—but his idea was that if the cholera came into the country it must be met by some Central Body, who would be in a position to obtain every kind of knowledge and information, and the Local Government Board would certainly be the best Body for such a purpose. What he would propose to the Local Government Board, in reference to the rural districts, was that they should have one or two temporary hospitals. He would not say what kind of hospitals; but they ought to be cheaply erected, as the expense would be a serious matter for consideration. The merest hut would be quite sufficient. He thought a model ought to be erected at some central station in Dublin, and that some mechanic should be told off, who knew how to put the buildings up. There were more than 160 Unions in Ireland, and if they were required to go to the expense of erecting temporary hospitals, probably nothing might be done by the time the emergency arose. What he asked was a very simple matter, which would cost the Government very little. The cholera might not visit Ireland after all; but if it came a little nearer, he hoped the Government would make some arrangement of that kind; and, therefore, he trusted that the Chief Secretary would answer the question he had put.

MR. H. H. FOWLER wished to put a question or two in regard to this Vote; but before he did so he would express his regret that the hon. Member for Clonmel (Mr. Moore) had moved the reduction of the Vote before they had exhausted the discussion on the subject introduced by the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton). He thought the feeling on that side of the House was that his right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary should withdraw the Vote for the present; and if it was impossible to do so, that the discussion would be allowed to go on fairly upon its merits, so that the Irish Members should retain their control over the very unpleasant issue which had been raised. He was sure his right hon. Friend would not misunderstand him. He did not put it as a question of confidence in the Irish Executive. He thought there was no man in that House who had the slightest doubt that the Chief Secretary was actuated in all these things by the highest and most advanced standard of official honour, and any decision arrived at by him would command the confidence of the House. But he wanted to tell his right hon. Friend—he did not know whether his right hon. Friend was aware of it—that there was growing up in the House, as well as in other quarters, a distrust of the permanent Irish Executive; and he should be sorry that any question should arise which should put hon. Members in conflict with the right hon. Gentleman himself, or with Lord Spencer. He thought the time was arriving when the action of the permanent Irish Executive would be exposed to the very serious criticism, not only of the House, but of the country. Let him take the case they had heard to-night. He knew nothing whatever of the case; but here was a man charged with defalcation—in England they would call it embezzlement. Whether the man was guilty or not he did not know—he knew nothing about the facts of the case—but he was charged with having appropriated the public money, from time to time, during a period which extended over a series of years. When the fraud was found out, the deficiency amounted to between £2,000 and £3,000; and a certain body of Commissioners in Ireland, adopting a course of action which, in England, would be regarded as compounding a felony, still retained the services of the defaulter, and proceeded to realize his assets. No prolonged discussion of the matter was needed. By return of post it would be known—aye or no—whether this collector had those rates or had paid them to the authorities, or whether he was short in his accounts; and if he had retained them for 48 hours beyond the proper time, he ought not to be allowed to remain in the Public Service. He would say no more than to suggest that the right hon. Gentleman should postpone the Report on the Vote until the decision of the Government could be made known, so that not only the Irish, but the English Members, might have a full discussion if they were not satisfied. He desired now to ask for a few items of information as to what he might call the extraordinary amount of this Vote. He could not help contrasting the Irish Local Government Board with the Local Government Board in England. The English Local Government Board had to deal with 25,000,000 of people; the Irish Local Government Board with 5,000,000. In England the highest official, after the President—who was a Cabinet Minister—was a Permanent Secretary, at £1,500 a-year; but in Ireland there was a Vice President with £2,000, a Medical Commissioner with £1,200, another Commissioner with £1,200, a Secretary with £500, and an Assistant Secretary with £600. The difference between the cost of the permanent staff in England and Ireland was almost inappreciable, although the amount of the work done in England was at least three times as much. The time had arrived when attention should be called to the growing extravagance of the Irish Administration in all its parts. He would now take another point. In Ireland there were 14 Inspectors, while in England there were 23; but look at the disproportion in the amounts about to be voted for the personal and travelling expenses of these gentlemen. In England 23 Inspectors took £4,698 as their expenses, while 14 Inspectors in Ireland required £4,020. Then, if he came to the salaries of the Medical Inspectors, in England 3,520 Medical Officers cost £143,000, while 1,064 Medical Officers, or about one-third in Ireland, cost £74,000. The same thing prevailed through all these Irish Votes; and, in his opinion, the whole Irish Administration was economically and financially, but he hoped not morally, in an unsatisfactory state.

MR. MOORE protested against the statement of the hon. Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. H. H. Fowler) that he had stepped in between the Committee and the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton). He thought nobody could have gone further than he did, seeing that on three occasions he had broken off his speech and discontinued his statement, in order to allow hon. Members an opportunity of going on with the previous subject. Even when his hon. Friend the Member for Galway (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) made a last appeal to the Chief Secretary to postpone the Vote, he positively waited in his seat for a reply. The complaint, therefore, of the hon. Member for Wolverhampton had no foundation whatever.

MR. SEXTON said, that the moment the reduction of the Vote was moved all chance of the withdrawal of it was put aside. He wished to thank the hon. Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. H. H. Fowler) for the frank and effective speech he had delivered. In a few words he had applied the common sense of an English Member to the narrative he (Mr. Sexton) had given to the House, and he had swept away the cobwebs with which the Chief Secretary sought to cover the case of Mr. Elliott. He hoped the suggestion of the hon. Member would be adopted, and that the Report of the Vote would be postponed until the decision of the Local Government Board was made known. In the meantime he hoped the Chief Secretary would rigidly insist upon the principle he had laid down being carried out—namely, that the Executive should suffer no further delay to take place in eliciting the real facts of the case; and if they found that this officer had appropriated the money of the public that they would remove him at once from the public service. So far the case rested entirely with the right hon. Gentleman. He quite agreed with the several speakers who had recently addressed the Committee as to the neglect of the industrial training of children in the Irish workhouse schools. Indeed, industrial training was neglected in all the primary schools in Ireland, although there was no country where it was so much required. It was of no use to depend upon those whose duty it was to provide the rates, because a good many of them were in very little better condition than the paupers themselves. No matter how urgent the need for reform, they must always consider it as an equation they had to deal with; and however desirous they were of improving the administration of the Poor Law they must take care that the financial burden was not made too heavy a load for the ratepayers to bear. There was another matter in relation to the management of workhouses, to which he wished to call attention. He referred to the decency of religious worship, and the religious training of the young. He had more knowledge of the South of Ireland than the North; and in his opinion, where the Catholics had a controlling power on the Boards, the interests of the Protestant minority were wisely and generously cared for; but in the North of Ireland, where the Catholics on the Boards were in a helpless minority, the treatment given to Catholic adults and children was far different. In the case of the Newtownards Workhouse, there was a Protestant chaplain, and the Protestant and Presbyterian inmates had religious instruction and worship provided for them. But there was no Catholic chaplain, and the consequence was that the children were put out of the school into a yard while religious instruction was given to the rest; and at night in the dormitories, when the Protestant and Presbyterian children were going through their prayers, the Catholic children were locked outside the door until the operation was over. It often happened that, on leaving the workhouse, the children were placed with Protestant masters, the result of which was the complete uprooting of their religious faith. He submitted that the Local Government Board ought to apply themselves to this question of providing for the religious instruction of youth and the common decencies of religious worship. In the same Board, although the Rubric of the Catholic religion required decent order for the celebration of Mass, the base economy of the Board was such that the priest was obliged to celebrate it with an old table furnished up as an altar. The Local Government Board had power, if they were inclined to exercise

it, to provide for religious worship in the workhouse schools and for the decent religious instruction of the young. He wished, next, to say a word as to the action of the Local Government Board in dealing with contested elections under the Poor Law. At a contested election at Drumcliff, in the county of Sligo, it was reported to the Board that the candidate who obtained the largest number of votes, in defiance of the law, went to the houses of two of the voters and took possession of the voting papers which had been left by the police, which he kept in his possession for 24 hours. It was an illegal act for which the law provided a penalty. The right hon. Gentleman told the House that because the gentleman in question had a majority of votes sufficient to seat him on the Board of Guardians the Local Government Board had not interfered. No matter how great the majority was which that candidate obtained, he ought not to have been allowed to sit on the Board, as he had committed an illegal act, for which the Local Government Board ought to have prosecuted him. It was no answer to say that the defeated candidate could have brought an action against him. The Department charged with the conduct of the election was the Department which ought to have taken the initiative. He asked the right hon. Gentleman upon what ground of common sense he justified the action of the Local Government Board in refusing to interfere, and in refraining from exacting the full penalty for such an offence? In the case of another contested election, it was proved at the inquiry held by the Inspector that forged proxy papers were issued. The Returning Officer distinctly reported that forged papers were sent in to him, and there had been needless delay in reporting upon it. Before the debate closed, he hoped the Chief Secretary would explain whether the Local Government Board were exercising their powers in finding out how the proxy papers came to be forged, so that the forger, whoever he might have been, might be prosecuted and punished. Turning next to the Gweedore evictions, he wished to point out that 200 men, women, and children had been recently evicted on the estate of Mr. Wybrant Olpherts, in some cases for one, and in others for two years' rent, and were allowed to lie in the ditches for three days and three nights; and although he was contradicted in that House, he had the authority of the parish priest for saying that it was not until the fifth day that the relieving officer came with some vehicles to take the unfortunate people to the workhouse. For the purpose of embarrassing the tenants, the landlord took his proceedings in one of the Superior Courts, and by so doing materially added to the amounts due. The same relieving officer filled the double office of relieving officer and gombeen man, or seller of meal, exacting from the poor people who were driven to the verge of ruin the highest rates. He would like to know whether that was a combination of officers that the Local Government Board were prepared to tolerate; and whether the man who supplied the people with meal at excessive rates should be the same man who was to represent a public Department in relieving them the moment they were turned out-of-doors? The law allowed six months for redemption. These poor people had crops in the land from which they were evicted, and their only hope lay in selling those crops and redeeming their holdings within the statutory six months, by scraping enough together to satisfy the demands of the landlord. In order to watch the crops which were growing in the ground it was necessary that some member of the family should be left on the spot. The Legislature allowed that the persons evicted might get four weeks' outdoor relief; but the evicting landlord, being also Chairman of the Dunfanaghy Board of Guardians, refused to accept a motion to that effect. The Board refused, in the first place, to give any outdoor relief, and even went farther, and decided that no wife should be admitted to the workhouse unless her husband was admitted also, thereby preventing the poor men from taking care of their holdings during the period when they might be redeemed. The law said that the husband might remain outside for the purpose of watching the farm, and seeing that the crops were not destroyed; but the Board of Guardians made themselves the instruments of the tyrannical will of the landlord, and said the husband must come in also, and leave the farm unattended, or the wife and children would be turned out on the roadside to starve. What happened?

When a motion was made to give four weeks' relief to these unfortunate people, Mr. Wybrant Olpherts, this evicting landlord, taking advantage of some quibble which the right hon. Gentleman had endeavoured to explain, ruled that the motion could not be put. He accused the Local Government Board of being supine and neglectful in the discharge of their duties. He contended that when the poor people in Ireland, driven to despair and penury, were unable to meet their engagements, by reason of oppressive rents, the least the Local Government Board could do was to compel their own officials to act impartially, and neither allow the gombeen man to be the relieving officer, or the evicting landlord to preside at the Board of Guardians, with power to refuse the dole which the Guardians were willing to give.

Mr. T. P. O'CONNOR concurred with his hon. Friend the Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) in thanking the hon. Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. H. H. Fowler) for adding to the charge they had made against this Department regarding Mr. Elliott the force of his deserved reputation in the House. He had risen now, however, upon another point, as he presumed it would be convenient for the Chief Secretary to reply upon every question that might be submitted to him. He hoped, when the right hon. Gentleman came to deal with the case of Mr. Elliott, that he would be able to give assurances that it would be dealt with not only justly, but promptly. The subject to which he desired to call the attention of the Committee was the working of the Labourers' Act of last year. A Committee was at present engaged in investigating the operation of that Act; and although it had only sat for one day, and there were only two witnesses examined, and those two witnesses officials of the Department—its Vice President and Legal Adviser—the evidence given established every demand which had been made for the amendment of the Act. Their claims that the matter should be promptly dealt with, and dealt with at the Autumn Session, were irresistible, after the evidence given before the Select Committee. They had the broad fact admitted that, while a labourer could only be expected to pay 1s. a-week, or £2 12s. for his house and plot, that house and plot would cost the Guardians £100, or £5 7s. 6d. a-year.

Mr. Sexton

Thus they had the astonishing fact that these cottages could only be built for the labourer on the condition that the ratapayers of the district paid more than half the sum annually which they had cost. What had been the result? A question was asked in the Committee that day, not by an Irish Member, but by the hon. Member for Peterborough (Mr. S. Buxton), which showed a startling result. Evidence had been given by the Vice President of the Local Government Board that the Act had been confined in its operation to the two Provinces of Leinster and Munster, and there had not been a single attempt in the Province of Connaught to carry out the provisions of the Act, nor in the Province of Ulster. The hon. Member who put the question naturally remarked that it had been stated in evidence that the labourers of Connaught were in a much worse plight than in any other Province, and the reply was, "Certainly." Therefore, the only deduction to be made from the facts was that this Act for the relief of the labourers had not once been carried out in the Province in which it was most required. He believed that the representation he made would be corroborated by every Member of the Committee.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. CHILDERS) rose to Order. It was not in Order to discuss the evidence given before a Committee that had not yet reported.

THE CHAIRMAN: That is so. Such a discussion is out of Order. If the Committee has not reported, the hon. Member is not entitled to refer to the evidence before it.

Mr. T. P. O'CONNOR said, he was sorry that the right hon. Gentlemen the Chancellor of the Exchequer should have felt it his duty to stand upon a technical point as to the propriety of bringing these facts before the Committee. He had been simply anxious to point out one or two facts with regard to the position of the labourers in Ireland upon which the operation of the Labourers' Act could be discussed. He was also anxious to discuss the subject on the present occasion, which was probably the only opportunity that would present itself. He had no wish to add to the already heavy burdens on the shoulders of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland; and, considering the time that this discussion would occupy, he should certainly not exceed the limits of propriety. In accordance with the ruling of the Chairman, he should not, of course, refer to the evidence given before the Committee, but would merely put the Committee in possession of facts which were matters of notoriety. It was perfectly well known that as long as the Government continued to charge this high rate of interest the Labourers' Act would be a dead letter. He would submit this point to the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary.

MR. NEWDEGATE rose to Order. It had always been considered contrary to the courtesy due to a Committee of that House that a subject should be taken out of their hands and made a matter for discussion in that House before the Committee had reported. It was a rule of courtesy which the House had always observed during the many years he had occupied a position in the House, and he hoped it would continue.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, there was scarcely anything he would not do for the hon. Member who had just spoken, except vote for a Motion which he had dropped for some years. He would reserve the observations he was about to make until the Committee had reported; but he would ask the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland to put the Committee in possession of facts that were within his knowledge, and to controvert his statements if he found them to be incorrect. He would ask the right hon. Gentleman whether it was not a fact that, up to the present, not a single house had been built under the Labourers' Act of last year? He asserted that this was the case, and that, perhaps, very good reasons could be given for it. He also asked him to controvert this statement—that a large number of the Unions in Ireland refused to carry that Act into operation, because they considered that the expense of doing so would be excessive; and he would further ask him to state whether or not it was correct that a large number of the Unions which had carried their schemes so far as to have obtained the signature of the Local Government Board and the sanction of both Houses of Parliament—whether he was not strongly of opinion that a large number of Boards of Guardians, although they had carried the matter to the final stage, would not go to the expense of putting their schemes into operation? As a matter of fact, the Boards of Guardians shrank, owing to the excessive cost imposed by the Government, from applying for money to carry out a work which had been sanctioned by both Houses of Parliament, and the consequence was that a large number of houses would not be built which would have been built had the rate of interest been less. What did that mean? It meant that the 12 months which had elapsed since the Labourers' Act was passed had been to a large extent wasted, and that another 12 months would be wasted likewise, because, as the hon. and gallant Member for the County of Cork (Colonel Colthurst) would know, with regard to the practical operation of the Act, that notices under the existing law must be published in the months of September, October, and November. The initiatory step was to publish the notices in those months, and unless those notices were so published no further steps could be taken with regard to the erection of cottages, not only with respect to this year, but also with respect to next year. But was it not a fact that the Chief Secretary could not controvert the statement which he (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) made most positively—namely, that all the probabilities pointed out that not a single Board of Guardians in Ireland would publish any notice during the months of September, October, and November, and that all the facts pointed to not a single cottage being built, either this year or the next, in consequence of such notices not being given? The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary knew the cause as well as he (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) did. The cause was that the people of Ireland could not imagine that the Treasury would be so extortionate, or that the Treasury would be so foolish, as to charge a rate of interest which practically prevented the carrying out of an Act upon the necessity of which all parties were agreed. That being so, the people of Ireland expected further legislation; they had a right to expect it, and it was the expectation of that legislation which suspended and paralyzed the operation of the Act. He could assure the Committee that if new legislation was not brought in the Act would practically remain a dead letter. Owing to circumstances which he dared not allude to, a great and extraordinary opportunity had occurred to Her Majesty's Government of giving that prompt legislation which was necessary for the carrying out of the Act. If Her Majesty's Government were to bring in an amending Bill during the Autumn Session, which had been promised, to deal with points on which there was unanimity of opinion, he felt sure the Bill would pass through the House without any opposition, and that it would become law in time for the different Boards of Guardians throughout the country to carry out the Act this year. Finally, he most earnestly urged the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland to take the matter into his favourable consideration, so that the Boards of Guardians might proceed with their work; and, still more, that the labourers who, at the end of the Autumn Session, would, in all probability, be added to the political forces of the country, should feel that their grievances had impressed themselves on the mind of the Government, and that the Autumn Session would bring them practical relief.

COLONEL NOLAN said, he should only detain the Committee for a few moments while he made some remarks upon a single point. The hon. Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. H. H. Fowler) in the course of his speech had made one observation with reference to a part of this Vote, which he (Colonel Nolan) was unable to agree with, and which he thought required an answer. The hon. Member for Wolverhampton had spoken of that portion of the Vote which related to the Medical Department as being too high, as compared with the amount expended in England under the same head. He thought, however, that the hon. Member had been led into a mistake, so far as this item was concerned, by the difference in the manner in which the Votes of the two countries were framed. As a matter of fact they were drawn up quite differently. The items of the medical portion of the Vote relating to Ireland were drawn up under one or two heads, whereas in the English Vote they were spread out under several heads, and it was that circumstance which he believed had misled the hon. Gentleman. If hon. Members would look at the Irish Vote it would be seen that the total amount for medical purposes was £96,400; and if they took the English Vote, including registration, it was £33,854. He did not know why it was, but the medical expenditure under the same Vote was £143,500.

MR. H. H. FOWLER said, he had not alluded to the Medical Vote at all. He had referred to the salaries of the Medical Officers, cost of drugs, &c., and compared them with the corresponding items in the English Vote.

COLONEL NOLAN said, he still thought the hon. Gentleman had fallen into an error, because the Irish Vote undoubtedly included a number of extraneous items. There was, for instance, to be taken into account the expenditure on public vaccination, and travelling expenses in connection with the Medical Department, which were not charged in the same way in the English Estimates. The only fair mode of comparison was to add up all the English medical items and all the Irish medical items and then consider the balance; to deal with them in any other way would only lead to needless dispute. The hon. Member would find he was correct in stating that the whole of the Irish medical items were £96,000, and that the whole of the English medical items amounted to £33,854, adding, as he had before mentioned, the registration charge, which it was only fair to include. The proportion was, therefore, as three to one between the Irish and English Votes. It might be said that the Irish population was one-third of the English population; but he thought that the Medical Service of a country should be to a certain extent regulated by area, and that it should not rest upon population alone. There was another consideration to be kept in view in comparing the Medical Votes of England and Ireland. Ireland was the poorer country of the two, and amongst the reasons why she was poor was the fact that almost all the great public establishments, the prisons, dockyards—in fact, most of the good things out of which the people could earn money—were in England. Finally, although in respect of this Vote he would allow that prima facie the Irish people were better off than the English people, yet, for the reasons he had advanced, he contended that they enjoyed no undue superiority.

COLONEL COLTHURST said, the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) had called the attention of the right hon. Gentleman and the Committee to a very important point in connection with the Catholic children in one of the Northern Irish Unions. He might also mention another Union in which the Board of Guardians had persistently refused, up to within the last few weeks, to do their duty in this respect. He rose for the purpose of saying that if these things occurred in the various Unions it showed the necessity of giving some power to the Local Government Board to deal with matters of this kind. He thought his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Galway (Colonel Nolan) was not quite fair in his strictures on what he (Colonel Colthurst) had said on the subject. He did not say that the Local Government Board were to over-ride the Boards of Guardians either in England or in Ireland; but he did think that some Central Body should have the power of redressing the grievances of any helpless class of people who had not the means of redressing those grievances themselves. He thought that the Local Government Board should have the power to compel the Boards of Guardians to bring up Catholic children in the manner desired; and he had always regretted that his right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary did not use the power which he undoubtedly possessed in the direction indicated. If the right hon. Gentleman were to supersede Guardians who did not do justice to the Catholic children in the workhouses, he believed that it would have the effect of remedying the evil complained of, and that the power would only have to be exercised once or twice.

MR. DEASY said, he quite agreed with the hon. and gallant Member for the County of Cork (Colonel Colthurst) that it was desirable that the Local Government Board should possess the powers necessary to compel Boards of Guardians to do their duty with respect to Catholic children in workhouses. There were several Boards of Guardians in Ireland who were not disposed to act properly towards the poor; and it was a fact that those Boards of Guardians were mainly composed of persons belonging to the class who were against the people—that was to say, they were mainly composed of landlords and agents. It would be well, under such circumstances, that the Local Government Board should use its powers impartially, and that, if the powers which they at present possessed were found to be insufficient for the object in view, further powers should be given. He maintained, however, that at present the balance of opinion in Ireland was that the Local Government Board exercised the powers vested in them in an arbitrary and despotic manner, and unduly hampered Boards of Guardians in the discharge of their duties. He was of that opinion himself; it was the result of his own experience, because, when he was a Poor Law Guardian, he had often been involved in controversies with the Local Government Board, who were constantly interfering with and overthrowing the work of the Nationalist Guardians. If the Guardians wanted to change their rules, the Local Government Board was sure to send down an order to prevent their doing so. The case of the Cork Board of Guardians, he believed, had engaged the attention of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland. On a recent occasion a matter of importance was brought before that Board, and it was proposed by the Guardians to institute a necessary reform in connection with the administration of out-door relief. It had been found that the question of out-door relief was becoming very important, and more pressing year by year, and that it was impossible, under the system in force in Ireland, to keep anything like an adequate check upon the relieving officer. The amount of out-door relief in the Cork Union was increasing at the rate of £2,000 or £3,000 a-year, which so alarmed the Guardians that they appointed a small Committee to consider the matter and report to the Board the advisability of altering the existing arrangement. He remembered that, after many days of labour, the Committee brought in an important Report which was submitted to the Board, and adopted by them unanimously after two days' consideration. The Local Government Board were then asked to give their sanction to the recommendation of the Committee; but they refused to do so, without giving any adequate reason.

Memorials were addressed to them asking them to reconsider their decision in the interest of the ratepayers; but they refused to agree to the proposal. He said that the Local Government Board unduly exercised their powers on the occasion he had referred to. There were several other cases of a similar character which he might draw attention to; but he would abstain from so doing, because he had no desire unnecessarily to prolong the present discussion. With regard to the industrial training of children in workhouses, which the hon. and gallant Member for Cork County had just alluded to, the question was perhaps of more importance than any which could be brought before the attention of the Committee on that Vote. Unquestionably, it was impossible to train these children properly in the workhouses, the Guardians having no facilities for giving them an industrial education, because there was no power to compel pauper children in Ireland to learn any particular trade. Even if a boy were put to a trade in an Irish workhouse, and he desired at the end of a week or a fortnight to give it up and lead a life of idleness, the Board of Guardians had no power to make him go to work; they were obliged to let him have his own way, and the result was that the boy grew up to become a burden on the community. He believed, then, that if increased powers were given to the Boards of Guardians in Ireland, the desire of the hon. Member for Clonmel (Mr. Moore) would be met, and a large number of boys taught to earn their living. In that way the able-bodied men, whom, under the existing system, it was impossible to keep out of the workhouses, would no longer be found seeking admission. If those men had, in their childhood, been sent to some school altogether removed from the evil influences of the workhouses, he believed they would have become useful members of society instead of what they were, merely burdens on the ratepayers. Unfortunately, the people he was speaking of constituted a very large class, of whom it might be said that, whenever they were not in the workhouse, they were in gaol; and he believed that until Parliament gave facilities to board out children, or to purchase and endow schools for the industrial training of pauper children, this unfortunate state of things would continue. There was another matter to which he should like to call the attention of the Committee, and that was the position of able-bodied women in the workhouses in Ireland. The Guardians had it in their power to separate fallen and abandoned women from those who were innocent and virtuous, and this was done in a number of workhouses, although it was neglected in others. Now, he said there was no reason why the Local Government Board should not insist upon the Boards of Guardians throughout the country carrying out the rule of separation; and he believed that if it were done it would at once put a stop to the demoralization amongst women which went on in certain workhouses in Ireland. He complained that the Local Government Board exercised their powers in a manner which was not conducive to the interests of the ratepayers, and which did not lead to the Boards of Guardians having any confidence in the Local Government Board. Let the Committee consider a case in connection with the Kinsale Workhouse which occurred a short time ago. It was proposed that nuns should be introduced into the workhouse for the purpose of taking charge of the hospital, and a resolution was unanimously carried by the Board of Guardians to that effect; but the Local Government Board refused to sanction the arrangement unless a separate building was erected for their accommodation outside the workhouse; though there was ample room within the building, as would be seen when he stated that the Kinsale Workhouse was built for 600 inmates and only contained 120 at present. He would like to know why one rule was made for the workhouse he was referring to, and another rule for the workhouse at Cork, where the nuns had been admitted and had given satisfaction to everyone? It was clear that the Local Government Board had no reason but an imaginary one for refusing to admit the nuns in the first case he had mentioned. He had had some experience himself of the powers of the Local Government Board; and he thought that the way in which they performed their duties generally, with regard to the Poor Law, was extremely objectionable. Further, he contended that some rules should be laid down both for the guidance of the Department, of Boards of Guardians, and of the Auditors. When some of the best men in the land were thrown into prison on suspicion by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster), at that time Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, it was found necessary in some cases to relieve the families of many of those men; and resolutions were passed in the usual manner, at several Boards, authorizing the Guardians to give 15s. or £1 a-week for that purpose. The Local Government Board had those resolutions before them; they never made any objection to them; they did not object to the amount of money voted, nor did they give the Guardians the slightest intimation that they were likely to be surcharged for any portion of the item of relief in question. But when the auditing of the accounts had taken place, the Guardians unexpectedly found themselves surcharged to a very considerable amount. In Cork Union the sum was not very large; but in Middleton Union the Chairman was surcharged to the amount of £44. A resolution was sent to the Local Government Board, asking that the influence of the Department might be used with the Auditors to have the surcharge remitted; but the Local Government Board answered that it was not in their power to influence the Auditor. He (Mr. Deasy) was surcharged for a small sum himself. He believed, then, that they had no influence with the Auditor; if he had known at first as much as he knew then, he would have allowed the Sheriff to proceed against him for the recovery of the money claimed. When all the Poor Law Guardians had paid the amount with which they had been surcharged, on account of the families of "suspects," the Local Government Board thought it expedient to exercise that power which before they had disclaimed, and they actually induced the Auditors not to surcharge certain gentlemen belonging to the Orange Society on account of other matters. What had occurred in Cork Union was a case in point. A gentleman, a member of the Orange Lodge and well known to the hon. and gallant Member for the County of Cork (Colonel Colthurst), was surcharged for having given relief to persons who were not legally entitled to receive it; he knew at the time he gave the relief that it was given illegally; he knew that it was distinctly laid down as unlawful, and that the Auditors could surcharge him with the amounts. But the Local Government Board having interfered in his behalf, the surcharge was not enforced. Their action in reference to that affair showed that the statement that they had no control over the Auditor was not true. He would give another instance in support of his argument. Three Governors of the Cork District Lunatic Asylum were surcharged £33 by the Government Auditor, which they refused to pay; and, although the Middleton magistrates gave a decree for the amount, the surcharge was not enforced. Those gentlemen were, of course, Orangemen. He ventured to say that the Local Government Board would do well to lay down some rule for the guidance of Boards of Guardians in the administration of the rates, so that they might know when they were acting legally or otherwise. It was monstrous that the Local Government Board, which had the resolution of the Board of Guardians in question before them week after week, should have left those Guardians to act in an illegal manner, without informing them of the fact. If they had had any notion that the relief they were giving was illegal they would have adopted some other means; but the Local Government Board gave them not the slightest intimation that their action was illegal. There was another matter of great importance, and that was the way in which the pauper lunatics were treated in the lunatic wards in the workhouses in Ireland. He did not think any question more important, because of the helplessness of these people, could occupy the attention of the House. Harmless lunatics were invariably sent to the workhouses, and there was practically no provision made for them. There was a kind of classification; but it was not at all what it ought to be. The nurses knew nothing about the treatment of such people, and there were no doctors whose profession it was to attend them; and, on the whole, the chances of their recovery in these workhouse wards, to say nothing of comfort for them, were hopeless. In 1879, a Report was presented by, he believed, a Select Committee appointed by the late Conservative Government, which recommended that certain workhouses in certain districts should be set aside altogether for the treatment of these unfortunate people. There was no reason why that recommendation should not be carried out, because the workhouses in some parts of the country—Kinsale, for instance—were not filled to one-seventh, or even one-tenth of their capacity. If that plan was adopted, these poor people would be treated properly, and he had no doubt there would more cases of recovery than otherwise. It was one of the most disgraceful things conceivable that these people should not be properly treated, but should be huddled together with no proper provision being made for their treatment. This was a matter which he would ask the Chief Secretary to consider, for it was really one of great importance. He did not wish to say anything on the subject raised by the hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Colonel Nolan) as to cholera patients, except that it was of great importance that hospitals should be provided for them. In the City of Cork there was a hospital set aside for cholera patients should an epidemic break out; but that was not the case in Bandon and other places in the county, and should there be an epidemic in Ireland, no provision having been made for the treatment of the patients, results of a serious nature would follow. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would consider the few points he had ventured to place before the Committee, and particularly that with regard to the pauper lunatics. There were several other matters to which he would not now advert; but he could not avoid reference to the appointment of Inspectors under the Explosives Acts. The Boards of Guardians had to pay these Inspectors; but the Inspectors were appointed by the magistrates of Petty Sessions, who got one of their own friends to apply for the office, then appointed him, and no sooner was he appointed than they raised his salary; but the Guardians had to pay; and, should they refuse to do so, all the magistrates had to do was to make an order on the Treasurer of the Union, who should regard such an order as a first charge on the balance to the credit of the Guardians, and if there was no balance at the time the order was presented, he was bound to pay it out of the first monies received by him. He referred to this matter, because much irritation had been caused to the Cork Guardians by the manner in which these Inspectors had been appointed, and their salaries increased. They knew that this had been done in the interests of a class; and if the Local Government Board permitted the injustice to continue, they would forfeit altogether what little confidence the Irish people had in them. He did not wish it to be understood that he objected to the Local Government Board as a Central Controlling Authority. It was absolutely necessary to have some such Central Authority; but what he did object to was that in the last three or four years, particularly in Unions where Nationalist Guardians held the balance of power, the Local Government Board had increased their authority in an objectionable manner. He hoped the Government would lay down some rule which would check the action of the Department; if they did, they would find that the Boards of Guardians throughout the Southern counties, and particularly if the Election of Guardians Bill then before the House was passed, would do their duty fairly.

Mr. TREVELYAN said, the remarks of the hon. Member (Mr. Deasy) were very interesting in several particulars, and not the least to him in the sentence with which the hon. Member concluded. Standing on the threshold of the discussion of this Bill, to which some little time had been devoted, he must earnestly express the hope that it would become an Act that Session; because if it did, not only would great benefits be conferred on the Irish people, but some of the most critical and intricate controversies to which allusion had been made would be closed once and for ever. The hon. Member had discussed at some length the questions started by other hon. Gentlemen; but towards the end of his speech he referred to the position of the Explosives Acts, and to the inefficient manner in which they were carried out. It was impossible for him to come provided with papers and statistics for all these points, and he had no time to inform himself as the discussion went on; but upon this point he remembered that the Local Government Board had considerable powers, and that complaints had frequently been made—in private, he must say—of the expensive character of the Inspectors under the Explosives Acts. He should be glad to receive hints from hon. Gentlemen, and to confer with them either in private or in public; but the direction which recommendations lately made to him had taken was the control of the police in this matter. Whether that was the view of the hon. Member he should be curious to learn; but there were many hon. Members who were inclined to think it would, perhaps, be the most economical and the most efficient system. The hon. Member for Clonmel (Mr. Moore), touching point after point which were afterwards filled in by the hon. and gallant Member for Cork County (Colonel Colthurst), argued against the present workhouse system, which he thought was too favourable to those persons who he considered ought not to be in workhouses at all, but should be supporting themselves by their own labour, and which, on the other hand, bore too hardly upon people who ought to be in the workhouses at the public expense. Idlers, he said, were allowed to frequent the workhouses; and, on the other hand, others who ought to be supported by the public on account of their infirmities were neglected. He could not, however, but think that the arrangements made were not far off the mark, and the proper mediums had been struck. The main principle upon which these workhouses were conducted, and the arrangement drawn up was, that idlers who could support themselves by sound labour should be deterred from applying for relief to the workhouses by the restrictions imposed. These restrictions must be uniform. If there was to be a real test of whether a person should or should not be supported by the public, it must be a uniform test; and a uniform test would always admit some persons who ought not to be admitted, and, at the same time, perhaps, bear a little hard on others who deserved better treatment; but he thought it was not yet proved that the workhouses of Ireland, any more than those of England, encouraged a great number of idlers to throw themselves on the public charge; or, on the other hand, that the personal discomforts and vexations of being supported in the workhouses were of such a character as to bear hardly on persons who were pauper inmates. The hon. Member referred to the lunatic wards, and in that respect undoubtedly it would be well if some remedy could be applied. It was a most painful sight to see these unfortunate people collected in small bodies—with the air of depression which such persons usually bore—where they were a small isolated section of the larger body, the great majority of whom were sane. The lunatics were few, and were probably in the charge of persons who were not professionally acquainted with the manner in which they ought to be treated, and their condition was certainly hopeless and distressing. With regard to the pauper children, the same remarks applied, and, to a certain extent, in many cases, must apply necessarily, and in this case it was yet more painful. It was a sad sight to see 8 or 10, or 15, or 20 poor little children being taught with few of those appliances which could be obtained in larger establishments. Their number, and the distressing character of their condition were, no doubt, painful. In this case, and in the case of the lunatics, it would be better if they could in the one case adopt the English system, and have large workhouse schools; while in the case of the lunatics it was well worth considering whether they could be congregated in a central workhouse. But it must be allowed that in all these cases the consideration came in that the contributions of the Treasury were rigorously applied, and that every alteration of system in the direction of a more pleasant life, and more efficient training, and more healthy maintenance was liable to cost money, and they must be very careful that in their desire to obey the dictates of philanthropy, they did not put on the ratepayers a burden which people who had a right to be represented might be unwilling to adopt. The hon. Member had spoken of the inferior class of teachers in the Irish workhouses; but unfortunately the supply of qualified teachers had long been very deficient in Ireland. It was most distressing in the elementary schools to see how few of the teachers at that moment really had such qualifications as would be considered necessary in England, and even, perhaps, in Scotland; but upon that point the Government had clean hands, because the real prime cause of this depression in Irish education was the want of training. The causes of that want of training were well known to all Irish Members, and those causes the Government had done their very best to remove. As time went on, he thought the steps that had been taken would cause an improvement, and they might hope that after the elementary schools had been supplied the Standard might go on improving lower down the scale, and the workhouses might get supplied with better teachers. But the hon. Member likewise spoke of the industrial training, and on that point he charged the Local Government Board with not having furthered it. The Board might not, perhaps, have done all in their power to further it; but they had not prevented the Guardians in any case from establishing industrial training. He was unwilling to anticipate whatever discussion there might be on the Vote for Industrial Schools; but the hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Colonel Nolan) had spoken of the extreme parsimony of the Government for a good many years past, in refusing to allow more industrial schools to be started in Ireland. The hon. and gallant Member was well aware that the parsimony he complained of had not resulted in Ireland being ill-used, as compared with the Sister Island, because in England and in Wales the proportion of money per head for industrial schools was only 3 to 1, as against the proportion in Ireland; whereas the proportion in population was, roughly speaking, twice as large, and more probably 6 to 1, as compared with Ireland. The hon. and gallant Member, as he understood him, proposed to largely relax the conditions under which children might be sent to industrial schools. That was a very serious question indeed. It would result, he could see, in industrial teaching, at the public expense, being extended over almost the whole of Ireland; and it was quite obvious that many hon. Members, including the hon. Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. H. H. Fowler), would certainly have something to say about the great body of Irish children being educated on a system which, in England, was only applied to those who, from the unfortunate circumstances of their homes, had no chance of the least education. The hon. and gallant Member for Cork had said he would not inflict on the Committee a speech on Union rating if he (Mr. Trevelyan) would state what the views of the Government were on that subject—whether they proposed to make the Union Rating Bill a measure for encouraging indoor relief, and discouraging outdoor relief in Ireland;

or whether they would adopt the English system of applying Union rating to every species of relief. He could see that it would be impossible to pass a Bill through Parliament for a limited and partial system of Union rating. In all questions in which the two countries could have their affairs managed on the same system, it was very important that the greatest possible amount of similarity should be aimed at. The Union Rating Bill in England, which was passed some 20 years ago, had been, on the whole, a very great success; and the tendency in England during those 20 years had certainly not been in the direction of excessive and dissolute outdoor relief, but rather the opposite; and he had no doubt that although by an artificial system of having Union rating for indoor relief, and divisional rating for outdoor relief, when once they should pass the Bill that would be a system he could not ask Parliament to adopt. The hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Colonel Nolan) had referred to a question upon which he had said something at Question time, and asked what measures were being taken by the Local Government Board to provide hospitals in case of cholera. In that matter there had been a good deal of activity, and the policy of the Local Government Board was this—they proposed first to rely upon the existing hospitals. Wherever fever hospitals existed they were of opinion that it would be well if the Guardians were to use them as cholera hospitals. Where no such hospital existed, or where it was inconveniently or dangerously placed, or where, by any evil chance, the cholera should fall upon Ireland severely, and the hospitals were over-filled, and room was wanting—with a view to that they had carefully examined what measures had been adopted in England. In England advice had in one case been given by the English Local Government Board in the shape of a Memorandum with regard to temporary hospital accommodation. That was, he believed, in the year 1876, and the advice given was that the authorities should resort to huts or tents. The Local Government Board for Ireland had been adopting measures for ascertaining where temporary hospitals might be most rapidly procured; and they had ascertained that one English firm had a sufficient number of tents in store. But they were anxious to have these temporary hospitals on the spot, and they had applied to an Irish firm for the plan of a hospital with the intention of at once furthering the provision of hospitals should they be needed. For immediate purposes he might state that the Government had in store 16 Constabulary huts at Phoenix Park, which had been inspected by Inspector Mackay, and he had found them admirably suited for temporary hospitals. They would accommodate five patients each, and could be erected in a few hours. The Government proposed to hold them at the disposal of any Sanitary Authority that might require them, and they would be willing to leave the question of payment to arbitration; but he would see that this most necessary service was pushed forward quickly, because he quite agreed with the hon. and gallant Member that when troubles arose, whether through the inroad of disease, or war, or famine, the difference was very great between having provision actually made and the question settled of authority and responsibility for the arrangements made, and these things not being settled. Going back to the question with which this discussion commenced, the hon. Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. H. H. Fowler) made some general observations as to the conduct of permanent officials in Ireland. He did not acknowledge the justice of those observations, because he doubted whether the hon. Member could find a case resembling that which they had been now discussing, in which any Government, English, Scotch, or Irish, had acted with more decision than the Irish Government had in the case referred to. He did not know what measure of public spirit his hon. Friend had; but he thought he was present when he described the action of the Irish Government in that case as an earnest of what they would do in similar cases, and he should be very much surprised if the hon. Member could pick any hole in the action of the Irish Government in that matter. The hon. Member said that when an allegation was made two days would be sufficient to settle the matter. The hon. Member had not studied the case sufficiently; he had not paid sufficient attention to the great principle that no man should be condemned untried. The Executive had not had the opportunity yet of writing to Mr. Elliott, to ask him what colour he placed upon the charge. Till the Board had had its meeting, and until the Executive got a reply from them, they would not have that opportunity, because his (Mr. Trevelyan's) recollection of the matter was that the first official intelligence they had that anything that could be construed into defalcations had existed was contained in the answer which the Board of Blackrock Commissioners returned to their first letter, and it was immediately on the heels of that answer that they sent their second letter, to which the Board must return a reply after their next meeting.

MR. MOLLOY: What is the date of that letter?

MR. TREVELYAN said, he had not got the papers with him; he was not aware the subject was going to be started. But the letters of the Executive, whenever they were written, were written very soon after the communication was received from the Blackrock Commissioners. As he had already stated, the Blackrock Commissioners had been exceedingly sluggish, and, consequently, in the last resort, he should propose that the matter be dealt with by two independent bodies. However, as a practical result of this discussion, he was perfectly prepared to accept the suggestion of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. H. H. Fowler) to defer the Report. The hon. Gentleman had done much good by comparing the Estimates of the one country with those of the other, and he (Mr. Trevelyan) would be extremely glad if his hon. Friend could, on some future occasion, give them his ideas as to whether a Public Office was better managed by a Board or by a Permanent Secretary. But when the hon. Gentleman spoke of the salary of the Vice President, he (Mr. Trevelyan) must own that Mr. Robinson's responsibilities and duties were not more than adequately represented by a salary of £2,000 a-year. It must be borne in mind that in the English Local Government Board there were two Parliamentary officers who had nothing to do except to look after that Board. In the Local Government Board in Ireland there was only one Parliamentary official, and he was the Chief Secretary; and it was pretty plain that an official who had to be for the best part of seven months in each year in constant attendance in Parliament at Westminster, occupied with the business of many different Departments, and with an amount of what might be called Home Office Business that alone would be enough to keep a Minister actively employed, would not in any sense be able to undertake the duties of a Permanent Supervisor of a Department. Under those circumstances, he could not say that the Vice President of the Local Government Board was at all overpaid. His hon. Friend spoke of the very large expenditure on medical relief, and he (Mr. Trevelyan) did not think that the answer of the hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Colonel Nolan) covered the whole ground. The hon. and gallant Member for Galway put it down to the great territorial size of Ireland as compared with her population. That made some difference, no doubt; but he (Mr. Trevelyan) should say that the difference in the expenditure on medical relief in the two countries was due in great measure to the different habits of the English and Irish populations. The dependence of the Irish people upon medical relief provided by the public went undoubtedly in very much higher classes, and was very much more general, than in England, and was at least one main cause of the very great proportionate expenditure upon medical relief. An indication of that was the difference in the position which was occupied by the public dispenser in England and that occupied by the public dispenser in Ireland. The dispenser in Ireland depended to a great extent upon a public salary; but in England he depended chiefly upon his private practice. The hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) referred to several cases of elections in which he considered the Local Government Board had not acted justly. Now, the Local Government Board was extremely anxious to be relieved of its functions in regard to elections. Some 80 or 90 contested elections were brought to be tried and supervised by the Local Government Board every year. The duty was one that was extremely invidious and extremely difficult to perform, and he should be only too glad if it could be transferred by the Bill, which had now gone to "another place," to a tribunal which was well fitted to examine into the questions at issue.

Mr. Trevelyan

But he was bound to say that whenever a Question had been asked in the House with regard to the position of the Local Government Board respecting a contested Poor Law election, he had always gone into the case, and he had generally found that this idea governed the decisions of the Board—that as little as possible should be done to disturb the result of elections unless what had taken place was of a nature to falsify the elections. The Board were of opinion that defects of technical legality should not be pressed too hard unless there was some reason to believe they occurred of malice aforethought, or unless the result of the elections was affected by them. He could not say he had found any case in which the Returning Officer was seriously to blame in which he was not reprimanded, in one case he was even dismissed; and he had not known any case in which an election was turned by illegality. He could not expect hon. Gentlemen to agree with the judgment of the Board in all the cases; but the Board had performed their duty to the best of their ability. He earnestly hoped this would be the last year the Board would have to decide election disputes. The hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) spoke of the Gweedore evictions. He should not follow the hon. Gentleman into that part of his speech in which he referred to the relations between the landlord and the tenants. He did not want to enter into controversial questions, which were not essential to the Vote; but with regard to the conduct of the relieving officer, and the conduct of the Local Government Board, he had a word to say. The hon. Member said that the evictions took place on the 1st or the 2nd of July, but that the relieving officer did not transfer the people to the workhouse until a good many days had passed. The relieving officer was specially sent by the direction of the Board of Guardians on Saturday, the 5th of July. Up to that time he conceived that he was performing his duty by remaining at home, ready to be sent over in case he was wanted; and, in so doing, he (Mr. Trevelyan) was informed he was acting strictly legally. The relieving officer had been long resident in the district, he knew well the circumstances of the people, and he was not out of sympathy with the people. The character given him by those who knew him locally, including, he (Mr. Trevelyan) was informed, the Catholic clergy of the parish, was that he was a kindly and honest man, and was upright and generous in his dealings with the people. The Local Government Board were alive to what was going on; from the very first they were in correspondence with the relieving officer, reminding him of the great responsibility he would incur by any neglect of duty. They sent an Inspector down to the locality to make a special Report, and they reminded the Guardians of their power to give outdoor relief; but at that point the powers of the Local Government Board ceased. The Local Government Board, as the hon. Gentlemen well knew, had no power whatever to order outdoor relief in a particular case. Well, on Saturday, the 5th of July, the relieving officer was directed by the Guardians to proceed without delay to the scene of the evictions, and to afford, at his own instance, provisional relief, either in or out of the workhouse, according to the circumstances of each case. He went accordingly, and offered meal in one case where he thought it was immediately wanted, and he offered to provide conveyances to the workhouse. The latter offer was refused by all the people.

MR. HARRINGTON: Will the right hon. Gentleman give the date the officer visited the place?

MR. TREVELYAN: It was the 5th of July.

MR. HARRINGTON: He got the order on the 5th; did he go the same day?

MR. TREVELYAN said, the relieving officer went on the day that he got the order. The offer to provide conveyances to the workhouse was refused—that was to the best of his (Mr. Trevelyan's) belief.

MR. HARRINGTON said, that the orders of Boards of Guardians were not given to relieving officers until after their meetings.

MR. TREVELYAN said, the 5th of July was a long day; but he would not absolutely say the relieving officer visited the scene on the day he got the order; but, at any rate, it was not on the Monday he went. The relieving officer offered to take the people to the workhouse; but his offer was declined by the people, who were evidently acting under the advice of Father M'Faddy, who said they were all to go in together; and on the Monday following 141 did go into the workhouse, conveyances being provided for them by the priest, though the relieving officer would have provided them if application had been made to him. Then, with regard to no women or children having been allowed to go to the workhouse unless the father of the family went with them, on that point no complaint had hitherto been made to him. He saw, from the Report, that of the persons who went to the workhouse, 72 had been amongst those evicted on the Gweedore estate, and the remainder were the wives and children of tenants on neighbouring estates, who had been evicted, but reinstated as caretakers; so there could not have been a general system forbidding wives and children to go to the workhouse unless the husbands and fathers went in also. The hon. Member for Galway (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) spoke on the subject of the Labourers' Act, with regard to which he was interrupted once by the Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Childers), and once by the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate). The hon. Member for Galway accepted the interruptions in a very cheerful spirit, and he said nothing from that moment forward to which anybody could take exception. But he (Mr. Trevelyan) could not help thinking that the general sense of the Committee would be with the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Newdegate) who appealed to the Chairman; because, when a Committee was sitting upstairs, it was altogether out of reason that the evidence should be the subject of comment in the House. The hon. Member (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) was so ingenious, however, that, though he was obliged to obey the ruling of the Chair, he was not at all disconcerted, but was able to put forward his opinions and views on other grounds than on the evidence of the Committee sitting upstairs. The hon. Gentleman asked him several questions—for instance, whether any houses had been built under the Labourers' Act; and whether any Boards of Guardians had objected to burden their ratepayers in the matter? He (Mr. Trevelyan) was not aware that any houses had been built; but he did not think that, under the schemes which were being put forward, any houses could very well have been built by this time. It was only in the latter part of the Session that the Provisional Orders were passed; besides, it was extremely unlikely that, with a Committee now sitting, and with further legislation so freely talked of by hon. Members, the present Bill would be put into any very active use. And when he was asked whether any Boards of Guardians had objected to burden their ratepayers, he should be inclined to think it was extremely probable that they had objected. The very principle of the Bill introduced by the hon. Member himself was that pressure should be imposed upon Boards of Guardians from the outside, and that they themselves should have the power to say whether they would burden the rates by building houses. The hon. Member required from him (Mr. Trevelyan) two pledges, neither of which he was able to give. The first pledge was that the Committee now sitting should report this year. On that point he had no power whatever. It was for the Committee themselves to say how much evidence they wished to take, how long they wished to sit; and it would be impertinent in him even to express a wish on the subject. The next pledge was that the Government should, in the Autumn Session, bring forward an amending Bill. On that rested a question of extreme gravity; a question which could only be settled by an appeal to the Prime Minister, and upon which he (Mr. Trevelyan) would not have the courage to express any opinion. He knew that the idea of the Prime Minister was that the Autumn Session should be devoted exclusively to the Representation of the People Bill. One hon. Member mentioned his desire that the Local Government Board should interfere to see that the children in workhouses received the advantages of a religious education. At that moment a question was impending with the Donegal Board of Guardians, with regard to which he (Mr. Trevelyan) was extremely anxious. A controversy had arisen between the Local Government Board and the Donegal Board of Guardians, and he was bound to say there had been faults on both sides; but the difficulty occasioned at present appeared to lie with the Board of Guardians. The Local Government Board had made up their minds to settle the question; and, in the course of the next week, he had no doubt that settled it would be. He was quite certain that they never could permanently allow the children of the poor people in workhouses to be deprived of religious instruction and consolation. Having done his best to deal with the different points which had been started by hon. Members during the discussion, he earnestly hoped they would now be allowed to take the Vote.

MR. MOORE said, the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary had exhibited great patience and care in going through the many subjects which had been referred to by different Members of the Committee; and he did not intend to reward the right hon. Gentleman's patience by putting the Committee to the trouble of a Division, especially as his hon. Friends sitting on the Irish Benches opposite did not think it wise to do so. He desired, however, before he asked leave to withdraw his Amendment, to thank the Chief Secretary for the pointed way in which he alluded to the condition of lunatics. Of course, he considered the condition of the children was of paramount importance; but he was pleased to find the right hon. Gentleman took a deep interest in the condition of the lunatics. Speaking of the children, the Chief Secretary alluded to the fact that he (Mr. Moore) had said there were 42 unclassified teachers; and the right hon. Gentleman stated that that was owing to the absence of training schools, a defect which the present Government were taking means to remedy. But that did not meet the case at all, because none of the teachers, roughly speaking, were trained. He should be sorry to terminate any of the appointments already made; but what he complained of was that the Local Government Board sanctioned the appointment of any unclassified teachers. Another point upon which he laid stress was that there was a clashing of authority; that the Local Government Board Inspector came down to the schools with certain powers, and then the Inspector of the Education Department came down with other powers, and as a consequence the education of the children suffered. The two points he had mentioned were points of administration with which the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary might very properly deal, with a view to an improved state of things. There was only one more remark he wished to make, and that was that nothing that hon. Members opposite could say could increase his desire to keep down undue expenditure. He had always been a consistent advocate of economy, and he anticipated that, by a wise reform, or modification of the existing system, a very large saving would accrue. He believed that some workhouses might be wholly closed, or only kept open so far as they were required for sanitary purposes. He asked leave to withdraw his Amendment.

MR. HARRINGTON said, he did not wish to travel over the ground that had been so fairly and exhaustively covered by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary; but he desired to make a few remarks with regard to the observations of the hon. Member for Clonmel (Mr. Moore). The opinion of Irish Members was not absolutely unanimous on some of the questions the hon. Gentleman had referred to. For instance, he could not agree with the hon. Gentleman that it would be an advantage to the educational training of children in workhouses that the duties of inspection should be delegated to the ordinary Poor Law Inspectors. In the first place, the technical knowledge which Poor Law Inspectors had to acquire to enable them to discharge their Poor Law duties was altogether different to that technical knowledge which they should possess to fit them for Inspectors of Schools. It would be a distinct disadvantage, in his opinion, to the education imparted in workhouse schools if the duty of inspecting those schools were taken out of the hands of the Inspectors of National Education in the country. His idea was that the best means of improving the education of children in workhouse schools was to subject them to the same system of inspection as the children of ordinary schools were subjected to. A Poor Law Inspector, from his very position, knew nothing of the system and method of primary education which necessarily must be present to the mind of the man who came into contact with children for the purposes of education. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary had referred in a very detailed manner to the administration of the Local Government Board. The details rather surprised him (Mr. Harrington), because he knew that government by the Local Government Board was perhaps the most intricate problem in Ireland, and he could conceive the difficulties anyone who had the management of the Department must experience. Now, there was one point connected with the operation of the Labourers' Act to which he wished to draw special attention. The 10th section of that Act provided that where a representation was made to a Sanitary Authority, the Sanitary Authority was to report forthwith to the Local Government Board, and they must see whether the Sanitary Authority had devised a scheme under that representation to put the Labourers' Act into operation; in other words, if the local Sanitary Authority refused to put the Act into operation, the Local Government Board were empowered by this section to do so. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary had admitted that there were numerous instances where the Boards of Guardians had refused to put the Act into operation. Could the right hon. Gentleman give the Committee a single case where the Local Government Board had used the powers which the 10th section of the Act gave them—namely, to call upon the Sanitary Authority to devise a scheme, or themselves devised a scheme, by which the Act should be put in force? He (Mr. Harrington) had watched the operation of the Act pretty carefully, and he had found that whatever had been done under the Act to improve the dwellings of the labourers had been due altogether to the willingness of the majority of the ratepayers, or to the action of the Boards of Guardians, in which the elected Guardians had been in the ascendancy. He had failed to find a single instance in which the Local Government Board had endeavoured to give effect to the 10th section of the Act by stepping in and compelling the Local Authorities to devise a scheme. Now, from the observations of the hon. Member for Galway (Mr. T. P. O'Connor), it was evident that the Act had had no operation at all in two of the Provinces of Ireland. Only two efforts had been made to put the Act in operation in Connaught, where the condition of the people most required it. He believed that not a single scheme had been devised by the Boards of Guardians in what was called "the loyal Province of Ulster," "the Conservative Province of Ulster." The labouring classes in that Province were as badly housed as those in any other Province. In respect to the two Provinces in which no effort had been made by the Local Authorities to give effect to the Act, it was worth the consideration of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary whether the Local Government Board, over which he presided, should not themselves put the Act into operation.

Mr. WARTON said, he did not propose to enter into any of the purely Irish questions which had been discussed.

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; Committee counted, and 40 Members being found present,

Mr. WARTON said, he had no intention of entering into the comparison between the work of the Local Government Board in Ireland and England, with which the hon. Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. H. H. Fowler) had threatened them. There was, however, one item in the Vote to which he desired to call attention—namely, the item for the pay of Inspectors. It amounted to £2,100, and what struck him was the small amount of work which appeared to be done by the Inspectors for their salaries. Their labours appeared to be confined to the neighbourhood of the Parks, and the item was exactly the same as it was in the previous year. It was made up of the personal expenses of six Inspectors at £1 1s. a-day for 163 days, and the personal expenses of seven Sub-Inspectors at the same rate; but although there were 313 working days in the year, these officers appeared to have been employed in one case for 166 days, and in the other for only 143. He did not know what the explanation was, and it might be that they were only paid when they were actually employed. It certainly appeared that there were more Inspectors than were absolutely necessary, or else they did not perform half work enough.

Mr. COURTNEY said, the Inspectors received a guinea a-day when they were employed on the work of inspection.

Mr. HEALY wished to ask the Chief Secretary if there were any Unions in Ireland in which Vice Guardians were employed? He would also ask him what the intention of the Government was with regard to the Union of Newport, in the County Mayo? For a long time this district had been subjected to heavy rates, at which the greatest dissatisfaction was expressed, as they were paying no less than 4s. 6d. in the pound. They had passed a resolution to the effect that they were totally unable to pay 4s. 6d. in the pound, and they had recommended that there should be an amalgamation between them and the Westport or Belmullet Union in order to lessen these high and grievous expenses. The poor people had resolved that they would pay no higher rate than 2s. in the pound. That, however, he thought, would be a foolish step for them to take, as they subjected themselves to political disability, and deprived themselves of their votes. If they wanted not to pay so much, it would be much more preferable that they should come to a resolution to decline to pay county cess, because it would be better to strike against a tax which did not entail the loss of the vote or any political disability. Non-payment of the poor rate did, of course, involve political disability. The Local Government Board had held an inquiry into the case, which had been adjourned to the 7th of August; but he did not see why three weeks should be taken up by Mr. Robinson, the Inspector, in this way. The valuation of the entire district was only £14,000, and it was absolutely absurd that there should be such charges made for such a poor district. He trusted that they would have some assurance from the Chief Secretary that the Government were willing to concur with some scheme of amalgamation of Unions which would relieve the people. He was entirely opposed to the present system for the management of the Poor Law districts in Ireland, although he admitted that there might be a difficulty in regard to the medical authorities. He did not think, however, that the difficulty was an insuperable one; and where they had dispensary districts they could, by an arrangement in regard to the staff of doctors, obviate much of the evil. He also wished to ask a question with regard to the Donegal Union, and he certainly thought that the Chief Secretary had not dealt with the Guardians of that Union as he would have done if it had been a Union further South. The Catholic clergyman was still divorced from his flock, because the Guardians would not comply with the suggestions of the Chief Secretary, and had chosen to get rid of every Catholic official who had been connected with the administration of the affairs of the Union. He had raised the question last year, and was sorry to find that no progress had been made in the matter since. The Guardians were still recalcitrant. It was unjust that, because the Guardians were almost all Protestants or Presbyterians, the paupers, who were almost entirely Catholics, should be shut off from the administrations of their clergy. In the case of the old sick poor this was peculiarly unjust. In the case of the old sick, who were on the verge of the grave, they found themselves shut out from the consolations of their religion. Even in England, where the religious grievance could hardly be realized because it was practically non-existent, any distinction of this kind would be held to be an intolerable grievance. It might be said that the young people were able to attend the Catholic churches in the towns; but in the event of being attacked with small-pox, scarlatina, or any of the complaints to which children were subject, they were cut off from the ministrations of the priest. He asked the Chief Secretary to deal with the Boards of Guardians in the North of Ireland as he had done with the Union of Carrick-on-Suir in the South. Why had not the Guardians of the Donegal Union been dealt with in the same manner? If a similar defiance of the regulations of the Local Government Board had occurred anywhere else, the Chief Secretary would have suspended the Guardians from the exercise of their functions, and appointed Vice Guardians. It was monstrous that hundreds of these unfortunate paupers professing the Roman Catholic faith were allowed to die without Christian ministrations simply because they were paupers. In Ireland, where religion was strong, there was a very widespread feeling on the subject, and he trusted that the Committee would have some statement from the Chief Secretary that would be satisfactory, instead of being put off again with promises never intended to be performed. For more than 12 months this kind of thing had been going on, and the Irish Members had been unable to obtain satisfaction. In England such a scandal would be settled immediately. Time after time they had been told that the question was on the verge of settlement, but it had not been settled yet. So dogged were the gentlemen who officiated as Guardians in the Donegal Union in their religious prejudices that they would defer dealing with the question until they were absolutely driven to do so. Unless there was something in the shape of a menace from the Government, he did not believe for a moment that the Guardians would consent to come to terms. He hoped to hear from the Chief Secretary some statement as to the nature of the steps which the Local Government Board intended to take.

MR. GRAY said, the Chief Secretary in the course of his speech had touched upon various important subjects, and one of the matters which had been alluded to by the right hon. Gentleman was of special importance at the present moment—namely, the provisions which the Local Government had made or were making in view of the contingency of a possible outbreak of cholera in Ireland? He was aware that this was a subject to which the right hon. Gentleman and the Vice President of the Local Government Board should have their attention directed to; and he would ask if they were alive to the responsibility, and were prepared to accept it? There was no reason to assume that the United Kingdom would escape a visitation of this kind, for the history of previous epidemics pointed to the almost certainty of the disease visiting these shores in a more or less virulent form. It might not be at first in the most virulent form; but, judging from past experience, the visitation next year would be much more serious and severe. The right hon. Gentleman had told them what provision was intended to be made in regard to the hospitals, and so on; but there was one highly essential precaution which ought to be taken. He believed that it would be necessary to make a regular revolution in the present system of cleansing and scavenging. Cholera was essentially a disease which became dangerous and even fatal wherever filth existed, and he was of opinion that every precaution should be taken to insure cleanliness, for where that was done there was little to fear from the disease. Cleansing and scavenging, to be efficacious, required time; and he believed that no time should be lost in taking measures to prevent the disease from spreading. So far as medical assistance was concerned, it could not be necessary until the very moment of the attack and visitation; but it was very different with scavenging, cleansing, and disinfection, which, although very humble methods of prevention, were, perhaps, the most efficacious, although they undoubtedly took up the most time. He did not gather from the statement of the right hon. Gentleman that he had in his mind the propriety of urging upon the Local Government Board the necessity of making these regulations. It was all very well to tell them that he had in view preparations which would be available when the visitation came; but it was desirable to do a great deal more. A fortnight ago, he had asked the right hon. Gentleman under what circumstances the Local Government Board would feel themselves called upon to issue an Order, and he was told that it would be issued under the provisions of the 149th section of the Irish Act. Yesterday, the Chief Secretary repeated something to the same effect. He thought it was time the Local Government Board told them distinctly what the nature of the arrangements was. All the Continental cities had taken precautions; and even America, which was 3,000 miles away from any centre of the contagion, had made preparations to prevent its inroads. Probably they would be told that the Local Government Board were fully alive to the necessities of the case; but that they would refrain as long as possible from issuing their Orders, for fear of producing a panic. Now, he did not believe in any person dying of panic, and nothing effective would be done until the Local Government Board issued a sealed Order. If there were any persons who were likely to die of panic, he did not think it of much importance whether they lived or died. He would urge on the right hon. Gentleman himself not to be panic-stricken in regard to the effect of panic on other people. It was his duty, and that of the Local Government Board, to take timely precautions, and to issue Orders at once under which the Sanitary Authorities would be able to act. Scavenging and cleansing could not be accomplished in a moment, and after the Orders were issued weeks and months would elapse before their cities could be thoroughly purified and cleansed, and justify the people in regarding the approach of the disease with comparative equanimity. Scavenging and cleansing could not be carried on without great danger if the disease were actually to visit these shores, as it would be in that case a most serious thing to stir up the festering accumulations of filth which were known to exist. What would be thought of anyone stirring up the mud of the Thames, or the accumulations of refuse in the back yards, if the disease were actually amongst them? Everyone who had a nose had palpable evidence that the streets of London required effective cleansing. He would urge upon the right hon. Gentleman the necessity of taking timely precautions in this matter. He should remember that, if the case of cholera which had been discovered in the Mersey the other day had been introduced into Liverpool, the disease would have been in Dublin within three days. He did not believe there was the least danger of the people becoming panic-stricken if the necessary Order was made by the Local Government Board to have steps taken to institute precautionary measures. It would be folly to defer their action until cholera was actually in their midst. If the provisions of the Public Health Act were to have any effect at all, now was the time for putting them in force. The Irish people would prefer having their streets cleansed under a sealed Order rather than having them left in a state of filth. He considered this a matter of enormous importance. The right hon. Gentleman had alluded to an Act passed last year which materially affected Ireland, the object of the Act being to concentrate the responsibility in a single Sanitary Authority. In the peculiar conditions of Irish law, up to last year the duty in one district would be divided between the two Sanitary Authorities; but the Act of last year enabled the Local Government Board to concentrate the authority in the hands of one Body, and so far the measure was a useful one. Unless the evil he would point out was mitigated, the Act would be found inoperative. The authorities called on in the urban districts in Ireland to carry out the special provisions which might be made whenever the Local Government Board mustered up courage enough to issue a sealed Order were the Poor

Law Guardians. The duty of carrying out the work was vested in that Body, even in Dublin City, and the financial effect of that was, that the expense was divided between the owners and the occupiers, as all Poor Law charges were in Ireland. The Act of last year enabled the responsibility to be handed over to the Urban Sanitary Authority, which in ordinary cases was, of course, the Corporation. The taxes payable to the Corporation were payable solely by the occupiers, so that the financial result would be that, if the Local Government Board availed themselves of the Act of last Session, they would take the cost, so far as one-half was concerned, from the shoulders of the owner, who was certainly best able to bear it, and whose life, in his own opinion at any rate, was more valuable than that of the poor occupier, and to transfer it to the shoulders of the occupier solely, who might be presumed, in most cases, to be the poorer man, and less able to bear a sudden impost, and less likely to submit to it with willingness. Now, that was an effect which he believed was not contemplated by the Act. He was not quite certain that the Local Government Board had any power in the matter; but if the Urban Sanitary Authorities, or any of them, were to be selected to undertake this grave responsibility, a responsibility which would probably bring on them, under any circumstances, a great amount of odium, and nothing else, they might also be saddled with the responsibility of transferring to the occupier liabilities which the occupier would not otherwise incur. He would ask the right hon. Gentleman to give his consideration to this matter, or else he might find that, when the rules came to be enforced, they would all be dislocated by the financial difficulty that so often cropped up. With regard to the Labourers' Act, he (Mr. Gray) quite recognized the difficulty, and, in fact, the inexpediency, of generally discussing the subject pending the Report of the Select Committee. He trusted that the Committee would see its way to reporting that Session; but he acknowledged that the right hon. Gentleman would not be justified in seeking to put any pressure upon that Body to express its opinion on the subject just now. It was suggested that, in consequence of the Act not having been put into effective operation either in Connaught or in Ulster, it might be the duty of the Local Government Board to exercise the powers conferred upon them by Section 10, and to endeavour to force, to a certain extent, the putting of the Act into operation in extreme cases. Of course, the Local Government Board might consider it their duty to act in that way; but he, for one, must dissent from the opinion of his hon. Friends to this extent—that he believed they would be only justified in taking action of that kind in extreme cases. He thought it would be very much better for the interests of the labourers, and the success of the Act in the end, that the local Representative Bodies should be permitted to take the initiative. He did not believe in spurring on Local Bodies too energetically. He thought that where a Body was really representative of its constituency it was the best judge, and it was even better to let it make a mistake, and allow experience to put it right, than to suppress it and put matters in such a state that they would go back to their former position. The true remedy against the apathy, and even the hostility, which characterized a certain number of Boards of Guardians in Ireland was to make them more representative of the people. As his hon. Friend had pointed out, wherever the elected Guardians had a majority on the Board, wherever really the popular party had had the preponderance of votes upon the Board, they had shown their willingness to carry out the Act; and it was only where the ex officio element, or the sympathizers with that element, had been too strong for the truly local element, that the Act had been rendered nugatory. He thought that the remedy for that was to strengthen the representative element on the Boards. They knew that the Labourers' Act was in its very essence a Sanitary Act. How was it that sanitary matters had attracted, during the last 10 or 15 years, such an enormously increasing amount of attention in England? Why, it had only been since the time when Parliament had vested in the householders of cities and boroughs the franchise that those higher up in the social scale, statesmen and others, had found the necessity of directing their attention practically to sanitary matters. It was the last Reform Act which, by giving the people power in this country, had really brought about the important and valuable legislation which they had had in recent years in connection with all sanitary matters. Now, if in the same way in Ireland they gave the people more power on their local Representative Boards, they would insure their awaking in a very short time to the necessity for sanitary reforms, even to the extent of putting into operation the Labourers' Act. That would be a healthy, wholesome, and natural movement. But the Local Government Board in Ireland did not command the entire confidence of the Irish people, and pressure from that Board might have a deleterious effect. As he was on the sanitary question, he wished to call the attention of the right hon. Gentleman to the fact that, while he deprecated any pressure from the Local Government Board in this respect, he thought that Board could do a great deal to instruct and encourage the local Sanitary Authorities, whether Corporations, or Boards, or Poor Law Guardians, in their duties under the sanitary laws. Now, the Local Government Board in England was ceaseless in its efforts in this direction; but the Local Government Board in Ireland never did anything at all. The Local Government Board in England, immediately after the passing of the Public Health Act of 1875, set to work in the most careful manner, and, under the highest possible professional advice, drafted a series of model Poor Laws, circulated them amongst the Sanitary Authorities, and got them to adopt them with such modifications as might be required in certain localities. The Local Government Board in Ireland had done nothing of the kind. Not only had the Local Government Board in England issued a set of bye-laws, but after a certain number of years they had issued a revised and more valuable set. He would ask the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant whether the Local Government Board of Ireland would do anything to stimulate the Local Bodies in a legitimate way to a more healthy and vigorous action. The Sanitary Authorities in Dublin had adopted a set of bye-laws framed on the English model; but they got in the matter no assistance whatever from the Local Government Board, and that Board would not, even when they were framed, adopt them as a model and see how they could be applied to all the other Sanitary Authorities of Ireland. He had put a Question on this matter to the right hon. Gentleman, and the right hon. Gentleman had informed him vaguely that the Local Government Board of Ireland did not see the necessity for the bye-laws. He (Mr. Gray) failed to see why the Local Government Board in Ireland ought not to be as zealous in instructing and encouraging the local Sanitary Authorities, who naturally could not be expected to be informed on these subjects—why they should not, in fact, become as much interested in their work as did the officials of the Local Government Board in England. Possibly the secret of it was to be found in the fact alluded to by the right hon. Gentleman in connection with an observation which he made as to the salary of the Vice President of the Local Government Board. He (Mr. Gray) respectfully agreed with him, that in the case of an official occupying so responsible a post as Mr. Robinson, and performing his duties on the whole so well, he was not too highly paid by a salary of £2,000 a-year. He did not think they could get a good man to do the work for much less. In England, the Local Government Board was represented by two Parliamentary officers, one of them a Minister of Cabinet rank. The right hon. Gentleman, in the speech he had made, touching on a variety of subjects, had shown a marvellous amount of industry and a splendid memory; but no sane man could expect that the Chief Secretary could possibly make himself acquainted with all the details of the Local Government Board in Ireland in the manner in which the two Gentlemen who represented the English Local Government Board, and who were charged solely with those duties, and no others, could make themselves acquainted with the details of their Office. Compared with the enormous number of duties which the right hon. Gentleman had to discharge, his functions as President of the Local Government Board were merely nominal. All he could possibly be expected to do was to act as a species of funnel to submit to the House information which he received from the officials in Ireland. He was not like either of the English Representatives of the Department, who were responsible officials, and not merely nominal Heads, but Parliamentary Heads of the Office, able to answer Questions, and go into subjects from their own knowledge. He (Mr. Gray) was amazed at the amount of knowledge which the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Trevelyan) had shown; but the right hon. Gentleman did not profess to have the same knowledge of the Department as the officials of the Local Government Board in England were legitimately expected to have, seeing that they were more responsible and had more knowledge in the matter. He wished to call the attention of the right hon. Gentleman to the difficulty which sometimes arose in connection with the functions of auditors under the Local Government Board and local Representative Bodies in Ireland. The clauses of the Irish Act appointing them, and giving them their powers of surcharge, were not precisely the same as the corresponding clause of the English Act. Still, in substance they were the same. But he did not think that the Auditors in Ireland took as broad a view of their duties as did the Auditors in England. He knew that sometimes Local Bodies in Ireland had serious reason to complain that the Auditors inflicted upon them surcharges for money really bond fide expended in the interests of their constituents, and sometimes on public objects. He did not think that, in giving this power to surcharge, the object was that it should be used in a narrow, technical manner, and that the Auditors should have power to charge an individual doing an important public duty without any kind of fee or reward—that he should be really able to fine them if they stepped out of the technical limit of their powers, as they sometimes happened to do, for the public benefit, although the action was technically ultra vires. He would call attention to one case of surcharge, not important as to the amount, but very important as to principle—a case which occurred within the last few years in the Dublin Corporation. The Dublin Corporation had been in the habit of constantly sending deputations to England in connection with such matters as Royal marriages, Royal christenings, and Royal what-nots. Usually, the Lord Mayor and certain members of the Corporation came over, attended by the civic officers, to add éclat to the occasion. The custom was for the Lord Mayor, and the members of the Corporation who attended him, to pay their own expenses; but for the expenses of the civic officers to be paid out of the rates. That, he believed, was a common habit in England. The Local Government Board Auditor invariably allowed these expenses, thus showing that, in his opinion, they were legal expenses, and that it was within the discretion of the Local Body to spend the rates under their control for congratulating Her Majesty whenever any auspicious event occurred in connection with the Royal Family. Well, last year, a matter which, perhaps, some of the Irish people deemed to be of almost as much importance to them as the advent of a new Royal Infant, occurred in Ireland. An Exhibition, a National Exhibition, was opened in Cork for the purpose of seeking to encourage Irish local manufacturing enterprise and industry. It partook, in no sense, of a rebel or revolutionary character. The chief movers in it were strong Conservatives. All parties in Cork joined to make it a success; and it actually enjoyed the patronage and presence in bodily form of the Lord Lieutenant, which was an abundant guarantee of the useful and loyal character of the undertaking. Well, the Corporation of Dublin considered it their duty to encourage the Exhibition by all the means in their power; and they passed a resolution for the then Lord Mayor of Dublin to attend in state, and ordering the civic officers to accompany him. The Lord Mayor, as usual, paid his own expenses; but the expenses of the officers—their travelling expenses—were paid, by order of the Common Council, out of the funds of the Municipality. Twelve months afterwards, when the Auditor came to audit the accounts, he surcharged, not the individuals who had ordered the payment, but the persons who, by the routine of the service, had to sign the cheques. Now, what distinction was there in law between the Corporation sending their Lord Mayor and officers to England for the purpose of carrying an Address of sympathy or congratulation to the Royal Family, and their sending their officers to Cork for the purpose of attending the opening of a National Industrial Exhibition? Why, in the one case, were individuals to be made to pay out of their private purses, and, in the other, the ratepayers be held liable by the auditor?

He would ask the attention of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Irish Local Government Board to that particular point. He (Mr. Gray) had given the right hon. Gentleman briefly the facts of the case. As to the general system of audit, it would be worthy of the right hon. Gentleman's attention whether some improvement should not be made. The system both in England and Ireland was very extraordinary, but particularly so in Ireland. Resolutions were come to at one meeting, and were usually acted upon at the next. It saved time, and was the most convenient course. For instance, at a meeting of the Poor Law Guardians a number of payments would be ordered to be made to-day, and at the next meeting the formal operation of signing the cheques would be gone through. In the event of one unlawful payment being made, and the auditor surcharging it, it was not the individuals who ordered the payment to be made who were held liable, but the individuals who happened to go through the purely mechanical act of signing the cheque—individuals who might have had no connection whatever with the operation of ordering the payment. The Act said that the Auditor, under the circumstances, should be entitled to surcharge the illegal or improper payment on the person making or authorizing the illegal payment. If the payment were illegal, or such as should be surcharged, it was right to surcharge the person authorizing it; but the fact that the mechanical operation of signing a cheque rendered the person so signing liable to the surcharge struck him as something like an absurdity. He himself had known many cases in which individual members of a Corporation voted against a certain payment; in a week or a fortnight cheques in connection with that payment came up; they were signed in the ordinary routine, the resolution of the Corporation being thought to be a sufficient guarantee to those who signed them that the payments were justifiable; subsequently the Auditor surcharged the amount, and the persons who signed the cheques, although they might have been opposed on the Council to the illegal payment, had to pay the surcharge. This was an absurdity. Where thousands of cheques had to be signed, it would be impossible for the persons signing them to consider whether each payment authorized by the previous action of the Body was legal. Though the matter was a small one, he would ask the right hon. Gentleman to consider it in order to see whether it could not be placed on a better footing. He did not deny that there might be legitimate surcharges; but where they existed, they should be enforced upon the proper individuals, because, as he had pointed out, at the present time they were very often put upon the wrong people. As to the Auditors and the Inspectors of the Local Government Board, he wished to mention to the right hon. Gentleman that he believed a great amount of dissatisfaction existed amongst officers of the Local Government Board in consequence of the way in which the prizes of the Office were frequently given away by the Heads of the Departments. Officers who had served long in any Department looked forward to promotion—to Inspectorships, or to Auditorships—as the rewards of their services; and when some outsider, comparatively ignorant of the work of the Department, without any kind of qualification except merely that of being a relative of this person, or the pet of that individual who might have influence, was pitchforked over the heads of those who were entitled to promotion from long and faithful services, the result was to discourage the officials of the Department. He did not wish to drag forward the names of individuals; but it would possibly be in the recollection of the right hon. Gentleman himself how many times during the last few years outsiders had been taken in and presented to lucrative offices, while competent individuals, who had been for considerable periods in the Service, had had their claims passed over. He did not make any complaint against the right hon. Gentleman, because he believed that under the late Government the system was, if anything, worse. He (Mr. Gray) did not see why, if they could find an efficient officer in the Department, they should go outside it to fill vacancies; and even if a man happened to be a captain, a colonel, or the relative of a Lord, he did not see why he should have £600 or £700 a-year presented to him for doing work in order to learn how to perform which it was necessary that he should have a man under him. There was another matter to which attention had been very frequently directed. It was a matter which did not affect the Chief Secretary so much as the Secretary to the Treasury; but he would call attention to it, although he had not the least hope that what he said would have any effect upon the hon. Gentleman. They would find in this Vote a considerable sum for the salaries of sanitary officers. By the Public Health Act of 1874, as well as he remembered, the Treasury, in order to encourage the appointment of sanitary officers, paid the Sanitary Authorities in Ireland—and he believed that the same thing was done in England—half the salaries of these persons; but, in consenting to do that, they inflicted what he considered to be a very great injustice upon those Sanitary Authorities, and he had already taken action for the purpose of bringing about sanitary improvement before it was compulsory upon them to do so. Prior to the passing of the Act of 1874, under the former Public Health Acts, it was open to the Sanitary Authorities to appoint sanitary medical officers, and a sanitary staff or not, as they thought fit. Some of them thought fit, but most of them did not. Now the Treasury, which, after the passing of the Act of 1874, had rendered these appointments compulsory on all Local Bodies, said—"We will give to those who, up to 1874, had neglected their duties and made no appointments, half the salaries of the new officers; but as an encouragement to those who did their duty, and did make appointments, we will offer no assistance whatever." That seemed to him very like punishing the ratepayers who did their duty, and rewarding those who neglected it. How could they expect that Local Authorities would put into effective operation their legislation if they treated them in this way? Was it not natural that, under the circumstances, the Boards of Guardians should hang back, and say—"The Treasury will do the same in connection with the Labourers' Act as they are doing in connection with the Public Health Act. We will wait and see what they do." These Bodies would say—"If we do not put into operation the provisions of the Act, in course of time we shall receive some assistance from the Treasury; whereas, if we do put the Act into operation, we shall have to bear the whole expense ourselves, and never receive any assistance." The action of the Government in this matter was certainly not just. And it did not seem to him (Mr. Gray) to be good policy. He could understand the Treasury even saying that in the lifetime of the individuals already appointed they would not make contributions to their salaries; but to say that for ever they would make this distinction between officers performing the same duties, and between similar Public Bodies—to say that they would pay a contribution of half the salaries to one set, where they neglected their duty, and refused to another, where they performed their duty, was to give a premium to sluggishness, and a punishment in perpetuity to the progressive districts in Ireland. The Government did not seem to have a defensible position; although he had no doubt the Financial Secretary to the Treasury would have some excellent reasons to give for maintaining the existing state of things. The system appeared to him (Mr. Gray) to be hardly compatible with justice or common sense; and certainly it tended to encourage Sanitary Authorities in future to refrain from doing what they should for the carrying out of the Labourers' Act. The right hon. Gentleman had alluded to the case of the man Elliott, of Blackrock, the collector of the South Dublin Union. The Chief Director had sought to justify the sluggishness of the Department in the case of Elliott by saying that they had been prompt in the case of Byrne. The authorities had been energetic in the case of Byrne, no doubt; but he hoped that in consequence of that they would not stay their hands in the case of Elliott. He should be sorry to prosecute any man unless there was abundant reason for it; but he thought that the case of Elliott should certainly be dealt with on its merits; and, certainly, it did not seem to him to be desirable that a man who had carried on a system of fraud for years and years should be kept in the Public Service. The right hon. Gentleman said that he had no official knowledge of the facts. But suppose it to be the case that Elliott had embezzled the money of a private employer; supposing that he did not occupy a position on a public Board, but had been the employé of a private individual, and had embezzled moneys belonging to him; how would the right hon. Gentleman arrive at official knowledge of the fact? Supposing the case were published in all the newspapers, and were made the subject of discussion for months. Would it not suggest itself to the right hon. Gentleman to make some inquiries concerning the individual, and to question the man himself? Would he not take that course in the case of one of his own servants? Would he not ask him what he had done with the money that was missing? Supposing anyone in that House had an employé against whom such a charge was made; would he not ascertain by the best means in his power what truth there was in that charge? Would not the simple way of obtaining information be either to write or to send to the man, asking whether it was a fact that he was short in his accounts? The employé would have to reply yea or nay. If this course were pursued in the case of Elliott, and if the latter said neither yes nor no, it would then be sufficiently manifest to the common sense of the right hon. Gentleman that the man was guilty. Everyone knew that he was guilty. It had been the subject of discussion on the Board day after day. The Board had taken his property. He had been under their vigilance day by day, and they estreated his belongings. Surely, this was not a man who ought to be allowed to remain in the Public Service, handling public money. The right hon. Gentleman did not seem to think that there was anything for him to do; but there was a simple thing for him to do. In the first place, he should cause a letter to be written to Mr. Elliott, as to an employé, asking for an explanation, and should give Mr. Elliott to understand that if he did not send one he would be dismissed from his office; but that, under any circumstances, in the meantime he would be suspended. Saying this much could not be attended with any kind of injustice or hardship. In connection with the Local Government Board Vote there was such a variety of topics, all of them of considerable interest and importance, that once he (Mr. Gray) had commenced, he found some difficulty in stopping. He thanked the Committee for the patient attention they had given to him.

MR. DAWSON said, that with regard to the last question mentioned by the hon. Member who had just sat down, he would remind the Chief Secretary of the answer which the Secretary to the Treasury had given to him (Mr. Dawson) as to the steps to be taken in the case of Mr. Elliott, because he was sorry to say that the Local Government Board would ride off on the excuse that the difficulties in the defalcations of Mr. Elliott were matters for the Sanitary Board, and not for the Local Government Board. He had asked what course they would pursue if they found a man in the Government employ, but in another capacity of a municipal kind, had been guilty of defalcations? He had asked how they would proceed; and the Secretary to the Treasury had told him that the Home Secretary would take cognizance of the matter in England. Well, the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary stood, so far as Ireland was concerned, not only in the position of President of the Local Government Board, but also in the position of Secretary of State. He (Mr. Dawson) therefore maintained that he was bound, not only as Head Official of the Local Government Board, but as the Chief Secretary of State for Ireland, to take cognizance of Mr. Elliott's defalcation, and to institute, as a Secretary of State would do in England in the case of an English official, a full inquiry into the matter. Then, as to the Auditor, he begged to ask the Chief Secretary if he would give them, if not of his own knowledge, at least on the authority of the officials with whom he was associated, some categorical answer to this plain question? If the Auditor of the Local Government Board should say that it was legal to spend the public funds of Dublin in coming to the Bar of the House to congratulate Her Majesty on an auspicious event, how could they draw the line and say it was illegal for the same Corporation to send their officer to open in state an enterprize that was for the national benefit and the general progress of the community? They certainly did not find in the Act any definite instruction as to where to draw the line. The phraseology of the law which directed the Auditor in the two countries was typical of all the other legislation which was passed for the two countries. In the first article of the Instructions to the Poor Law Officers in England, the conditions under which they should surcharge were detailed in a comprehensive manner; but what was the wonderful power given, unfortunately, by the Act applying to Ireland? It was to surcharge everything contrary to law, or anything they deemed to be not according to law. He thought that the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, or the hon. and learned Solicitor General for Ireland, should give the Committee a plain statement as to the liability of officers who administered the public funds in a city like Dublin in respect of money spent by them in sending an Address to Her Majesty and in respect of other public events. He was of opinion, and he trusted the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary would be able to say, that as soon as possible some legislation should be introduced to define the power of Auditors of the Local Government Board in Ireland in respect of surcharges. What the Committee looked for from the right hon. Gentleman now was that he should answer the legal point raised with regard to the two species of deputations, and also that he should state whether he intended to take proceedings against Mr. Elliott.

MR. KENNY said, it would be superfluous for him to follow the hon. Member for Carlow County (Mr. Gray) into the question of the sanitary arrangements at Dublin, because he had so thorough a knowledge of the subject, and had spoken upon it so ably and fully, that it would be almost impossible to add anything of value to what he had stated. But the hon. Member had also called the attention of the right hon. Gentleman and the Committee to the appointments of Sanitary Inspectors; and, in doing so, he had pointed out an extraordinary anomaly with regard to them—namely, that, whereas the Medical Inspectors and Officers of Health who were appointed under the Act of 1874, had the half of their salaries paid by the Treasury, those who were appointed previously to that Act coming into operation had no portion of their salaries paid out of the Consolidated Fund. He was bound to say that he regarded the existence of those officers as a complete fraud—an imposition. They did nothing for their pay. Notwithstanding the large salaries they received nothing was done by them to preserve the health of the people. In cases where they were employed by people, it was not likely that they would report adversely to those who supported them, because they depended more upon their practice than they did upon their salaries as Officers of Health. This office, which was so necessary, was made such a fraud on the public that when the present Amendment was disposed of, he should feel it his duty to move the reduction of the Vote by the sum of £7,400 which represented half the salaries of the Sanitary Officers. But he rose mainly for the purpose of addressing the right hon. Gentleman on a subject which was closely connected with the question of the health and sanitary condition of a town in Ireland. Some time since, owing to a variety of circumstances, the existence of the Ennis Town Commissioners ceased. Now the Town Improvement Act had ceased to be enforced, and it was sought to have that Act re-adopted, a proposal which was agreed to by the ratepayers at a public meeting. On the 9th of April last, a deputation of townspeople went to the Board of Guardians and asked them to take charge of the water and sewage works, and also of the lighting of the town; a deputation was then deputed to beg the consent of the Local Government Board. The deputation, having attended the Local Government Board with reference to the sewage and water works, informed them that the Board desired to know what their powers were, and whether they were authorized to undertake the duty of contracting for the supply of the town; and, in regard to the question of lighting, what power they had to supply gas-works, or of contracting for the supply of gas from the present Company; and also whether the Board of Guardians could assume the functions which formerly had belonged to the Town Commissioners? The letter sent in reply stated that the Board of Guardians could not undertake the lighting of the town, and that the opinion of the Law Officers would be obtained on the other point. But three months had elapsed since that time, and yet no answer had been given, notwithstanding that repeated communications had passed asking for a reply to the inquiry of the Board of Guardians. It appeared that the Local Government Board found it impossible to prevent the Board of Guardians taking charge of the water works, as the rates would have to be divided between the landlords and the tenants. Of course, there was a feeling amongst a certain portion of the population of the town that it would be adverse to their interest to have the Board of Guardians appointed for the purpose, because the adjustment of taxation might be different under the Board of Guardians from what it was under the Town Commissioners. He need not point out that at the present moment it was exceedingly desirable that the sanitary arrangements at Ennis should be looked after and made as complete as possible; that the town should be lighted; that the water works should not be allowed to fall into a defective state owing to there being no person to look after them, and that there should be some authority appointed who should be responsible for their proper management. It appeared that when the water works were originally constructed, there was a little stream near them which was shut off by the engineer responsible for the management of the works. But owing to the present unsatisfactory state of affairs this stream had broken through the barrier and entered the reservoir which supplied the town. The Committee would at once perceive the very serious consequences which were likely to follow from the town being supplied with bad water, especially if there were an epidemic of cholera. He would venture to put this matter before the Solicitor General for Ireland. It appeared to him that under the Public Health Act there were strong reasons for supposing that the Board of Guardians had power to assume the responsibility for supplying water to and lighting the town, which the Town Commissioners previously possessed. It was stated in the reply which the Board of Guardians received from the Local Government Board, on the 28th of April last, that there was no power in them to light the town, which, by the Public Health Act, was confined solely to the Local Authorities. But Section 80 of the Act gave power to the Sanitary Authority to contract for lighting, and even to purchase gas works, and, therefore, he was of opinion that the Board of Guardians were entitled to contract for the lighting of the town. He would also call the attention of the hon. and learned Gentleman to the words "duly authorized" in the connection in which they stood in the 232nd section of the Act, which clearly implied that the Board of Guardians had power to light the town. For his own part, he thought that, under various provisions of the Public Health Act, it was clearly established that the Board of Guardians could assume the exact functions which the Town Commissioners had ceased to exercise. He could quite understand that it might be inconvenient for the hon. and learned Gentleman to reply upon this question at the present time, because he (Mr. Kenny) had introduced the subject without any previous Notice. He understood that the question was rather an involved one, and that the cases which had arisen under the Act of Parliament were very intricate and complicated, and therefore the hon. and learned Gentleman would probably prefer to reply on the point he had raised on a future occasion. Still, as his constituents were extremely anxious to know in what position they stood in reference to this matter, he should be obliged if the hon. and learned Gentleman would state the day on which it would be convenient that such reply should be given.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. WALKER) said, this was probably the first time that the question brought forward by the hon. Member for Ennis (Mr. Kenny) had been raised since the Act was passed under which the Town Commissioners ceased to exist. Prima facie he did not think the Board of Guardians had power to light the town. However, he was aware that some difference of opinion existed on the matters to which the hon. Member had referred, and if the hon. Member would place a Notice on the Paper, he would undertake to answer it in detail on Friday next.

Mr. DAWSON said, he must ask the Solicitor General for Ireland, as the Legal Representative of the Irish Government, to give an opinion on the power of the auditor to make a distinction with regard to surcharging public officers in cases where they expended money on different public objects. What powers had they to distinguish between money spent on presenting an Address to Her Majesty, and money spent, say, upon opening an important public Exhibition?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. WALKER) said, it was the duty of the Auditor to exercise his discretion and legal knowledge in striking out payments that he deemed to be illegal. The auditor might be right, or he might be wrong, in deciding on a particular charge; but he would point out that a two-fold remedy was provided—first, by an appeal to the Local Government Board, who, after consultation with their legal advisers, might decide whether an auditor was right or wrong; and, secondly, by an appeal from the Local Government Board to the Court of Queen's Bench by writ of certiorari. It was clear, therefore, that the law provided ample remedy in case of error on the part of the auditor.

MR. GRAY said, with all respect to the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland, he did not think he was quite right in the view he had taken of the remedy open to public officers who were surcharged by the auditor of the Local Government Board. The hon. and learned Gentleman had described that remedy as two-fold; but his recollection was that the exercise of one part of the remedy precluded the use of the other. They might appeal to the clemency of the Local Government Board with reference to the question of law, or, at their own instance, they might seek to have the question decided at law; but they could not first appeal to the consideration of the Local Government Board, and then, if the result were unfavourable, proceed in the Queen's Bench. He was anxious to make the position clear with reference to this point. His opinion was that the remedy was not two-fold, as the hon. and learned Gentleman had described it to be, but alternative. The hon. and learned Gentleman said that the auditor was entitled to exercise his discretion as regarded the legality of certain payments, and that the word "unfounded" meant unvouched, not unjustifiable; that was to say, the auditor was only entitled to consider whether the payments made were illegal payments or not. For instance, one might conceive it to be perfectly proper on the part of the Local Authorities to send a deputation, at their own expense, to congratulate Her Majesty under certain circumstances, or to open an Exhibition; on the other hand, it might be, in the opinion of other persons, improper to send a deputation for any trifling purpose. Now, he said that if the auditor was not to have regard to the test of the discretion of the body in question, but was solely to be restricted to the consideration as to whether the expenditure was legal or not—if that were so, he contended that nothing could well be more unsatisfactory, because the auditor was found often to forget that he was a public official, to seek to place himself in the position of the elected representatives of the ratepayers, and to say whether such or such an expenditure was or was not extravagant and imprudent, besides occasionally surcharging, not because he thought the expenditure illegal, but because he did not like it. For instance, the auditor, on one occasion, surcharged the fees paid by the Dublin Corporation to Messrs. Ellis and Sons, solicitors, for appearing, on behalf of the Council, before the Recorder of Dublin, on the ground that they had a regular law agent, although that gentleman was then engaged upon important legal business in London. Now, he felt sure that the legal mind of the Solicitor General for Ireland would revolt from that exercise of the auditor's discretion. There was an appeal, undoubtedly, to the Local Government Board, and that appeal might decide the matter, not on the point of law, but on the point of whether the expenditure was one which they approved, or otherwise; and there was an appeal to the Court of Queen's Bench, in which a great deal of money might be unsuccessfully spent. But there ought, he contended, to be some means by which a local body, without expense or formality, could obtain a legal decision with regard to the legality of surcharges by auditors of the Local Government Board. It was not sufficient that the Local Government Board should, in some cases of surcharge, be able to tell the auditor to say no more about the matter. There ought to be more than that; there ought to be responsibility on the part of the auditor. The law, as it stood, would amply provide against any absolutely improper application of the funds. There ought to be such a remedy as an application to the Court of Queen's Bench for a mandamus or some other means of recovering the money. Further, he thought that a Government official should not have the right to interfere at all between the ratepayers and those who expended the public money. He was of opinion that there ought to be a double remedy—first, an application on the merits of the case to the Local Government Board, and, failing that, an application to the Court of Queen's Bench. With regard to the case put by his hon. Friend the Member for Carlow (Mr. Dawson). Here was an instance in point. Money had been spent by a public body on two objects—in the one case upon a deputation to congratulate Her Majesty upon certain circumstances, and in the other upon the opening of an important public Exhibition, and the auditor stepped in and said—"I will allow the charge for the Queen; I will not allow it for the Exhibition." He did not think that the answer of the hon. and learned Gentleman met the case put by his hon. Friend.

Mr. ARTHUR ARNOLD said, having listened for some time to the complaints of Irish Members opposite, he felt bound to commiserate the state of their affairs. He rose on that occasion to say a few words with reference to what had fallen from the hon. Member for Carlow (Mr. Dawson), and other hon. Members, in regard to the question of surcharges by auditors of the Local Government Board. He had understood the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury to wish to lead the Committee to suppose—"No, no!"—at all events, the hon. Gentleman had led him to suppose that, in some circumstances, in England it was possible for such a matter to occur as the hon. Member for Carlow had alluded to. But no such thing had ever happened in England. There was no Government audit of the Corporation accounts of any municipal borough in England; and if the Corporation of any borough in England thought fit to come up to London at that time to congratulate the Prime Minister on the passing of the Representation of the People Bill through the House of Commons there was no power to surcharge the expense of such a visit upon those who incurred it. The auditors of Municipal Corporations were appointed by the Corporations themselves, their functions were clearly defined, and were limited to investigating whether or not the expenditure was met by the vouchers that were produced to them at the audit. He assured the hon. Gentleman that no such case could occur, with regard to any Corporation in England, as that described by the hon. Member for Carlow; and he did not see why the Corporation of the City of Dublin should labour under a disability which did not apply to any Municipal Corporation in England.

Mr. DAWSON said, he felt it his duty to press this question further upon the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury. He could assure the hon. Gentleman that the circumstances he had alluded to had created a very strong interest amongst the people of Dublin and of Ireland generally. In this matter of audit they complained that power was left to the auditor, who was not a lawyer, to decide upon his own judgment what he would and what he would not allow; in other words, it was left to him to say whether he would irritate and annoy the whole Corporation of Dublin, and put the people into a state of discontent with the law of the land. He was sorry to trouble the President of the Local Government Board, whose duties were so constant and multifarious; but he would be glad to know distinctly from him whether it was a fact that the Department had issued a request to the auditors who were engaged in carrying out the law in England that they would only surcharge what was not accounted for? The Irish Act contained the words with reference to surcharges "which he deems to be unfounded," and those words he (Mr. Dawson) contended ought to be restricted. The result of the present action of the auditors might well be that if the Corporations in Ireland could not send their officers to open a public Exhibition, which in the case in question, he believed, was under the patronage of Her Majesty the Queen and of the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, they could not send deputations of the other kind indicated—they might say they could not send deputations to condole with Her Majesty in her domestic bereavements, or to congratulate her on having escaped from the hand of an assassin, because they would have to bear the expense themselves. If they were told they must not employ their officers to open an Industrial Exhibition, as they would have to pay for it, why that wholesome custom would have to be discontinued. The point was, that the Dublin Corporation were allowed to send a deputation to London to present an Address of Congratulation to Her Majesty because the auditor said the expenditure was legal; but when they sent to Cork to open an Exhibition that would be useful to the people of Ireland the case was entirely different. This high-minded man said—"We will allow you to come to London and spend £50 on an Address to the Queen; but if you go down to Cork to open an Exhibition for the purpose of facilitating the development of Irish industry we will surcharge you every farthing." He therefore appealed to the painstaking President of the Local Government Board to take this matter up, and to prevent the further irritation of public opinion which the action of the auditors had produced throughout Ireland. Under the Irish Act an incompetent man often got to be auditor, and, in the matter of allowing expenses and expending the funds of the Municipality, took upon himself to tell the people what they should do and what they should not do, in spite of his want of knowledge on the subject.

Mr. COURTNEY said, he took part in the debate with great reluctance, and at the outset he felt it necessary to take exception to expressions made use of by the hon. Member for Salford (Mr Arnold).

Mr. ARTHUR ARNOLD said, he would withdraw any expression the hon. Gentleman thought out of place.

Mr. COURTNEY said, the hon. Member for Salford was not correct when he stated that any of these expenses could be borne out of the borough fund in England.

Mr. ARTHUR ARNOLD: I said that any expense out of the borough funds could not be made subject to surcharge.

Mr. COURTNEY: I do not say those were the hon. Member's very words. I say the argument of my hon. Friend was that the excessive expenditure at the discretion of Town Councils in England could not be questioned by the auditor.

Mr. ARTHUR ARNOLD: Not questioned in the same manner.

Mr. COURTNEY: It was asserted that in England the authority of the Town Council was not sufficient to cover the expense incurred by the Town Council. The question was opened in England, although in a different manner, as was seen in the case of the Corporation of Sunderland.

Mr. GRAY: The action of the Town Council was questioned in a Court of Law.

Mr. COURTNEY: Precisely. No doubt the auditor in Ireland is able to question the accounts and surcharge illegal expenditure; but is his action final?

Mr. GRAY: Yes.

Mr. COURTNEY said, the statute which created the auditor's duties provided two means of redress and getting the auditor's decision corrected—one way by applying to the Local Government Board for a reconsideration of the auditor's decision, and asking that, if necessary, the auditor should be superseded, and the other way precisely as in England—by applying to the Court of Queen's Bench for a writ of certiorari. Those were the remedies afforded by the Statute. The first seemed very simple—namely, to appeal to the Local Government Board—and it involved no expense whatever. In the case in question no remedy had been resorted to. It was not for him to question the consistency of the decisions in the matter of the various expenses of the Dublin Corporation, some having been surcharged and the others allowed. Possibly the Corporation would come to the conclusion, after what had occurred, that if they were not to be permitted to spend money for one purpose they would not spend it for another.

Mr. JESSE COLLINGS said, one was struck by such speeches as they had just heard with the want of knowledge of the Members of the Government as to the nature of local business. He thought it should be necessary for a man before he became a Minister to serve an apprenticeship of not less than three years in one of their local Municipal Corporations, or that Parliament should occasionally meet in one of their large Provincial towns, in order to get out of the miserable atmosphere of London and acquire some knowledge of local affairs. There was nothing worse—there was nothing more irritating than this auditorship in large towns. An auditor came down to Birmingham, or Manchester, or Liverpool, to audit the School Board accounts, and took off, say 1s. 6d., for a cab which some unfortunate individual had seen fit to hire in the performance of his duty in connection with the School Board. His hon. Friend (Mr. Courtney) talked about "a remedy." But the hon. Gentleman must remember that an appeal, if unsuccessful, involved great expense to those who made it. He must also remember that election to a position on the Town Council no doubt carried with it a great deal of honour. ["Oh, oh!" and a laugh.] He expected cheers of that kind from Gentlemen who did not know the dignity of their municipal institutions; but he could assure them that the position was regarded by the leading citizens in their municipal boroughs as a high honour. That was to say, it was the highest position within their reach—the highest position in which they could serve their fellow-citizens and secure good local government. As he was saying, the position of Town Councillor, although it involved a great deal of honour, at the same time involved considerable responsibility. Added to these drawbacks, the responsibilities and sacrifices of public municipal life, they were asking by the remedy the hon. Gentleman suggested that men should get themselves out of a position of difficulty in which they had been placed by some official knowing nothing about the circumstances by appealing to London, very possibly getting themselves into expense. Take the Corporation of Birmingham, for instance, which had upon it a large number of men unable to bear heavy expense. Surely, it was a very hard position to place such men in, to hold them responsible for the repayment of the cheques required, if one of these auditors should come down and surcharge the expenditure. In his opinion no audit at all was required. Corporations were required to furnish accounts periodically—once a year—and they were scrutinized by the ratepayers, and that was a sufficient check. In Birmingham they had two local auditors who, so far as vouchers and so far as expense was concerned, were very considerate. It was necessary to get out of the minds of the Government and their law-makers this idea of centralization. That a man or two or three men shut up in a room in London could understand the wants or do justice to a particular locality in these matters of expenditure was absurd, and it should be got out of the minds of the Government. He on one occasion had been engaged in regulating a public meeting for a public object, and an action was brought against him. The Town Council decided to defend him. One or two individuals moved the Queen's Bench, or whatever it was in London, to prevent the charge for his defence being levied on the ratepayers; and the result was that the costs, amounting to £200 or £300, were put upon him. What right had anyone in London to say to the people of Birmingham, represented by their local Parliament—"You shall not do this thing; and your Chief Magistrate, who for no purpose of his own, but in order to secure good order in an action which the inhabitants compelled him to undertake to preside over, shall bear the expense of defending himself." What right had anyone in London to say that the people of the Municipality should not bear the expense of defending that Chief Magistrate? He thought the tendency of the House should be to leave the localities to help themselves, and to manage their own affairs. At present the state of things was simply like a nurse saying to a child—"I will never let you walk until you can walk properly." At least, let a child learn to walk. It must always have its falls and bumps; but they would teach it experience that would cease when it began to stand well. In the same way it was most foolish to keep Corporations continually in leading strings. He did not know Irish Corporations were subjected to indignities that English Corporations were free from, and if they were it was time the arrangement was altered. All bodies elected by the people should be let alone. The House might depend upon it that if they went wrong once or twice they would not go wrong a third or fourth time, for the ratepayers, or those who had to supply the money, would very soon insist upon those who had the spending of it awaking to a sense of their duty. To his mind they had quite enough to do in that House instead of meddling in all these little ridiculous things connected with subjects which they could not possibly understand. If hon. Members could see the ridicule in the locality itself attached to the proceedings of auditors sent down to audit the affairs of a Municipality they would be amused. For instance, the manner in which the expenditure of the School Boards was audited was regarded as a perfect farce. The expense of the salaries of these officers was regarded as an absolute waste of money, and he had no hesitation in saying that where £100 was spent on these officials they did not effect a saving of as many shillings. He knew cases where there had been grave doubt and serious reflection as to the accounts of a Municipality, and where in the end there had been about 2s. 6d. struck off for some simple matter. As to the remedy pointed out, that in a very small degree, if at all, alleviated the difficulty. It added to the expense, no doubt; and if those who appealed were unsuccessful the expense fell upon them—the poor Town Councillors. In this case there was no allegation of any fraud or mal-administration. But in cases where the representatives of the people spent money with the full approval of the constituents, and in the interest and for the benefit of the locality, if the auditor when he came down should happen to disagree with the item, possibly because of his over-officiousness, such representatives of the people would have to bear the expense. The ratepayers had a remedy in their own hands if anything wrong was going on with the accounts. They had the power of turning out the Town Councillors at the next election. The ratepayers knew what was going on—the auditor knew nothing about the borough. They wanted a species of Home Rule in England in these matters as well as in Ireland. Let the people in their boroughs manage their own affairs—it would satisfy the localities, and enable Parliament to devote more time to more important Imperial matters. He earnestly hoped the Government would take this matter into their consideration, and would move in the direction of putting a stop to all this waste and expense of auditing. He was conscious that there was a difficulty in the way of such a proceeding—namely, the idea the various Departments had of the advantages of creating new offices. The Departments were always anxious for an opportunity of creating a new office—they readily availed themselves of any pretence for such a proceeding. They all liked creating offices to which salaries of some hundreds a-year were attached, and in connection with which there were some duties to perform which they endeavoured to persuade the country were useful. All this sort of thing caused great dissatisfaction in their municipal boroughs; and it was a matter which when they had time, and when the Parliamentary atmosphere was clear of present legislation, the Government would have greater pressure put upon them to deal with.

MR. DAWSON said, the Secretary to the Treasury, who was nothing if not critical, in this case had exercised his criticism on matters with which he had not the slightest acquaintance. They had not taken action against the decision of the auditor in the case of Dublin, but they had in the case of Limerick. Limerick, in order to give effect and solemnity to the Industrial Exhibition, had also sent up to Cork their civic officers, and when the expenses of these officers were surcharged upon the Town Council an appeal ad misericordiam was made to the Local Government Board. This appeal met with no satisfactory response—the mission was not recognized as one for which the ratepayers should be allowed to pay, however they might desire to, because it was not a toadying affair. Limerick had applied to the Queen's Bench; but their surcharge was confirmed in a much more Governmental manner than it had been by the Local Government Board itself. The Municipality of Dublin, therefore, had been forewarned and forearmed. They had heard upon this subject a very powerful appeal from the hon. Member for Carlow (Mr. Gray)—a much more powerful description than they had heard in the interest of the Government on the other side. If English Members would only take the interest in these matters which they took in the affairs of the Soudanese and the Basutos, no doubt some satisfactory issue might result. If the Prime Minister said one word about the South African Natives, or the inhabitants of the Soudan, he raised a discussion at once, and the London papers teemed with the subject. He (Mr. Dawson) told them that Ireland was of more consequence to them than the Basuto tribes. He told them that the peace and goodwill of Ireland, which was set at nought, was of more importance to England than what occurred in the Soudan, or in the fate of General Gordon. He did not blame the English people at all for the attitude assumed by English Members in that House. If the English people were as thoroughly informed about the real status quo as they were about the remote and unimportant Colonies of the Empire, they would care more about the security, safety, and prosperity of Ireland. Therefore it was that the hon. Member for Carlow (Mr. Gray) and he (Mr. Dawson) had drawn this matter out of the small area of the Metropolis of Ireland, in which it originally rested. They had drawn the matter out of the small question as to the jurisdiction of the officer who supervised the accounts of Dublin for the time being, and who told the Corporation where they should go with their civic officers, and where they should not go with municipal deputations. He would ask the Secretary to the Treasury to secure, not only that knowledge of the Provinces of England which it was desirable that such an official should possess, but also a knowledge of the Municipalities of Ireland. The hon. Member might look upon these things as trifles, but he should not shut his mind to trifles, particularly where Ireland was concerned. Trifles were at the bottom of many human affairs, and trifles made the whole history of Ireland. He trusted that the discussion which the hon. Member for Carlow had raised would initiate a system of local and municipal government in Ireland which would be of vast value, not only to that country, but to the United Kingdom.

MR. GRAY said, he had scarcely hoped, when he mentioned this small matter, that the discussion would have blossomed into a Home Rule debate. He hoped some benefit would accrue to Ireland therefrom. He would like to give to those Gentlemen who had the experience of English municipal life a few examples, which were in his own recollection, as to the working of the present municipal system in Ireland. Some years ago they were building in Dublin a new bridge. At that time it was in contemplation, as it was needed at the present time, to carry out in the Irish capital a system of main drainage, something on the same principle, though on a more modest scale, as that which obtained in London; and, by the advice of the engineers, it was determined that culverts should be made when the bridge was built. The engineers advised them that if in connection with the building of the new bridge they were to make culverts in the main sewers, which they contemplated carrying along each side of the river, those culverts could be made at a very small expense; but that if they built their bridge, which was to be of stone, and subsequently attempted to tunnel under it, it would involve enormous expense, and possibly endanger the stability of the structure. They accordingly determined that, at the cost of £4,000 or £5,000, they would make the culverts while the new bridge was building. Anyone acquainted with municipal affairs would see that that was a wise determination to come to; but it did not commend itself to the Local Government Board official. They happened to have a capital fund at the time on account of this main drainage expenditure. Having that capital fund, and not having any immediate occasion for its expenditure, they decided to expend some portion of it in the construction of these culverts. That expenditure amounted to some £6,000. Well, the Local Government auditor, when he came to consider the various bearings of the matter, decided the legal point in his non-legal mind. This gentleman happened originally to have been a clerk—a very good clerk—but nothing but a clerk. This gentleman having read up certain Acts of Parliament, and having somewhat forced himself into the process, came ultimately to the conclusion that the Municipality ought to have levied a tax instead of spending the capital sum they had lying by useless at the time. This gentleman accordingly surcharged these individuals, not those who had authorized the payment, but those who had signed the cheques—surcharged them to the amount of some £6,000. It was within his (Mr. Gray's) knowledge that one of the gentlemen—a man of good social position and high personal character—there was no harm in talking about the matter now, for it was many years ago—happened to be in some temporary financial embarrassment. It became noised abroad that he had been surcharged, not with a share of the £6,000, but with the whole of it; and it was owing to the merest chance that, by reason of the surcharge of the sum expended in the interest of the citizens, this gentleman was not made bankrupt. For months, metaphorically speaking, this gentleman had to go on his knees to the Local Government Board to obtain, not freedom altogether from the charge, but a promise from the Local Government Board that they would not take legal steps to enforce the charge until they knew what the Municipality would do. He (Mr. Gray) wanted to know how long such a thing would have been tolerated in England—how long would hon. Members have been “loyal” if such a thing had taken place? In another case, the local Gas Company was endeavouring to obtain an increase of capital. The Municipality of Dublin was against it; but there was some difficulty in their petitioning against the Bill as citizens of Dublin, or as representatives of the citizens. The Gas Company asked for the increase of capital for some new purpose outside the City limits, and that was the reason for the opposition of the Corporation. The Company proposed to spend a considerable sum at the Port of Bray, where they had small gas works, and the money for the new operations would have come out of the general gas capital of the Company. The new works were to be the erection of piers at Bray. The Company had not reached their maximum charge, being 6d. under what they were entitled to charge by their Dublin Gas Acts. The Corporation argued in this way. They said that the expenditure of these thousands of pounds at Bray would be comparatively unproductive; they declared that the township of Bray, being a very small place, the consumption of gas would be very limited, and that the Gas Company, whether they made an unproductive gas expenditure or not, would take good care to maintain the 10 per cent interest they were paying their shareholders, and the only way they could do that, if they wasted money on Bray, was either by increasing or maintaining the existing prices of gas in Dublin. They, therefore, thought the Bill a dangerous one, and made up their minds to oppose it. They did oppose it, and opposed it successfully. Well, though they took that course, and, in their opinion, preserved the interests of their constituents, this clerk, to whom he had already referred, again examining into the law of the case, decided that they had no power to oppose the Bill, because the expenditure the Gas Company had proposed to incur would have taken place outside the city limits. This gentleman surcharged the members of the Corporation. That was more than they could stand, and they determined that they would fight him in the case. They considered it a most insulting surcharge, and determined to fight the auditor. They defeated him on this absurd point. It chanced that the Dublin Corporation ran a water pipe through the township of Bray; and they argued that because of that pipe they were citizens of the township, and entitled to a locus standi. Was this not absurd? He would only give one more instance. On one occasion a Lord Mayor of Dublin—a Mr. Bulgin—died in office. The Corporation were anxious to pay his memory as much respect as was in their power, and they voted that the Corporation and the officers of the Corporation should attend his funeral in State. The small expense they decided to go to was for black scarves for the official drivers and footmen, and to place black rosettes on the horses. The thing cost, he thought, 25s., and the auditor surcharged them all. Now, was that a thing to be surcharged? If the representatives of the citizens were sufficiently respectful to the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board and to his officials as to go down on their knees and beg them to be good enough not to surcharge them out of their own money, the probability was that they would remit the surcharge. But that was not a position in which the representatives of the citizens should be placed; and if they did not do that, they had to fight the matter in the Queen's Bench. The Secretary to the Treasury seemed to think that the position in England and Ireland was practically the same. In the one case what happened was this—There was an auditor—not a nominee of the Crown, but a man elected by the ratepayers—who had no power of surcharge, but, as he understood, only power of report. The auditor in England might report on any improper or extravagant expenditure, and say—“In my opinion, this was an expenditure which ought not to have been incurred;” and, therefore, any ratepayer who thought proper to do so could, at his own risk, go to the Queen's Bench. If the ratepayer be defeated, he would be required to pay his own costs and the costs of his opponents as well. What happened in the case of Ireland? The authorities must themselves go to the Queen's Bench if they wished to be relieved, and even if they were successful they must pay the expenses, not only of the appeal, but of the unsuccessful auditor; if they proved the auditor to be in the wrong, they were rewarded by being permitted to pay his expenses. Such was the difference between the systems which prevailed in the two countries. He trusted that the system of auditing in Ireland would be reconsidered by the Government, and that the present irritating and vexatious badgering would be removed. He believed that members of Corporations and of other Local Bodies in Ireland endeavoured to do their duty with regard to public funds as well as corresponding authorities in England did; and there was no reason why Parliament, by its laws, should declare its want of confidence in the authorities in one country, and its confidence in the authorities of the other country. Parliament should leave the ratepayers and their representatives to settle matters of this kind between themselves. Of course, if there be any improper charge, one involving anything of the nature of fraud or of solid and real illegality, a ratepayer should have his remedy by going to the Queen's Bench. A ratepayer had that remedy in England, but not in Ireland. But that the auditor should be the nominee of a Board of nominees, and generally a partizan, and, at the same time, to add insult to injury by compelling the local authorities to pay his salary, was rather too bad. It was, to say the least, irritating to a Corporation that they should be obliged to pay the man who surcharged them in sums not amounting, on the average, to £50 in the year. The Corporation of Dublin were required to pay a man £500 a-year for coming down and insulting them with these surcharges whenever he thought fit. That was not a system calculated to encourage healthy political life in Ireland; it was not a system calculated to encourage the best men to enter local representative bodies. Men of position and of self-respect would not tolerate these petty insults, they would not be bothered to go to the Local Government Board to make appeals to their mercy, or to go to the Court of Queen's Bench to fight, at their own peril, local points. As a matter of fact, the tendency of the system was to encourage the advent of inferior men, men who, far from doing what was required in the interests of the ratepayers, were likely to take an opposite course.

Mr. Gray

MR. KENNY said, that, when speaking earlier, he omitted to move a reduction of the Vote by £6,400.

THE CHAIRMAN: There is an Amendment already before the Committee. It must be disposed of before the hon. Member can move his.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question again proposed.

MR. KENNY moved to reduce the Vote by the sum of £6,400. His reasons for wishing a reduction of the Vote he had already stated.

Motion made, and Question put,

The Committee divided:—Ayes 21; Noes 105: Majority 84.—(Div. List, No. 174.)

Original Question again proposed.

MR. DAWSON said, that, owing to the fact that they had got no promise whatever from the Head of the Local Government Board as to whether he would take any steps to restrict the arbitrary power of auditors in Ireland, he (Mr. Dawson) now proposed to reduce the Vote by £500. Some English Members, as well as the Irish Representatives, had appealed to the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary, but, up to that point, fruitlessly. The right hon. Gentleman professed to have very great intimacy and knowledge of the various Departments; and he had displayed it that night in a remarkable manner. The hon. Member for Carlow (Mr. Gray) had pointed out that the auditors in Ireland had surcharged Corporations for undertaking patriotic work for the benefit of the citizens, and for no personal object whatever; he had told them that the Corporation of Dublin had been surcharged 25s., which they had expended in rosettes to be worn by the officials of the Corporation when attending the funeral of the Lord Mayor. The Committee had been told that whereas the Corporations of Dublin and Limerick were permitted without surcharge to send deputations to congratulate Her Majesty upon certain events, and to condole with her upon others, they were surcharged when they sent representatives to the Exhibition at Cork, an Exhibition which was destined to promote the industry and trade and commerce of the country. He would like the Chief Secretary, as the Head of the Irish Local Government Board, to tell them whether his Department had issued any order to the auditors in Ireland analogous to the orders which had been issued to auditors in England by the English Local Government Board? The orders to the auditors in this country were distinctly to the effect that they were only to surcharge in cases of negligence, or fraud, or matters obviously contrary to law. Would the right hon. Gentleman give an undertaking that he would cause the Local Government Board in Ireland to issue orders to the auditors in Ireland that would confine their actions within the limits of reason and prudence, in which the actions of the auditors in England were confined?

MR. TREVELYAN assured the hon. Gentleman that if the case he had just brought forward of the check which was put on the patriotic tribute paid to the Cork Exhibition by the Dublin Corporation had been brought before him at the time there was not the slightest doubt what decision he should have given in the matter. Indeed, he would look most carefully into the system of audit. The hon. Member had asked him whether the Local Government Board were prepared to issue instructions similar to those issued in England. The Board would examine those instructions, and if it was found that they were based upon just principles, they would have no objection to issue such instructions to the auditors in Ireland. His own desire was to leave, as far as possible, the discretion of all the local bodies unfettered; but he could not go so far as to say off-hand, in the course of a debate on the Estimates, that he disapproved altogether of a central audit on every occasion. He was inclined to believe that it would be a very great evil for the ratepayers in Unions if there was no system of central auditing. It was extremely probable that ratepayers might suffer very much what shareholders of Companies frequently suffered; their business might get into the hands of men who were not to be trusted, and who totally disregarded the interests of the ratepayers. Such things had occurred. Everyone would allow that if, in some of the Southern States of America, there had been in past years a more rigorous audit, the financial condition of those States would be very different from what it was now. The question of the abrogation of the Act of 1871—of the emancipation of Municipalities from audit—was one which he would like to consider very carefully. He should like to consider to what extent the English Municipalities were satisfied with the system of audit to which they were subjected before he removed the audit which in 1871 was imposed on Irish Municipalities.

MR. RYLANDS heard with great surprise that the Corporations in Ireland were subject to an audit. He was persuaded that a proposal to subject English Municipalities to a central audit would be looked upon with the greatest disfavour; and he should be glad to join in the expression of opinion that in Ireland it was desirable that Municipalities should be allowed to exercise their own discretion in the administration of local funds.

MR. ILLINGWORTH said, that what was claimed on behalf of Municipalities was that they should have absolute power over their own affairs. Members of Town Councils in the English Municipalities were elected by the entire body of ratepayers; they were as truly representative, and even more so, than the Members of the House of Commons. If there was no appeal against the decision of the House in matters of Imperial expenditure, he wanted to know why there should be an appeal from the decision of municipal authorities, and that appeal to a man who might be utterly ignorant of the policy of certain expenditure? The security against extravagance was that every three years the members of Town Councils had to go before their constituents. It must be borne in mind that there were always two parties in a Corporation, and that there was the greatest vigilance exercised by one party over the other. That also was a very great security against any corrupt expenditure. A Government audit would result in irritation and annoyance, and would afford no security against improper expenditure. It was not to be for one moment supposed that a Government auditor could understand the merits of large expenditure incurred by a Corporation on water, gas, sewerage, or other great works. He hoped his right hon. Friend's (Mr. Trevelyan's) mind would soon be disabused of the idea that any good could come from such interference in municipal financial affairs as took place in Ireland.

MR. RAMSAY said, he thought it right to remind his hon. Friends who were conversant with affairs in England that the school boards, which were representative bodies, were subjected to Government audit. It appeared to him somewhat strange that his hon. Friends (Mr. Rylands and Mr. Illingworth), who condemned a Government audit in Ireland, should themselves have sanctioned the same rule in the case of the English school boards.

MR. DAWSON said, he was sorry that such a venerated Member of the House (Mr. Ramsay) should have stumbled into a mistake. In England an auditor could only surcharge in cases where there was negligence, fraud, or something contrary to law. That was quite fair; but in the Dublin and other Irish Corporations the auditor's power of surcharge was not so restricted.

MR. GRAY said, he thought his hon. Friend (Mr. Dawson) ought to be satisfied with the assurance which the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary had given him. He (Mr. Gray) was satisfied that when the right hon. Gentleman looked into the question, he would see there was a substantial grievance which ought at once to be remedied. The right hon. Gentleman had made a very long and interesting speech, touching upon a good many points; but, still, he might have spared three or four minutes to deal with the points he (Mr. Gray) raised, and which, to his mind, at least, were worthy of attention. He did not expect that the Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Courtney) would have told them anything about the remission of these half salaries; but it was a grievance which, one day, would have to be remedied. They could not have in perpetuity a different system with regard to two practically identical bodies. It would be very much better that the Treasury should give the same sum in a different manner than give it as at present—namely, paying half the salaries of one set of officers of one Corporation, and paying nothing at all for a similar set of officers of a similar Corporation, simply because the one set were appointed at a certain date, and the other set not until after that date. It was a system which did not bear examination, and he trusted that, at least, between this and next year, the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Trevelyan) would give the matter his consideration. He (Mr. Gray) would certainly bring the question up again when the Vote again came on for discussion. With reference to the cost of the police he had nothing further to say, and should not press for a reply from the right hon. Gentleman, supposing the right hon. Gentleman did not see his way to giving a reply at once. But there was one matter which he felt bound to urge on the attention of the right hon. Gentleman, and that was, whether he would not consider the propriety of issuing a sealed order to the proper authorities, in view of a possible outbreak of cholera in Ireland? He put it to the right hon. Gentleman whether it would not be much better to issue such an order at once than to wait until the cholera made its appearance? A sealed order need not deal with all the subjects mentioned in the 49th section of the Act of Parliament. Such an order might be supplemented afterwards by another sealed order if, unfortunately, the necessity should arise. He would, at any rate, beg the right hon. Gentleman to consider the matter. He did not want a positive assurance upon it at the present moment, but merely an intimation that he would carefully consider the point he had thus raised, which, to put it briefly, was this—that, inasmuch as the Sanitary Authorities of Ireland would require time to carry the order into effect, and there would be little use in waiting until such time as the disease should actually make its appearance, if, unfortunately, that eventuality should come to pass—because any attempt to carry the order into effect by setting about the cleansing and scavenging of the different towns and cities when the disease was rife among the people, instead of being beneficial, would be the most dangerous thing possible—it would be infinitely wiser and more prudent to deal with the matter in advance.

MR. TREVELYAN: I entirely agree with the hon. Member who has just addressed the Committee. I think we have the power, and that we ought to exercise it, to separate the classes of subjects to which he has called attention, under the 49th section of the Act of Parliament; and I may state that the Local Government Board are prepared to issue at once to all the Sanitary Authorities throughout Ireland a Circular pointing out the necessity of exercising vigorously the powers already possessed in regard to the treatment of nuisances in their respective districts. That will be done under the ordinary law. But with regard to the Public Health Act, the 49th section of the Act of 1876, the first step has already been taken by communications that have been sent to all the large cities—such as Dublin, Cork, Belfast, and Waterford; and if the answers should be favourable, the policy to be pursued ought obviously to be to prepare and issue the instructions we are empowered to issue under the Act of 1866 with regard to the abatement of nuisances. With reference to the three other heads, it is also obvious that they must be kept in view. I was specially impressed with the hon. Gentleman's remarks with regard to appointments and promotions to Auditorships and Inspectorships. I think he did not speak especially of what has happened during the last two years. Since I went to Ireland I have always taken great interest in these proposals; and if the rule has not been absolutely unbroken, my desire would be to carry out what I think to be for the absolute security and efficient administration of the Department.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(3.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

CAPTAIN AYLMER said, there were one or two points to which he wished to call the attention of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant. The increase in the amount of the arrears of loans appeared to be very great, especially with regard to Ireland. On the present amount outstanding — namely, £777,000 — the amount of arrears had increased from £60,000 to £95,000 during the past year. That he regarded as very serious, especially as the increase of those arrears had been getting larger from year to year. The arrears under the Land Improvement Act had been raised from £30,000 in 1880 to £56,000 last year. That was a matter which required to be attended to. The subject, however, on which he had risen to speak was one which he thought required the special attention of the Chief Secretary's Department. The Commissioners of the Board of Works had specially to do with loans for the drainage of land in Ireland, and they had to see to these matters under the provisions of no fewer than 19 different Acts of Parliament. Seeing that the whole system of land in Ireland had been changed by the present Parliament, and that the owners of land in that country had no longer the same interest as formerly in borrowing money for drainage, now that the land was in the hands of the tenants, it was obvious that these loans were no longer in request on the part of the landlords. The Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant had this year brought in a Bill, because it was evident that the Irish Board of Works would not be able, in future years, to carry out the complete business of encouraging the drainage of Ireland as they had done under the old Acts. When the right hon. Gentleman brought in that Bill this Session, many of those who were specially interested in the subject looked forward to the prospect of its being passed with some satisfaction. It was founded on the Report of the Commission of which the noble Viscount the Member for Fermanagh (Viscount Crichton) was a Member. The Bill was blocked by the hon. Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar) and another Member, and the consequence was that it was now among the numerous measures that had been dropped. It had been announced as the intention of the Chief Secretary to endeavour to get the Bill read a second time, and then to refer it to a Royal Commission; and he (Captain Aylmer) wished to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he would not now consent to the appointment of a Royal Commission to consider the question of the arterial drainage of Ireland, and how the 19 Acts of Parliament, of which he had just spoken, could be consolidated, so that the Irish Board of Works, or whoever might hereafter be interested in the carrying out of a measure on the subject, would have an Act that would work well with the present system of land tenure? If the right hon. Gentleman assented to the appointment of this Royal Commission, he hoped it would not confine itself to the Report of the Committee to which reference had been made, nor to the various Acts that were in operation, but would go to what was the real point of the whole question—the arterial drainage of the country. If it did that, it would give great satisfaction, not only to the landlords, but to the tenants, and would add many millions of pounds to the value of land in Ireland. He hoped the Chief Secretary would consent to this proposal on behalf of Her Majesty's Government.

COLONEL COLTHURST desired to support the recommendation made by the hon. and gallant Member who had just spoken. Last year his hon. Friend the Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Courtney) had brought in two Bills; but unfortunately they had not reached a second reading. At the beginning of the Session he (Colonel Colthurst) had, almost from day to day, called the attention of the House to the question; but in deference to his hon. Friend (Mr. Courtney), who had made a very reasonable request, his Motion was withdrawn, on the understanding that the Bills which had been introduced should be referred to a Select Committee. Those Bills were, however, unfortunately dropped. Next Session, no doubt, the hon. Gentleman would re-introduce them; but the probability was that they would again be blocked, and the whole Session would again be lost. No one conversant with the question of arterial drainage could do otherwise than admit that the matter was one of the most pressing importance, and that without legislation on the subject nothing could be done. The conditions of the tenure of land in Ireland had undergone a complete change, and a new definition of owners was required, otherwise all operations under the Acts would be suspended, though he believed that the Report lately issued by the Commissioners of Public Works showed that five districts had been established this year. As far as it went, this was a great improvement on what had been going on during the last few years; but still improved legislation was required in order to render effective the legislation already existing. As far as his own opinion went, he did not consider that the Bills which his hon. Friend the Secretary to the Treasury had brought forward would have met the case. He thought they must have a Royal Commission. In such a body there would be a certain number of experts, and if they were to investigate the matter during the approaching autumn they might have their Report ready by February next, and a Bill could then be brought in giving effect to their recommendations. He knew that a very general consensus of opinion existed on this subject among all parties in Ireland, and he hoped his hon. Friend would see his way to giving his assent to the appointment of the Commission.

COLONEL NOLAN said, he did not altogether concur in the remedies which had been suggested. Five-and-twenty years ago there were immense arterial drainage works established in different parts of Ireland, and these works had done a great amount of good, having completely changed the face of the country. They all knew what advantages were derived from such works in Ireland. No doubt some of them were very expensive; but certainly many fully recouped themselves, and there was no doubt that if the system were further extended much good would be done to the country. Not only ought they to extend the arterial drainage of Ireland, but in the case of many properties a good deal more was required, as the drainage works stood in need of extensive repairs, such as were wanted about every 15 or 20 years. These were very costly. Under the present state of the law, two-thirds of the landowners must act together in order to form a Board; but at the present moment it was absolutely impossible to get them to do this. A great many would not answer the letters that were sent to them. He had made particular inquiries on the subject, and, as far as he could ascertain, not a single landowner would agree to act in the matter, although half the money was to be found by the Government. Recent legislation had intensified the unwillingness of the landowners to join in the carrying out of large drainage operations. In fact, the situation had become such that it was necessary to find some remedy. The hon. and gallant Member for Maidstone (Captain Aylmer) had reminded them of one remedy, which was, perhaps, not a bad one—namely, that the tenants should agree, and that they should form a Drainage Board. There was a great deal of good sense in that suggestion, and he (Colonel Nolan) believed that, in a great many cases, it would work well; but he would go further than that, inasmuch as it might be said that the proposition was too Democratic a one. Whether that was so or not, the present state of things was one of despotism. What he would propose was this. Whenever a sufficient number in a particular district should petition for the appointment of a Drainage Board, a qualified engineer should be sent down by the Board of Works, and that officer should be charged with the investigation as to whether it was or was not desirable that effect should be given to the Petition. This Petition might be presented either by a certain number of individual residents in the district, or by the District Board of Guardians, or any other recognized public body, and upon their Petition the investigation should take place. When the Report of the Engineer, sent down by the Board of Works, had been received, it would then be for the Board itself to decide whether a Drainage Board should be constituted. Some such system was now at work in Ireland. He would not say it was the only system; but he would repeat that it was now impossible to get a sufficient number of landowners to agree to act together for the reasons he had already stated. He would mention a case in point; it related to a small drainage work in his own district. They had dealt first with his own property, he having no objection to that being done, and the tenants being willing to pay the expenses; but the agent of one owner—a lady—said—“No; I will not advise the owner of the property to accede to what is proposed, as she has really no interest in the land.” The tenants came forward, all of them agreeing in the matter. They stated that all they asked was that the lady should give her name; but she would not do so. The land in that neighbourhood was extremely wet, and the tenants were very much impoverished, because there were no means of efficient drainage. Nothing, however, could be done, and that was one of the results of the operation of the Land Act in Ireland. What, he would ask, had the Government been doing? During the last two years they had made the most abortive attempts to bring in a Bill; but they had not been able to pass one. The consequence was that many districts in Ireland were being kept in a wet and swampy state, like a sponge, because the Government could not find the time to attend to the drainage, or in consequence of their busying themselves so much about the affairs of Egypt and other matters to which they gave almost their entire attention. The hon. Member for Newcastle (Mr. J. Cowen) once said the best thing they could do with Ireland was to dry it; and, for his own part, he (Colonel Nolan) had always considered that a most sensible remark; but, unfortunately, the Government would not take the advice. They had been asked to issue a Royal Commission to consider this subject. Let them do so, although the Committee knew very well what frequently came from the appointment of Royal Commissions. In the first place, they could not be got to report within a month or so; but the House had to wait for a year or a year and a-half before the Report was presented, and then, very frequently, nothing came of it. However, they might as well have a Royal Commission; it would be quite as good as the Government bringing in a Bill and then giving the House no time to discuss it in. A Royal Commission would be quite as good as that. Why the Government should act in so ridiculous a manner with regard to this important subject no one who had not been in the House of Commons, as he had been for a number of years, could understand. They never thought of asking the assistance of Members of Parliament, like his hon. Friend the Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell), or the hon. Member for Tyrone (Mr. T. A. Dickson), who could render valuable service; but they went to someone connected with the Board of Works, and the Board of Works, naturally enough, considered what was likely to give them the least trouble. All they did was to talk very wisely, and then suggest some impracticable scheme; and the Government were really showing that they were totally unfit to develop the material interests of Ireland in a matter which, to that country, was of vital importance. He did not confine this remark to the present Government,

The Conservative Government had been quite as bad, as they had never done anything to improve the drainage laws. The Shannon measure was perfectly ridiculous. The Government were warned by the Irish Members, and they found time to debate the Bill; but it was, as he had just stated, a ridiculous Bill. There was another point connected with this subject which had relation to the question of small ownership in Ireland. Her Majesty's Government were about to use their utmost efforts to pass a Household Franchise Bill, which was to apply to Ireland as well as to England and Scotland; and, at the same time, they were proving to the small landowners in Ireland that they were to be totally and entirely neglected. This was totally absurd, and just the sort of thing which led the country into all sorts of trouble, and tended to foster revolutionary ideas. They were going to give these men a vote, and yet leave them in this ridiculous position. A rich man could get a large loan with but little difficulty, and the position of the Government was that under the system which was now being carried out they were saving trouble. No doubt they were. But why should not several small tenants who wanted loans obtain them by combination. The Government would not grant loans of less than £50; and it was said that one of these small loans gave as much trouble as a loan of £1,000. He admitted that that was so; but there was a remedy, and if eight or ten men wanted small loans of from £10 to £20, the cost of inspection would not be more than in the case of a loan of £200. Why, therefore, should not eight or ten men be allowed to combine together? That, however, was refused at the present time. It was simply a question of the Government officials wishing to save themselves trouble. Why should the Government not consult the Irish Members on this matter? He would defy the Government to show where the difficulty would be in allowing 10 or 20 men to join together for the purpose of obtaining a loan for the improvement of property in the same district. The result was that where a small tenant paying £8 or £10 a-year wanted to execute some useful work, and went to his landlord in order to get the money, the landlord said to him—"You can hardly give security for a loan of £50;" and the man was very often unable to get the money, whereas if he were allowed to join with others he would be able to execute the works that were necessary for the improvement of his holding. Then there was another and a minor point connected with this subject. When a man was able to obtain a loan of £50 or £100, he was not allowed to spend the whole of it for drainage and building. He might get £50 for drainage or for building; but he would not be allowed to spend half of it in drainage and half in building. In old times, when loans were obtained by large landowners, it was extremely convenient to have one loan for drainage and another for building; but, nowadays, when they came to the case of the small owners who only wanted sums of about £50 to aid them in improving their farms it was a totally different thing. If a man only had a small farm, he might wish to spend £20 on buildings and £30 on drainage; but in that case he would not be allowed to have a loan at all. That was a point on which he thought the Government, looking to the altered circumstances of the country, might very well consider whether they could not provide some such remedy as he had pointed out. The proposition had nothing revolutionary in its character, but simply appealed to the common sense of the Government; and they could hardly wonder at the feelings induced in the minds of a large number of respectable men when they found that their wants were disregarded, and they were not allowed to acquire the means of carrying out essential improvements under any circumstances. He really thought the Government might do something to meet the wishes of the Irish people in this respect. He had never entertained any great amount of admiration for the Government of the day. At the present moment they were in want of demonstrations, and wished to see large numbers of men marching from place to place, in order that they might carry out a particular line of policy. He was only putting before them a reasonable argument in pointing out these things, although he must say he did not expect very much from them. His hon. and gallant Friends (Captain Aylmer and Colonel Colthurst) wanted the Government to appoint a Royal Commission; but if they did so it would be found that they would not get the Irish Members there. He should support the hon. and gallant Member for Cork (Colonel Colthurst) if he divided the Committee on the subject, for he feared that under the very bad Government they had in Ireland it would not be found possible to get the most common-sense proposals properly considered.

Mr. LABOUCHERE desired to call attention to a few points which he deemed worthy of consideration. In England they had a Board of Works with the right hon. Gentleman then in the Chair (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) at its head. The cost in Ireland was, altogether, a sum of £57,000, or, exclusive of the Land Act loans, £24,000. He would now ask the Committee to look at a few details. The First Commissioner of Works had a salary of £2,000 per annum; but in the case of Ireland they had a Chairman of the Board—the First Commissioner of Works in England having no Commissioners to act with him—receiving a salary of £1,500 a-year, and having the assistance of two Commissioners, who together received £2,400 per annum. That was to say, that what the First Commissioner of Works did for £2,000 was done in Ireland at a cost of nearly £4,000. Going further into detail, the first thing he came upon was the fact that there were in Ireland two classes of bookkeepers and clerks, including, as he perceived by a note at the foot of the page, one who was paid a special allowance of £50 for injured prospects. Could the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury tell the Committee what this absurdity really meant? The hon. Gentleman could not. For his own part, he (Mr. Labouchere) had not the most remote idea of what this item referred to. In England the First Commissioner had no architect under him. The work was done, probably under the right hon. Gentleman's own supervision, by clerks and surveyors; but in Ireland they had an architect; and he saw, by a note below, that this architect, who was put down as receiving a salary of £1,039, also received a second salary of £100 a-year as architect for the national monuments. Then there were chief surveyor and surveyors of buildings, principal draftsman and furniture clerk, and a superintendent of fuel and light, a gentleman who received an allowance to cover the cost of offices. Then they had a Board of Control for Lunatic Asylums, and there was also an architect receiving a salary of £300 per annum and a pension of £300 a-year in addition, as was stated in a foot note, on account of his having been late architect to the Poor Law Board in Ireland. What did that gentleman do for his salary of £300 per annum? Why did he get the large pension of £300 a-year? Probably he did nothing in either office. If some Irish Member would be kind enough to move a reduction of the Vote, he (Mr. Labouchere) would be most happy to support him. Everybody must see that these sums were perfectly preposterous. In all probability those officials were Englishmen, and, therefore, were not worth much; and in Ireland, no doubt, it was true that Satan found some work for idle hands to do.

Mr. COURTNEY said, the central point of the hon. Member's speech was the comparison between the Irish Board of Works and the English Board of Works, over which the First Commissioner presided. He would ask anyone who knew anything about the two Boards whether there was a single function that was common to the two. The functions of the two Boards were not at all similar, and had nothing in common. The Board in Ireland had to look after loans to railways, loans for tramways, land improvement loans, business with respect to drainage and piers, and a hundred other matters, with not one of which he suspected the hon. Member was familiar. The hon. and gallant Member for Maidstone (Captain Aylmer) had called attention to the question of arrears of loans, and in that matter the appearance was very much worse than the reality. The total indebtedness had not increased; but, instalments of principal having become due and not been paid, there was an apparent alarming increase in the amount of arrears. The matter had been under the consideration of the Government; but it was difficult to enforce the payment of the instalments. The Government would, however, spare no effort to reduce the total of the arrears. With respect to the appointment of a Royal Commission to inquire into the question of arterial drainage, he was afraid he could not share the anticipations as to the great advantages to be derived from such a Commission. If the Government had only to consult themselves and their own convenience, nothing would be easier or simpler than the appointment of a Royal Commission. That would mean the postponement of the question for a year; but this year the Government had introduced two Bills, one dealing with the powers of the Board of Works, embodying the recommendations of a Royal Commission. Had they advanced with that Bill because it was founded on the Report of a Royal Commission? On the contrary, it had been immovable, in consequence of objections of two Irish Members representing two sections of the House. He had agreed to let the Bill be read a second time, and to be referred to a Select Committee upstairs; and if that had been carried out, he should have been glad to have listened to the representations of the Irish Members with the greatest respect. As to arterial drainage, the Bill contained something which might be accepted if it were sent upstairs. Why did not Irish Members exert themselves so as to get this question dealt with upstairs? He did not believe that if a Royal Commission were appointed the Bill would be passed; but he hoped that next year something might be done.

Mr. SEXTON said, he thought the hon. Gentleman must admit that the Irish Members applied themselves as actively to their Parliamentary duties as hon. Gentlemen who received salaries for doing so; and if the hon. Gentleman would take some steps to advance the interests of Ireland, he would find that they would assist him. The hon. Gentleman prided himself upon accurate knowledge; but he thought the conclusions of the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) were more accurate than those of the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury, with all his knowledge. He greatly sympathized with the conclusions and the contention of the hon. Member, as he did with any hon. Member, whether English, Scotch, or Irish. The English Department of Works was much more important than the Irish; but, although a great many of the powers of the Government had been gathered in the hands of the Irish Board, and although its functions were very important, and its cost was very considerable, he believed the Board did very little good for the country. The hon. Member invited some Irish Members to move a reduction, and if he were now as he was four years ago he might be deluded by the hon. Member's suggestion; but he should not adopt the suggestion, for two reasons—first, he believed the hon. Gentleman's Radical mind was not robust enough to follow him into the Lobby; and, secondly, with regard to this Board of Works, he did not believe that any proposal for a reduction would be Radical enough for him; but if the hon. Member would move to abolish the institution altogether he should be glad to support him, and to go in for a cheaper institution. If any hon. Member wished to satisfy himself as to the defined functions of this Board, he would find that the Board was authorized to lend £920,000 for loans to Local Boards, Grand Juries, public buildings, harbours, railways, labourers' dwellings, drainage works, land improvement, repairs of fishery piers, lunatic asylums, and emigration. Emigration was an inevitable dish in every bill of fare for Ireland. If this Department, instead of being supine, cold, and callous, went energetically to work, it might do a great deal to lessen the pressure of poverty on the Irish people. There were vast tracts of land in Ireland which, at a moderate expense, might be reclaimed. But what had been done in the past year? One loan of £60,000 for reclamation. Why was there only one loan for that purpose in the year? Was it because of some impediment of the law? If it was not, then the Government stood self-condemned. If it was, they were almost equally condemned, because they ought to propose an amendment of the law. Then, with regard to National School teachers, 6,000 out of 7,500 were at that moment without suitable residences attached to the schools. He knew that many of them walked many miles; and many lived in houses, not in homes, but in rooms in a condition ruinous to morals and health. It was most difficult for them to live with that external respectability which was essential with anybody having to instruct children. The Local Government Board never troubled themselves to induce the Government to erect teachers' residences, and for these 6,000 teachers only 40 residences had been erected in the past year. Then, again, the Labourers' Cottages Act had been abortive; but if the Department had exerted itself, at least some labourers' cottages might have been erected. Again, as to the Sea Fisheries Act, the Commission, headed by the hon. Member for Waterford (Mr. Blake), had set to work, but too near the end of the financial year, and, as far as he was aware, not a stone had been laid towards the construction of any harbour or pier on the coast of Ireland. The Department admitted that there were 200,000 holdings in Ireland occupied by solvent tenants at an annual value of £7 who were entitled to come in under the Act and obtain loans up to £200,000; but how many loans had been advanced? If there were 200,000 persons entitled to have loans, the Department must advance more than £200,000 a-year if they were to make any real progress; but instead of encouraging these poor people, and explaining the regulations and conditions, the Department took pride in multiplying obstacles in the way of these men. If a tenant applied for a loan, at the end of three months' waiting he got a form to be filled up and sent somewhere; but if there happened to be a mistake in the paper it was sent back to him, and then he entered upon a ceremonial during which he was deluged by forms of all sorts. He had known men withdraw from application, after several months, utterly bewildered and broken-hearted. But there was no lack of zeal on the part of the Department when it was called upon to send people out of the country. Although there were only 163 Boards of Guardians in Ireland, the Board had sanctioned during last year no less than 62 loans and spent £11,000 for this purpose. They were empowered to spend £100,000 for that purpose under the Act, and so eager had the Board been to use that power, that, although only two years had elapsed since the Act was passed, no less than £87,132 had been allotted. He should like to have some information as to how many people had been sent away; whether any care was taken to provide the people with the means of living when they arrived in America; and whether it was true that the other day 600 men were sent back as assisted paupers? He would like to know, also, whether it was a fact that a capitation grant was still allowed to the Poor Law Officers in Ireland, and whether they still received 5s. a-head as a bribe from the country for every person emigrated?

Mr. H. H. FOWLER said, he thought there was a consideration underlying this question which the Chief Secretary had passed over. The question raised by the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) was not the amount of work the Board did in Ireland compared with what the English Board did, but the extravagance of the Board in Ireland in doing their work. That was an important question. It had been brought forward for several Sessions—namely, the question of national expenditure. If the present Government came in upon any question it was that of national economy; but he was bound to say that their promises had not been fulfilled. Every attempt made by hon. Members to reduce the national expenditure was ridiculed, and they were treated as if they were a set of foolish fanatics. They were led to believe that the Estimates were everything they could be; but the Government would find that the people of the country had not forgotten this question of national economy. The Conservative Party were working it up throughout the land, and the Government would find that this question would have to be faced, and that if they came back to Parliament with a majority it would make itself heard. He felt compelled to make these observations because of the statements which had been made. Every item in the Vote indicated wanton extravagance which ought to be explained, and he wished Irish Members to understand this. Everybody was extravagantly paid, and yet Members were expected to defend this before their constituents. He felt exceedingly aggrieved by the view which the Secretary to the Treasury had taken; and although he felt it was impossible to attempt economy in this Parliament, he hoped the time would soon come, under this or some other Government, when the national expenditure could be reduced.

Mr. DAWSON said, he wished to draw the attention of the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury to several items in the Estimate which required some explanation. There were, under the head of Salaries of the Staff, a number of discrepancies with regard to which he would like to hear a statement from the hon. Gentleman. For instance, in the case of the Secretary to the Board of Works, Ireland, the minimum salary of that official was stated to be £800, with an annual increment of £25. Now, that gentleman's salary stood last year at the minimum amount of £800, and, according to the scale of increase stated in the Vote, the amount of this year's salary ought to have been £825. It was, therefore, a matter of surprise to him that in one year—that was to say, since 1883-4—the salary should have sprung up to the maximum of £1,000, which sum was now asked for. The item certainly baffled his comprehension, and as no information whatever upon the subject was furnished in the Estimate, he must ask the hon. Gentleman by what extraordinary process of computation this sudden jump from £800 to £1,000 in one year had occurred? Then with regard to the first class clerks, there were three clerks of that class with minimum salaries of £320, rising by an annual increment of £20 to a maximum of £500. In their case it appeared that an operation entirely the reverse of that which had taken place with regard to the Secretary's salary had occurred. The salaries of the three first class clerks stood for the year 1883-4 at the total amount of £1,357, to which, if the increment of £20 each were added, or £60 in all, the amount would be £1,417; but the actual amount of their salaries, according to the Estimate, was £1,377 only. Here, again, was a remarkable discrepancy, and he would ask the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury to explain why it was that the Secretary to the Board of Works, Ireland, suddenly jumped up, as regarded his salary, to £175 more than his annual increment appeared to warrant, and why the three first class clerks had not advanced at the rate at which they were entitled to advance?

MR. COURTNEY said, in answer to the hon. Member for Carlow (Mr. Dawson), he believed he could satisfy the hon. Member with regard to the points raised in connection with the salaries of the Secretary and the first class clerks in the Department. The gentleman occupying the position of Secretary was formerly in charge of the accounts of the Office; he was the person who, as appeared on the next page, 181 of the Estimates, received £850 a-year in 1883-4 as Clerk in Charge of Accounts; on his retirement from that position he was promoted to the position of Secretary, which he now held. That being so, having been in receipt of £850 a-year as accountant, it was felt necessary to put him at once at the maximum salary of £1,000, at which he would remain. Then, with regard to the salaries of the three first class clerks, which the hon. Member had referred to, although he was not at the present moment able to give the actual details, he would point out that the apparent inconsistency might be explained—he could not, however, vouch for the accuracy of the explanation—on the supposition that two of the first class clerks were at the maximum of their salaries, or £500 each. That would make up £1,000 of the amount of £1,377, the rest of which might possibly be the salary of the one remaining clerk. With regard to the observations of the hon. Member below the Gangway, the question was whether the subjects he had drawn attention to were proper work for the Committee to be engaged upon in connection with this Vote. The suggestion of the hon. Member was that the work done by the Office of Public Works in Ireland was identical in character with that done by the Board of Works in England; but anyone who had heard the long list of items for the last year which had been read out by the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) a short time back must at once perceive that the two Boards were absolutely dissimilar. Any comparison of the two Boards was, therefore, misleading; and hon. Members were not, in his opinion, entitled to make any such comparison, unless they were at the same time prepared to examine the nature of the work done. Then, with regard to the argument made use of by hon. Members opposite, and reiterated by the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere). The hon. Member had imputed to the Board of Works in Ireland the duty of taking the initiative. But that was an entirely erroneous view of the matter; because the Board of Works took action on the applications made to them by certain persons, and it was a justification of their conduct if it were proved that the applications made to them had been dealt with. It was, therefore, no fault on the part of the Board of Works, Ireland, that they had made only one loan for the reclamation of land; and no case could be established against them until it was proved that a great many persons entitled to claim did make applications, and were refused. In the same way, with regard to the tenants who were supposed to have a right to receive loans under the Land Act of 1881, the question was not how many tenants were entitled to ask for loans, but how many had actually applied; and how many of those applications had been accepted or rejected. Looked at in that light, the case wore an entirely different aspect to that presented to the Committee by the hon. Member. The Board had started necessarily with an imperfect knowledge of the work to be done, and in the earlier part of the time considerable arrears, no doubt, accrued; but those arrears had, during the last year, been very considerably reduced. The number of applications under inquiry last year had been 1,486; but the number had since been very considerably brought down. The total number received to 31st March last was 6,600, and out of those applications 6,100 had been sanctioned. The effect, therefore, of the action of the Board of Works, Ireland, last year, had been considerably to reduce the arrears, to bring the new cases under consideration down to a smaller number, and to sanction a large number of loans. Hon. Members might ask whether the money had been paid, to which he replied that the money was issued as the work was done and certified. He did not think it necessary to go through every item touched upon by the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton). He would simply express his opinion that the action of the Board of Works, Ireland, had been reasonably efficient in dealing with the applications made to them; and, further, he had great satisfaction in testifying to the energy shown in conducting the work of the Department generally. There was, however, one branch of the work of the Office on which he felt it his duty to say a few words—namely, that in relation to the Fishery Commission. The hon. Member had referred to what had been done in respect of that branch, and he had blamed the Board of Works for not responding more readily to the action of the Fishery Commission. But what did the Report say? It showed that out of 39 applications for survey made up to the 31st of March last, 35 cases had been considered by the Board of Works, and that plans and specifications had been forwarded by the Board of Works to the Fisheries and Harbours Commission. On the 15th of February eight plans had been sent out, and the rest by the 15th of April, the interval having been, of course, occupied with surveys and work of that kind. The rest of the cases were referred back for change of plans, &c. Then with regard to the action of the Board with reference to another subject. An hon. Member had complained of the action of the Board of Works in respect of the Labourers' Act of last Session, and founded that complaint upon the Report which brought up their work to the 31st of March last. But the hon. Member must be aware that it was impossible for the Board of Works to have taken any action at all under the Act of last year, and that inability on their part formed a material point in the Report. The other reference of the hon. Member with regard to emigration related to the Local Government Board, not to the Board of Works, Ireland.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, he did not consider that the Office of the Board of Works were in any way to blame on account of the delay which had occurred in connection with the Labourers' Act of last year. The facts of the matter were—the Bill did not receive the Royal Assent until the month of August, and therefore even preliminary steps could not be taken under the Act at the very earliest until the month of September. He believed that he should be more correct in saying that no proceedings at all could take place before November, because the Boards of Guardians were not actually seized of the plan and purposes of the Act itself until that month. At an earlier stage of the discussion of that evening he had felt it his duty to call the attention of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland to the very serious vexatious difficulties which stood in the way of the operation of the Act in almost every particular. The hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury was, he presumed, familiar with the details of carrying out the Act in question; and he would, therefore, repeat to him his apprehension that there was very great danger, in the case of many of the proposed schemes which had already reached their final stage so far as the Board of Works and the Boards of Guardians were concerned, that those schemes would not be carried out at all owing to the difficulties placed in their way. For his own part, he was perfectly convinced that the Treasury would not insist in forcing upon the authors of these schemes an amount of taxation which rendered the erection of labourers' cottages practically impossible; and, therefore, he had reason to hope that the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury would add his valuable assistance to his (Mr. T. P. O'Connor's) endeavour to impress upon Her Majesty's Government the desirability of taking this matter immediately into their consideration. He would just make one or two observations with regard to the general question upon which the Secretary to the Treasury had spoken in reply to the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere). He did not think the Committee should be surprised or irritated by the amount of warmth displayed by the hon. Gentleman in this matter; the hon. Gentleman had only followed good example, and he would add that the Head of any Department who did not stand up to defend that Department with some vehemence was not worth his salt. The hon. Gentleman said he differed from hon. Members on those Benches. There was nothing in that to cause surprise to the Committee; nor did he at all blame the hon. Gentleman for being tempted into an unusual display of vehemence out of zeal for his subordinates. But there had been a sight witnessed by the Committee that evening which he thought was extremely significant and interesting. For the first time during the last four years there had been something like earnest assistance on the part of English Members given to Irish Members in their efforts to restrain extravagance in Irish Departments. Now, it was this which had caused the vehemence which the hon. Gentleman vented on the innocent observations of the hon. Member for Northampton. The moment the discussion of these Irish Estimates ceased to be the monopoly of Irish Members and was taken up by Members on the other side of the House, that moment the present system was doomed, and the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury knew it very well. It was during the Russo-Turkish difficulty, the parent of the present Liberal majority, that the Duke of Argyll made use of the expression—"My Lords are beginning to be found out." Let the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury consider that the phrase by which his Department was designated was—"My Lords, your Department is being found out;" and that the Offices under its control in Ireland were being conducted on a scale of extravagance that would not be tolerated for one moment in this country. But this Department was only one of many Departments where the same extravagance existed. There were more Judges than were wanted; more Secretaries, Presidents, and Vice Presidents than were necessary; throughout every Department the same vicious system ran—namely, that of tempting English officials into the ranks of the Irish Civil Service.

Mr. LABOUCHERE said, he did not complain of the remarks of the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury, who, if he were not a Government official, he had no doubt would have supported his hon. Friends and himself in pressing this matter on the consideration of the Government. Situated, however, as the hon. Gentleman was, he had to give some reason, good, bad, or indifferent, for every job perpetrated by the Government. He was not in the least surprised that Irishmen knew more about what went on in Ireland than the Secretary to the Treasury, and Irishmen who lived in Ireland had one and all protested against the general extravagance in regard to the pay of all Irish officials, and particularly in regard to those whose salaries the Committee were now engaged in considering. And yet the hon. Gentleman came forward and, in defiance of the wishes of Irish Members, said that the system was a proper one under which large sums of money were spent upon officials in Ireland who were not wanted in Ireland, and whose salaries were higher in proportion than those of the officials who did the same work in England. The hon. Gentleman did not answer that complaint of hon. Members, and why? Because he knew absolutely nothing about the matter. He asked the hon. Gentleman why there should be an architect appointed to the Board of Control and the Board of Lunacy at a salary of £300 a-year, when there was an architect appointed for the whole Board of Works who received a salary of £900 a-year, and a special allowance of £200, as well as another £100 a-year a sarchitect for National Monuments. And he further asked the hon. Gentleman why he received the latter salary obviously for doing nothing, and if he also received £300 per annum for another office which he once held under the Poor Law Board? He had been under the impression that the official in question was not to receive a pension; but it now appeared that he was getting £300 a-year in respect of an office with which he had nothing to do. It was in that way these things were done, and if the matter in question were looked into, it would, no doubt, be found that this person was a relation of someone who had done something in the interest of the Government, and that giving him the office was an act of mere Party bribery. He did not say that the present occupants of the Treasury Bench were one whit worse than the Gentlemen who sat opposite them. He could see exceedingly little difference between Parties in that respect; but his great objection was that whenever a job, be it big or little, was perpetrated it was done at the expense of the nation.

MR. KENNY said, it would appear from the statement of the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury that the officers of the Board of Works in Ireland were perfect individuals. The hon. Gentleman defended each item, and he endeavoured to prove that in every respect the officials whose actions had been questioned on both sides of the House discharged their duties perfectly. But he ventured to say that if each item were examined in the light of the Report which had been presented to the House for the year it would be found that there had been a deplorable failure on the part of the officials in question to meet the reasonable expectations of the people, with regard to the question of the Fishery Boards and Harbours Act of last year. The statement of the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury a few minutes since, that of 39 schemes sent forward only two were in course of being carried out at the present time, was, in his opinion, the most eloquent condemnation that could possibly be passed on the Board. He was obliged to say that the boast of the Secretary to the Treasury, that with regard to 35 of these schemes plans and specifications had been forwarded, was somewhat premature and misleading, because he (Mr. Kenny) perceived that of eight of those schemes specifications had not been sent on; so that he apprehended there was a mistake somewhere. For his own part, he should be sorry to admit that the hon. Gentleman's estimate was accurate. He passed now to page 28 of the Report, on which it appeared that £13,275 had been advanced this year to a Mr. Drinkwater for reclamations. It appeared from the Report that the works were commenced in 1873, and the Report went on to say—

What did that mean? Did it mean that Mr. Drinkwater had broken his contracts? It would appear so, and that the Treasury had no satisfaction whatever for his having done so. The Secretary to the Treasury had given the Committee nothing in the nature of an explanation of this extraordinary transaction, which certainly had the magnitude of a public scandal. Hon. Members on those Benches would like to know whether Mr. Drinkwater was still responsible for the loan; how much money had been expended on the works, and what security the Treasury had that this money would be repaid? Passing from this transaction, which required to be cleared up, there was another matter to which he desired to refer. What was the extraordinary expenditure in connection with the Labourers' Act of last year? They had the following items:—One Assistant Commissioner, £800; one Examiner, £300; three Draftsmen, £240; 36 Inspectors at £300, £10,675; travelling expenses of Inspectors, £6,500; advertising, £3,000; registry of loans, £1,500. It was the function of these gentlemen to prepare Reports as to loans amounting to £200,000. It appeared, therefore, that the preliminary expenses made a charge of 7 per cent on each loan before it was granted. Such a waste was to be deplored. The manner in which the Labourers' Act had been, so to speak, paralyzed by the extraordinary demands of voracious officials was a thing they ought to have some explanation of. There was nothing.

more deplorable than the manner in which the public officials in Ireland ate up enormous slices out of the money that was granted in the shape of loans by Parliament for the purpose of carrying on public works. He hoped the Secretary to the Treasury would be able to give them further information as to fisheries, though he did not think he would be able to do so. Whether or not, he trusted the hon. Member would be able to give them some information as to the other matters to which he had drawn attention. There was another question to which he would like to advert—namely, the inspection the Government were bound to make of those schemes which were prepared under the Tramways Act of 1861. He saw a lot of bogus schemes on the Paper, that from the commencement had never had a chance of being carried to a successful issue. These schemes were prepared by men of straw, by men who were nothing but swindlers who came from England. Such practices should not be allowed to go on. As he said, they were nearly all Englishmen who came over to Ireland to carry on their swindles, and it was a scandal that they should be allowed to thrive with impunity on the unsophisticated people of Ireland.

MR. WARTON said, he did not want to go into these questions as to the Poor Law Board of Ireland; but he desired to call attention to the persistency with which the Secretary to the Treasury insisted upon putting into the Estimates arithmetical puzzles and absurdities, and the innocent manner in which he offered explanations. He (Mr. Warton) was not going fully into these questions, because they had been gone into by the hon. Member for Carlow (Mr. Gray); and he had no doubt that everything the Secretary to the Treasury had said in reply to that Gentleman, with regard to the persons promoted from one post to another, was, from his point of view, perfectly right. That was not the question. Because the hon. Gentleman could give a reasonable account of the promotion of an official he thought he was answering the whole question; but that was not so. These Estimates should be arithmetically correct, and no explanation as to the virtues or excellence of a certain official was a reason for financial absurdities. They had an item of four second-class clerks with maximum salaries of £300, rising by annual increments of £15. The total was £1,239, or £39 more than the maximum of the four clerks, which would be £1,200. The item for 1883-4 was £1,204, and he should like to know how the difference between that sum and £1,239 could be made up by any increment of £15? Then they had an item showing that in 1883-4 the minimum salary of the Secretary was £800. It should have risen to £850, the increment being £25; but here they had an item of £1,000 put down for 1884-5. The Secretary to the Treasury should be ashamed of putting such absurdities in the Estimates, and he (Mr. Warton) felt it his duty to protest against the system. That was not the first time or the second they had had such Estimates prepared.

MR. COURTNEY said, he was sorry the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Bridport was not satisfied with the explanation he had given. He (Mr. Courtney) might be open to censure; but the explanation was that the person appointed to the post of Secretary was a gentleman receiving a salary already above the minimum of the post—he was a gentleman transferred from one post to another, of course on full pay. With regard to the question put by the hon. Member for Ennis (Mr. Kenny) as to the cost of working the Land Act of 1881, he was afraid that the expenditure was necessary in the nature of things. It was necessary that they should have Inspectors to visit the localities, in order to ascertain the nature of the proposed improvements, and report upon them. It was obvious, therefore, that the expense of the Commissioners must be considerable in proportion to the work they did. They still took security for the due execution of the work. The hon. Gentleman put a question as to the Clare slob reclamation. He (Mr. Courtney) thought he had explained how that stood. The scheme as originally promoted was promoted by private individuals, and promised to be a great improvement and a work financially profitable. It was eventually ascertained, however, that it would be much more expensive than had been supposed. The works did not go on, and further loans were necessary to carry it through. Even after further loans were granted the work was not completed, and then an additional payment of three-fourths was granted. An Inspector of the Board of Works was sent down to see that the work was done.

Ms. KENNY: Was the Inspector constantly there?

Mr. COURTNEY said, he was not there every day; but week by week he went down to examine the work done. Finally, the Board of Works had been obliged themselves to take the work over. The operation had proved to be a loss; but it was one of those things they had been constantly urged to undertake—that was to say, in this case, as in many others, they had been constantly invited to grant loans for the reclamation of land which was covered with water at high tide. These things were often recommended as profitable reclamations, but frequently turned out to be a loss. In this case the work was carried out at the expense of English capitalists.

Mr. ARTHUR O'CONNOR: How much capital was invested?

Mr. COURTNEY: £20,000; the figures have been given over and over again in answer to the hon. Member for Ennis.

Mr. ARTHUR O'CONNOR: Did they not become bankrupt?

Mr. COURTNEY said, they liquidated, and the whole matter was inquired into. There were many cases of precisely the same character, and the Government had to be continually on their guard. In the matter of the tramways, the Board of Works was executing the duty thrown upon it by Parliament. When the scheme for the construction of the tramways was brought under their notice they had no option but to proceed to make an inspection for themselves, and to estimate the cost of the work, so as to be ready to satisfy the Grand Jury, and to put the case before the Committee of Council. The action of the Board of Works might have been imprudent; but it was altogether due to the Act of last Session, which the hon. Member himself had heartily supported.

Mr. HARRINGTON said, the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary, with considerable ingenuity, made himself out to be completely innocent of Irish feeling as to this Vote. He did not know whether the right hon. Gentleman would feel offended with him for saying so; but "where ignorance is bliss 'tis folly to be wise." Certainly, if the right hon. Gentleman found it his duty to defend the system carried on by this Board for so long, he (Mr. Harrington) could only say that it must be a matter of bliss to the right hon. Gentleman if he did not know that the functions of the Board towards the Irish nation were of the highest importance. The right hon. Gentleman was ignorant of the fact that, if the Board moved with anything like the progress they had a right to expect, it would be of immense advantage to the country, instead of being, as it was, a drag on every movement for its real improvement. When a scheme of any kind passed through that House, no matter how urgent was the necessity for it, and how pressing was the case which had been made out—however great the necessity in Ireland might be—the administration of the scheme was at once confined to that Irish limbo called the Board of Public Works. It was practically many years after a scheme had obtained the sanction of Parliament that it began to show its head above the surface of social and political life in Ireland. Last year, by the energy and zeal of the hon. Member for Waterford (Mr. Blake)—whose services he (Mr. Harrington), as an humble Member of the Party, regretted extremely to hear they were about to lose—a very excellent Bill was passed through the House for the erection of fishery piers. It was provided that a sum of £50,000 or £70,000 for the first year, and not more than £50,000 each succeeding year, should be expended on fishery piers and harbours. What was the story the right hon. Gentleman had to tell them? Why, that not a single stone of any pier had yet been laid. Only two schemes had been prepared—two efforts had been made; he supposed he might say that two stones had been laid; perhaps the divers in these cases had gone down and sounded the bottom. He would appeal to the hon. Gentleman who had charge of the passage of the Bill, and who had taken upon himself, without remuneration, the onerous and important duties of Chairman of the Commission for the carrying out of the work, and to which, to his (Mr. Harrington's) knowledge, the hon. Member had devoted a great deal of energy and labour—he would appeal to him, in his position as Chairman of the Commission, to know whether anything had been done on these important schemes which had occupied the consideration of Parliament last year. The hon. Member might not find himself free to stand up and take part in a debate; but he (Mr. Harrington) would challenge him to say whether anything had been done. Why was the time of Parliament occupied with this matter last Session, if there was not immediate and urgent necessity for the passing of the Bill; and why was it that this scheme, to obtain its first growth and sanction in Ireland, had been for the past 12 months winding its way through the circuitous route of the routine of this Board? If there was anything in the whole system of government in Ireland which excited the ridicule of the Irish people, who were peculiarly sensitive on matters of this kind, it was this same Board. They knew perfectly well that when a man applied for a loan under it his hair grew grey, practically, before he could succeed in getting the first instalment; and that, when he did succeed in getting one, the work which he wished to carry out, and part of which he might have carried out, was utterly useless, because of the period which elapsed before he got a second instalment. The circumlocution which was practised as to the first instalment was practised as to the second. He found that after he had laid a foundation he was struck idle, waiting until the lethargic officers of this public Body found it convenient to set themselves again in motion in order to give him a second instalment. The right hon. Gentleman, of course, had quite a style of his own of meeting charges of this kind—a style which seemed to be satisfactory to a great many Members. It was well for him that he had only the British House of Commons to deal with, and that it was not necessary for him to put himself before the people of Ireland. In this matter, however, the right hon. Gentleman would find that, if he were confronted, not only by that House, but by the people of Ireland on this question, the laugh would be all on the other side. Everyone had condemned the existing system in Ireland. A few petrified officials had been allowed to continue in office after they had grown unfit for their duties a decade at least. It was admitted by the Board that these officials were unfit to discharge their duties, and yet the Government left them in possession of them. A Commission was appointed in 1878 to inquire into the working of the Board, and he found in the Report of that Commission certain comments made upon the action of this Board. Hon. Members opposite seemed to be paying some attention to this subject, much more than they generally paid to questions raised by the Irish Members; and he would, therefore, invite their attention to this. It appeared that up to 1860 the Report, which the right hon. Gentleman had quoted, said the Commissioners had held four meetings with tolerable regularity. The minute book was duly kept, and the minutes received the counter signature of the Secretary in the usual way. During the next two years, according to the Report, the new minutes entered were minutes of transactions in the Office rather than transcriptions of the Board, and such formalities as the attesting signature of the Secretary were dispensed with, though on what ground those who made the Report were unable to say. The Report went on to say that at last traces of Board meetings disappeared, and it had not been customary for the Commissioners to hold formal sittings. He did not know how much weight that Report had had with the Government, or what effect was given to the recommendations of the Commission; but with regard to some of their recommendations the House was in a position to judge in the matter, and hon. Members knew that though the Commission had suggested the retirement of the Chairman, a length of time was allowed to elapse before he could be removed out of the way. The retirement of the Secretary was suggested; but he was allowed to remain in office for eight years after the Commission had suggested his retirement, and had practically pointed out that he was unable to fulfil the duties that he was entrusted with. If this Commission had to discharge a merely formal routine business, there would not be much ground for complaint; but that was not the case. There were many such bodies as this in Ireland. The Government was in the habit of rewarding its servants with payments of this kind, and hon. Members from Ireland would not object so much if they did not happen to be a drag on every movement for the improvement of the people, and for the improvement in the resources of the country. He had touched upon the action of the Board with regard to the Fishery Commission. The right hon. Gentleman had certainly given extremely scant satisfaction with regard to that; he had not in any manner explained to the Committee why it was that of the £70,000 which they had been allowed to believe the Government would have expended, scarcely 1*d.* had been expended up to the present time.

An hon. MEMBER: £6,000 has been spent.

MR. HARRINGTON said, he was told that £6,000 had been spent; but what was that out of £70,000? Was this supineness and lethargy owing to the fact that the Board had too many duties placed upon its shoulders? If it had too many duties imposed upon it, why was not that stated to the House, and why did not the Board refuse to do the duties, and why were not those duties handed over to some other Department? But if, as was believed in Ireland, the whole system was wrong, and that the men at the head of it were unable to discharge the duties entrusted to them through not having been trained to the work, and if they had no means of grasping or dealing with the difficulties of their position, why was not some effort made by the Government to clear them all away, bag and baggage, and establish in their place some cheap and fast method of dealing with this matter? As to the system of inspection in connection with the improvement works carried on, he remembered that large loans were obtained from the Treasury through that Board in 1879-80, when the landlords in Ireland were so exceptionally favoured as to get at a nominal interest very large loans, ostensibly for the purpose of giving some employment to people in the country, but really for the purpose of improving their own property. Cases were numerous where people could point out that landed proprietors in Ireland were taking large sums of money from this Department to effect certain improvements on their land, and that not a single 1*d.* of the money had ever been expended for the purpose for which it had been obtained. They were able to get from the Treasury money at the rate of 1 per cent; but they used it for whatever purposes they chose. He challenged the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to deny that half the money that had been so raised was applied to the purposes for which it was lent by the House. There was not a county or district in Ireland where the people could not tell them that landlords living there had obtained loans for the drainage and improvement of their properties; but that not a single 1*d.* of the loans had been expended with that object. Sometimes a slight pretext was made of doing something; a few holes were dug in the ground here and there in which to plant trees; but the trees were never planted, the holes remaining unfilled. Everything that the Board touched it corrupted. There was no Board in Ireland more odious to the people, not because of the political influence it had, not because of any objection, personal or otherwise, they had to the men—they were mere nobodies, so far as the people were concerned—but because any measure which passed through the House of Commons, and which had any connection with money, was sure to be consigned to limbo by the Board of Works.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR asked the Secretary to the Treasury if he could now say what had been the result of the survey of the basin of the Barrow, which had been in the hands of the Board of Works for a long time? The valuation had now been received, and the Secretary to the Treasury had promised that it should be laid on the Table almost immediately.

MR. PARNELL: Can the hon. Gentleman state the substance of the Report?

MR. COURTNEY was sorry to say that the matter was in a very unsatisfactory position. Mr. Fitzgerald had not done all the work expected from him. He had a letter from that gentleman addressed to the Secretary of the Office of Public Works, and dated the 15th of this month. Mr. Fitzgerald said—

“In reply to your letter received on the 14th instant, I can only repeat what I have before informed you—namely, the impossibility of my naming the time for the completion of my valuation.”

The fault, therefore, was not with the Office of the Board of Works, but with Mr. Fitzgerald, who was not a Government official, as the hon. Gentleman knew. It would be impossible to have the Report ready to lay before the House before the end of the Session. The Board of Works were pressing the matter forward; but the situation was most unfortunate.

Mr. ARTHUR O'CONNOR asked whether the Board of Works would still continue to defer action until they got the completion of the valuation by Mr. Fitzgerald, or whether they would take some steps to prevent the devastation by the autumn floods, which were very often more injurious to the property of the river side population than the winter floods themselves? The amount of devastation last year and the year before along the Barrow was almost incredible to those who did not actually see it; and, therefore, it seemed a little unreasonable that important work should be delayed for a mere valuation Return.

Mr. COURTNEY said, he ought, in justice to Mr. Fitzgerald, to say that in his letter he explained that he had been interrupted in the preparation of his valuation; he had had, for instance, to attend before a Committee of the House of Lords, and do other things. The hon. Member (Mr. A. O'Connor) asked him (Mr. Courtney) whether they could not take action before the valuation was completed. He (Mr. Courtney) was afraid the question of money was an essential matter, a more essential element than what should be done. What should be the range of the work, and, of course, what contracts should be accepted towards doing the work, depended entirely upon the cost of the work.

Mr. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, the hon. Gentleman knew the range of the work, because the survey was complete.

Mr. COURTNEY said, that the survey had, no doubt, been completed; but if the work would involve the expenditure of a considerable sum of money, it might be necessary to submit a smaller plan. He said this, however, to show that, in the absence of a valuation, it was impossible to take action. He regretted the situation extremely.

Mr. DAWSON said, that in this Vote there was an item of £300, which represented the salary of "the superintendent of fuel and light." Was this superintendent the man who looked after the fires?

Mr. COURTNEY explained that the Board supplied the fuel and light for all the Government Establishments.

Mr. DAWSON thought that a salary of £300 for a man to keep an account of the coals used, and to attend to the lights of the offices, was rather exorbitant.

Mr. COURTNEY said, the man was in charge of a very large Department. If the Committee considered that the Board of Works had to look after the Viceregal Lodge, and all the Public Departments in Dublin, they must come to the conclusion that this superintendent had very considerable functions. He had to see that the contracts for coals were fairly carried out, and generally had to superintend the lighting and firing.

Mr. DAWSON pointed out that under the Chief Secretary's Vote £4,455 was allowed for fuel and light. Why, he asked, should a man be paid £300 a-year for keeping an account of the Chief Secretary's coal?

Mr. COURTNEY said, that the superintendent's duty was to see to the supply of coals and light.

Mr. KENNY noticed an item in the Vote arising out of the Report of the Board of Works upon the piers on the Shannon. A Bill dealing with those piers was before the House; but he saw that Notice of opposition to it had been given. He would like to know whether the Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Courtney), who, he understood, had been in communication with the hon. Member for Limerick (Mr. Synan) in regard to the matter, would consent to refer the Bill to a Select Committee, in the event of the Notice of opposition being withdrawn?

Mr. COURTNEY said, he had been in communication with the hon. Member for Limerick as to referring the Bill to a Select Committee. The hon. Gentleman wanted half the Members of the Committee to be Irish Members, and he (Mr. Courtney) expressed his willingness to agree to that arrangement. The hon. Gentleman, however, told him that he had been in communication with the hon. Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar), and he refused to remove his block to the Bill.

Mr. KENNY asked whether the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Courtney) would send the Bill to a Select Committee if the hon. Member for Cavan were induced to withdraw the block?

MR. COURTNEY said, he would do so if the Session were not too far advanced.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, he did not wish to detain the Committee unduly; but the question of the Barrow drainage was one of immense importance to half of the people he represented. Tens of thousands of acres were devastated year after year by reason of the neglect of the authorities to take this matter in hand. Months ago the Board of Works came to an agreement with a number of representative gentlemen in Kildare, King's County, and Queen's County; and according to that agreement several hundreds of pounds were collected which were to go in part payment of the expenses of the survey, with a view to some action being taken by the Board of Works to mitigate the damage done by the floods. The collection of the money was a very serious tax upon the people impoverished by these annual losses. At any rate, the money was collected, the survey was completed, and a Report with regard to it had been sent in. The valuation which Mr. Fitzgerald was making was not at all essential to the carrying out of the work. It might be very interesting, in a financial point of view, to the officials of the Treasury; but it did not at all go to the essence of the claim. The decision of the surveyors, as to the mode in which the drainage should be carried on, was altogether independent of the valuation to be made by Mr. Fitzgerald. He asked the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury to state, for the satisfaction of the tenants and the landowners of the three counties—Kildare, King's County, and Queen's County—what was the scheme which the surveyors advised; what was the system of drainage to be adopted, and what was the area to be affected by the scheme, apart altogether from the valuation of Mr. Fitzgerald?

MR. MOLLOY said, he had several times brought the matter before the House by Question and otherwise, in the hope of inducing the Government to settle the matter. He fully endorsed all his hon. Friend the Member for Queen's County (Mr. A. O'Connor) had said regarding it. Up to the present nothing whatever had been done; but he (Mr. Molloy) and his hon. Friend were inundated year after year with complaints from the tenants of the district. It was only fair that some satisfactory answer should be given to the question of the hon. Member for Queen's County.

MR. COURTNEY said, he had told the Committee with the utmost frankness how the matter stood. As far as the survey had been made it had come before him; but until the matter was complete he could not give the information as to the scheme which the hon. Member for Queen's County (Mr. A. Connor) asked for. The hon. Gentleman must admit that the blame could not be put on the Board of Works, or on the Government. The Government were quite conscious of the importance of the work, and it should be pressed forward. As he had already explained, the delay rested with Mr. Fitzgerald; but he still hoped to be able, before the end of the Session, to make a definite statement. At present he could not say what would be done.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, that all he would ask the hon. Gentleman was, whether he would lay on the Table of the House the Report sent in by the surveyor of the Board of Works without waiting for the valuation by Mr. Fitzgerald?

MR. COURTNEY said, he would communicate with the Board on the subject.

MR. HARRINGTON wished to ask a question with regard to the Inspectors. There were 36 Inspectors charged for at a salary of £300 each. Had the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Courtney) any knowledge of the disposition of the Inspectors? Were they merely gentlemen who lived in different parts of the country, away from the control of the Office, or had they certain districts assigned to them, or did they go from one part of the country to another according as they were ordered?

MR. GRAY said, that within the last two or three months 15 additional Inspectors had been appointed. The hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury was asked some Questions in the House about the appointments which attracted some attention at the time in Dublin. He believed that 15 young gentlemen were appointed at a salary of £300 a-year each. Perhaps the Secretary to the Treasury would say what the Inspectors were supposed to do.

MR. COURTNEY said, he had not the tables by him; but the number of Inspectors was increased to meet the demands made by hon. Members on that side of the House that the working of the Land Act of 1881 should not be in arrears. Thirty-six was the full number of Inspectors, and it was sufficiently large to prevent any arrears in the consideration of the applications for loans. The Inspectors were placed in different parts of the country in a way that there should be no overlapping of jurisdiction.

MR. GRAY said, that, as to the new appointments, he wished to ask the hon. Gentleman whether any public notification was made, so as to ensure, as far as possible, that the most competent men would apply? Was any test of fitness applied to the candidates? If so, what? Had the gentlemen appointed any professional qualification? Was there any examination, or any test of any kind, beyond the religious test?—because, as a matter of fact, the gentlemen appointed were Protestants. Was it true that professional men, having, by accident, heard of the vacancies, applied, but were rejected, while unqualified men were appointed? Were the appointments so urgent that no public notification could be given?

MR. COURTNEY said, he was afraid he could not answer what qualifications were required. He did not make the appointments, as the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gray) well knew. He (Mr. Courtney) knew, however, that a very large number of applications were sent in, and he thought the appointments were made by the Board of Works; but he was not sure.

MR. GRAY said, he was rather anxious to ascertain something about the matter, and he had not got at the bottom of it yet. Was there any public notification given of the vacancies? Was there any test applied, either the test of professional qualification or the test of examination? What were the special qualifications for the post of Inspectors? Were the appointments thrown open in any way to the public? Was the list of applications a private list? How could one get at the list? And when the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Courtney) said he did not make the appointments, were not the appointments, as a matter of fact, subject to the approval of the Treasury? With regard to the Board of Works, he did not intend to go into the details which had been fully discussed by other hon. Members; but he thought this debate had shown the anomalous position of this most important, perhaps the most important Irish Department which had the administration of a large number of important Acts of Parliament, the good administration of which was almost vital to the welfare of the country. The Board was not represented in the House of Commons, except by an official of the English Treasury, who, when he was asked as to certain appointments, said he did not make them. Who did make the appointments? Could the Board of Works perform the smallest administrative act without sending over to the Treasury and getting the sanction of "my Lords?" The Board was used as a mere buffer of the Treasury to keep off important Irish demands. It was, and is at this moment, an off-shoot of the English Treasury; it had no real power, no Representative in the House of Commons; it had no kind of responsibility. The Secretary to the Treasury would not pretend seriously that he could be conversant with all the details of this great Irish Department. As to the cost of the Board, the hon. Gentleman had justly enough said it was impossible to compare the Irish Board of Works with the English Board of Works, because the Irish Board was so enormously more important and had so much greater duties to perform. Yet the English Board of Works was invariably represented in the House by an official ready to answer for every act of the Department; but the Irish Board of Works, which the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Courtney) very truly contended was so much more important, was not represented in the House except by an official of the Treasury, who told the Committee he had nothing to do with certain appointments. Who had to do with them; and why were the appointments made in such an extraordinary fashion? The mode of the appointments created the greatest possible discontent and the greatest possible disgust in Ireland; and, therefore, the Committee were entitled to some explanation. The question did not come on the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury by surprise, because it had been raised in the House once before during the Session. Of course, as usual, the hon. Gentleman did not know anything about the religion of the gentlemen appointed; but he (Mr. Gray) knew that they were all, as he had described, Protestants. He could not understand why, if the appointments were intended to be properly made, they were made in such a hurry, with no notification given, with no fair play given to those who might desire to compete upon their individual merits.

MR. COURTNEY said, the hon. Gentleman was perfectly entitled to ask these questions; but he was not in a position to answer them. He did not think there was any ground for the imputation made in the selection of the Inspectors; but he would make inquiries and give the hon. Gentleman the fullest information if he would put a Question down for Monday next. [MR. HEALY: Postpone the Vote.] He knew that a large number of the Inspectors were necessarily appointed on short notice in order to fulfil the condition of working the business with expedition, which no one was more energetic in demanding than the hon. Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy).

MR. HARRINGTON said, the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Courtney) had just touched on the question which he (Mr. Harrington) raised a few moments ago—namely, the question of the position of the Inspectors. It was quite evident from the hon. Gentleman's reply that he did not know what the precise position of the Inspectors was. He would tell the hon. Gentleman why it was he asked the question. In all there were 36 Inspectors, or in other words, more Inspectors than there were counties in Ireland. If the men were distributed over the districts of Ireland and controlled by some Central Authority in Dublin it would be very easy for them to inspect the country. But what was the fact? He happened to know a few of the gentlemen who had been appointed. They were young gentlemen just fresh from school. They were sons of landowners in Kerry; and he had never known them to discharge the duty in connection with the work of the Office. Possibly when they went out to hunt they might take a valuation in the way; but, for all the people knew of them, while they were receiving a salary from the Board of Works, they were living at home in their fathers' houses. Their absence from home was certainly never noticed by those who lived in the locality. If it was a fact that there was no control over the movements of these men, if there was no system for employing their industry and directing their energies, could not the Chief Secretary to the Treasury take the Department in hand and devise some means by which it could be shown what value in work was given for the amount expended? From the manner in which the appointments were made, it was apparent that they were used for political purposes merely; they were mere jobs, they were not open to public competition, there was no test by examination, no special knowledge, and, so far as he knew, no education required; if a man could write a letter, then, to all intents and purposes, he was deemed able to discharge the duties of the post. He was not aware that the Department exacted any duties at all from some of them. Surely the Secretary to the Treasury might well be asked to demand some test of qualification from those who sought employment in the Department, and some security that those appointed should really perform their duties.

MR. COURTNEY said, to the question of the hon. Member for Carlow (Mr. Gray), as to the method of appointment, he had only to answer that he would make inquiries; but upon the point raised by the hon. Member for Westmeath (Mr. Harrington) he could throw some light—namely, the amount of work. During 1883 applications were received steadily at the average rate of 86 per week; 614 cases were sent up for inquiry, and in the result about 135 cases on an average went through the hands of each Inspector in the course of the year, added to which were 106 cases of works in progress for which certificates were issued. An average of 436 visits to different holdings had to be made; and taking this into consideration with the large amount of office work, several visits to different works had to be made by an Inspector each day, so the amount of work was considerable—in fact, there was rather the fear that the work would be scamped through the amount having to be done than that the work was insufficient to occupy the men's time.

Mr. GRAY said, this scarcely indicated the amount of work, because, in a great many cases, the inspection had reference only to the building of a cottage or the draining of a field, and such matters as would occupy a competent man only a few minutes on a visit, during which he would see, in a very short time, if the work was practical or not. Why, a professional architect, in large practice, could make a score of visits to buildings in progress during a day. So there was not much information in the hon. Gentleman's answer. But, so far as he was concerned, he was quite content with the assurance that the information he had asked for should be forthcoming. He would ask the Committee to observe, as an example of the different manner in which two great Departments were conducted in England and in Ireland, how readily an English Member could obtain information in regard to matters connected with the Department over which the First Commissioner of Works (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) presided. Upon a question of a glass door in any part of the building, upon the trimming of a lamp, upon a question of drainage in the neighbourhood, or if there was a fear the head of the statue of the Duke of Wellington would be turned the wrong way, the First Commissioner of Works could give a reasonably full explanation, because he was possessed of personal knowledge of the facts; but matters of great importance in Ireland could only be known to officials by way of mere report; they had no personal knowledge at all. There was no person in the House who was prepared with the knowledge to give Irish Members satisfactory information on matters, perhaps, of quite as much importance as the head of the Duke of Wellington, or an evil smell in the neighbourhood of the House of Commons.

Mr. HEALY said, he thought the Secretary to the Treasury had made a good suggestion in proposing to postpone the Vote for a few days.

Mr. COURTNEY said, Oh, no; he had not done so.

Mr. HEALY said, he was sorry to find himself mistaken, for the suggestion struck him as being an admirable one; and he did not exactly see how they could arrive at a solution of the difficulty without a postponement. The hon. Member for Carlow (Mr. Gray) had asked for information, which the Secretary to the Treasury said should be supplied on Monday; but he should like to know of what avail would it be when they had lost all grip of the Vote? With all respect, he ventured to say English Members would not be treated in that way; he should like to see such an attempt made. His hon. Friend (Mr. Gray) had done extremely good service in calling attention to the Vote. On a former occasion it had been pointed out how the staff expenses were £1 to give 10s. to a farmer; and, for all that was known, it was costing £1 10s. for each 10s. advanced. In all these systems there was always one class gained largely, the Irish officials; in fact, it was a system of outdoor relief of officials from the Orange class; it was nothing less than so much money spent to keep them from the poorhouse. The money was voted, and these gentlemen got the benefit of the jobs. The new head of the Department, General Sankey, was as completely in the hands of the permanent officials of Ireland as his predecessor was, and played into the hands of the worst gang of such there could be. Why should not officials be appointed with some regard to the general condition of classes in Ireland? Was it not the fact that all these particular appointments fell to men of one particular class, notwithstanding the large majority of the population were Catholics and Nationalists? If in using the dice a player turned up sixes 19 times out of 20 they naturally suspected the gentleman who had such extraordinary good luck. Let the Secretary to the Treasury be reasonable and postpone the Vote. How could they vote money with calm consciences knowing how the money was wasted? In one instance recently brought to light, in reference to a contract for building a pier, the work done was 80 feet when the contract was for 100 feet. The contractor found the work more difficult than he expected, that the ground was soft, that there was a bog, or an earthquake, or something else in the way; he told his tale to the Department, and the reply was—"All right, by boy, never mind; here is the money for the whole 100 feet!" This was the case with the Teelin Pier in Donegal. And having shoved out the pier into the sea no roads were made to approach it, and there was some £600 or £700 put into the sea and useless, £1,000 of it from the Canadian Fund, and £1,000 advanced by an unfortunate neighbouring land owner. Why, if such a state of things existed in relation to an English Vote there would be a revolution in the Committee, and, in spite of the Caucus, Radical Members would vote against the Government. That was a strong statement, but the facts were strong. Here was a great institution like the Board of Works absolutely irresponsible, governed by a gentleman imported from Bombay, administered by a staff of members of Orange Lodges, of greater age than would be allowed in any other Department, and with officials who could spend their time attending Emergency sales when they ought to be at work in Dublin Castle. One gentleman was secretary to an Orange Lodge, local secretary for two Insurance Associations, and painted over his door "auctioneer and valuer," and as such attended to buy cattle at Emergency sales. In point of fact, the office was an official Orange Lodge as much as that presided over by Mr. De Carlyn at Belfast, members attended their Lodge for convivial purposes at night, and attended the official Lodge for which they were paid in the day. Why was this not reformed? Years ago a Committee made inquiry and recommendations, then, after six years, Colonel M'Kerlie was got rid of—he was Sir Something M'Kerlie now, though why he was knighted it was difficult to conceive—and now there was General Sankey in his place. But only the men were changed, not the system. The Department had important duties to discharge under the Land Act. It could give enormous assistance to the fishing industry in regard to the erection of piers; but it continued in creating irritation to fester all over the country. He had a correspondence between a solicitor and the Board of Works which was sufficient to make a horse laugh. It had reference to some application for a loan by a tenant; but the correspondence was too long to read it to the Committee. In the first place there was the application for the loan, and the applicant waited six weeks, and no reply came. Then he wrote again saying he had sent a letter. The Board after a week or two replied, asking for a copy of the letter. A week or two more passed and the solicitor wrote again, and after another interval the Board of Works asked for the date of the communication, and, that being furnished, they again replied saying the letter had been mislaid and asked for another copy. This was so absurd, so altogether ridiculous, that people would scarcely believe it; but he had the very correspondence sent to him by the solicitor. This was the state of things, and the Secretary to the Treasury asked for the Vote for these most efficient officers, Colonels, Generals, Grand Masters of Orange and Masonic Lodges, who did nothing. Every year was the Vote asked for, year by year was the same "hue and cry" raised, and there was no more suggestion of reform than there was years ago.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Resolutions be reported to the House."—(Mr. Courtney.)

MR. WARTON asked when the next Vote in the Class was proposed to be taken? It seemed to have relation to a similar subject—Irish buildings.

MR. COURTNEY said, he had hoped to take it immediately after the Vote just passed, discussion would range over the same topics; but he was afraid objection would be taken to proceeding further now. To-morrow he proposed to resume at the point the Committee left off.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, he proposed to make some observations upon the next Vote, which he would not have been in Order in making on the Board of Works Vote.

Motion agreed to.

Resolutions to be reported To-morrow.
Committee to sit again To-morrow.

SUPPLY.—REPORT.

Resolutions [July 21] reported.

Resolutions 1 to 5, inclusive, agreed to.

Resolution 6—

MR. FRASER-MACKINTOSH said, he had intended to call attention under this Vote to the case of an Inspector in the Highlands, who had been dismissed under circumstances which had given rise to great dissatisfaction. This man was dismissed not for incompetency or irregularity; but at that late hour he would not enter on the subject. He wished, however, to ask the Lord Advocate whether he would agree to give as an unopposed Return, a list of all who had been dismissed by the Board of Supervision from the office of Inspector of the Poor, together with the reasons for such dismissals, from the formation of the Board to the present date?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (MR. J. B. BALFOUR) replied, that at that moment he did not see any reason for objecting to give the Return; but he had not known until that evening that it was to be moved for, and perhaps the hon. Member would not hold him absolutely bound to what he had said.

Resolution agreed to.

MAGISTRATES (IRELAND) SALARIES

BILL.—[BILL 292.]

(Mr. Courtney, Mr. Trevelyan.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. HEALY said, he observed that this Bill was on the Paper to-night, and he wished to ask whether the Government intended to proceed with it; and whether the Government would give some information with respect to Mr. Clifford Lloyd, without which they could not proceed with the Bill?

MR. COURTNEY said, he could not give any date as to proceeding with the Bill, nor the hour, until he had consulted with the Chief Secretary for Ireland; but it would not be taken at an unreasonable hour.

Second Reading deferred till Thursday.

INFANTS BILL.—[BILL 14.]

(Mr. Bryce, Mr. Horace Davey, Mr. Anderson, Mr. Staveley Hill.)

COMMITTEE.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

MR. TOMLINSON moved that Progress be reported on the ground of the importance of the Amendments to be introduced into this Bill, and the fact that several Members who proposed Amendments were not present.

MR. WARTON seconded the Motion on the grounds given by the hon. Member, and also because it was now after 2 o'clock, and the House had to meet again at 12 o'clock.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Tomlinson.)

MR. BRYCE said, he hoped the Committee would go on with the Bill, for a large number of Members had come down and stayed until that late hour to assist in bringing the Bill to a close, and he should be sorry that they should be put to the same trouble again. If it was found that the Bill was likely to take much time, Progress could then be reported.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (SIR HENRY JAMES) said, he was quite sensible of the difficulty of proceeding with the Bill at that hour; but he could not help feeling that there were many Members who had come down for that express purpose, and he hoped the Committee would go on with the Bill to some extent.

MR. R. N. FOWLER (LORD MAYOR) said, the hon. and learned Gentleman knew that this Bill had been put down night after night, and had brought him down every night, together with other Members. He did not complain of that, but he thought they were entitled to some consideration.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 5; Noes 60: Majority 55.—(Div. List, No. 176.)

Clause 1 agreed to.

Clause 2 (Father and mother to be joint guardians).

MR. INOE moved the omission of the clause, believing it to be inexpedient to have a system of double control during the lifetime of both parents. At that hour he refrained from repeating the argument which had been brought forward on the second reading.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause stand part of the Bill."

MR. BRYCE objected to the proposed omission, on the ground that the provision would be of use in promoting domestic happiness by giving the mother a better status in the family, that of full equality, and also because the principle of the clause had received a considerable amount of support from the public. As many as 150 Petitions, with 15,000 signatures, had been presented to Parliament in favour of the principle of equal rights between husband and wife in the custody of their children. Having regard to that, he should be bound, in spite of the hostility manifested to the clause in the House, to take a Division upon the Motion; and he hoped that many hon. Members would give him their support.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he would ask the hon. and learned Member whether that was a wise course to pursue? If he took a Division he would place the Bill as a whole in great peril. They should not discuss the principle of the Bill now, the Bill having been read a second time.

Question put.

Clause 3 (Surviving parent to be guardian).

MR. INCE said, he proposed to amend this clause in order to carry out what had been the prevalent feeling of the House on the second reading. The effect of the clause would be that after the death of the father or the mother the survivor would be the guardian both of the estate and of the person of the infant. He proposed to add a Provision the object of which was that if there was any property belonging to the infant the father should have power to appoint a guardian of the estate who would not interfere in any way with the mother's appointment of a guardian of the person, or with the mother being such guardian herself. The appointment of a guardian by the father he proposed, however, should only come into effect in case the mother married again. He thought that even the hon. and learned Member who had charge of the Bill would admit that he was not unduly interfering with the rights of the mother. In a case where there was property and the mother married again he thought it was desirable that there should be some independent person acting in the father's interest in regard to the estate.

Amendment proposed,

In page 1, line 12, after "Guardian," add "Provided, That it shall be lawful for the father of an infant, by deed or will, to appoint a guardian or guardians of the estate of such infant, but such appointment shall only take effect after the father's death, and as against the mother or any guardian appointed by her under the powers of this Act (if she shall be the surviving parent) in the event of her marrying again."—(Mr. Ince.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

MR. FINDLATER said, that although he did not go as far as his hon. and learned Friend, yet he supported the principle of the Bill; but what he desired was that the wife should not be the guardian of the property. Neither the training nor the education of the wife qualified her for a position of that kind, and he thought it would be very undesirable that she should have its management. He was quite sure that the husband, if he appointed a guardian, would not be able to get anyone who would act with the wife; because those who had had experience in such matters knew that it was very difficult to work with a woman in business affairs of this nature. As the Bill stood it went very far indeed. In every case the wife was to be the guardian of the infant's fortune, and it seemed very hard indeed that the only privilege left to the husband should be to appoint a guardian associated with his wife. The husband in most cases provided the property, and certainly one would think that he should have the power of disposing of that property as he wished, and of appointing any person he chose to manage it. At all events, it should not be left as the Amendment proposed, and he thought in no case should the wife be made the guardian of the fortune.

Amendment proposed to proposed Amendment, to leave out all after "infant," in line 3.—(Mr. Findlater.)

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, it seemed to him that the Amendment of the hon. and learned Gentleman as amended, or without the Amendment last moved, would introduce a change in the law of some importance, but which appeared to have escaped notice. By the Wills Act testamentary power was taken from all infants, although he believed that under the Statute of Charles II. infants had the power of appointing guardians over their children. The Bill, if it became law, would make an alteration in respect of the Wills Act. He did not know whether the hon. and learned Gentleman who proposed the Amendment had noticed the point; but it was one which he thought might have an important bearing beyond the Amendment.

MR. WARTON presumed that the hon. Member for Queen's County referred to the position of an infant father.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir FARRER HERSCHELL) said, that under the Amendment whatever appointment a man might wish to make by his will might apply, as far as he could see, even if the husband and wife were living separate. Personally, he should prefer the Amendment of the hon. Member for West Aberdeenshire (Dr. Farquharson).

MR. HEALY said, he should like to know in what way, under the clause or under the Amendment, the religious difficulty was to be dealt with? It appeared to him that in the case of mixed marriages under the clause, in the case of the death of a Protestant father, the Catholic mother would become guardian of the children, and vice versa. He would like some little information as to how this matter would be affected by the clause. He was afraid that as the Bill was drawn it would lead to some difficulty in the case of mixed marriages.

MR. TOMLINSON said, he thought that the case the Committee ought primarily to consider was that of parents living in harmony, and bringing up their children as they ought to be brought up. He believed that the mother in that case would wish that in the guardianship of her infant children someone should be associated with her. That opinion, he thought, would be shared by most hon. Members who had had an opportunity of considering what the ordinary feelings of a mother were. There could be little doubt that she would desire someone to be associated with her where there was personal property concerned. He certainly preferred the clause of the hon. Member for West Aberdeenshire (Dr. Farquharson), with which Amendment he was willing to support the clause.

MR. BRYCE said, that personally he rather preferred the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Hastings (Mr. Ince) to that of his hon. Friend the Member for West Aberdeenshire; but he felt there was great force in what had fallen from the Solicitor General with regard to the Amendment of the latter hon. Member, and he believed he should meet the views of the Committee by saying that he was prepared to accept that Amendment. With regard to the observations of the hon. Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy), he believed the question raised by him would, at any rate, be simplified by the adoption of this clause. His own opinion was that a number of the difficulties at present raised in law in connection with this subject of the religion of minors would be got rid of by enlarging the discretion of the Court; if not altogether got rid of, they would be considerably diminished under a later clause of the Bill. Some of these difficulties were such as must arise under any system; neither this Bill nor any other could dispose of them: it was enough if it mitigated them.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Findlater.)

MR. WARTON said, the question he had to consider was not the danger of agreeing to either Amendment; the danger was in the clause itself, and that the Bill had been brought on at a time in the morning when it could not be considered at all. The wording of this clause was the vice of the Bill, and he was afraid it would not make much further progress in that House unless it was altered. He begged to second the Motion of the hon. Member opposite.

MR. HEALY suggested that the clause should be postponed, and that the Committee should proceed with the other clauses of the Bill. That would give the Committee time for further consideration.

MR. ILLINGWORTH said, he hoped his hon. and learned Friend the Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Bryce) would consent to the Motion for reporting Progress. No one could doubt for one moment the high motives of his hon. and learned Friend. He thought that some gratuitous errors had been made in the preparation of the original Bill; and the present position was that his hon. and learned Friend had whipped up a few Members, and was prepared to see the Bill carried, even at the sacrifice of discussion. How was it possible that this far-reaching question could be reported, and submitted to the decision of their constituents at that hour? It was true that some persons had written to their Members about the Bill; but the general public knew nothing of what was going on. When he considered that this proposed change in the law would set up a new condition of things in every household in the country, he, for one, protested against going any further with the Bill on that occasion. Seeing that they had reached a point of fundamental difference, he hoped his hon. Friend would agree to the Chairman reporting Progress.

MR. HORACE DAVEY said, he hoped the Committee would, at least, consent to go on until they had passed the clause. [Mr. WARTON: No, no!] Although, no doubt, his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Hastings (Mr. Ince) was quite right in saying that considerable objections were expressed in different parts of the House to Clause 2 on the second reading of the Bill, yet, so far as his recollection went, Clause 3 was then regarded with, he might say, almost universal favour. Although he did not deny that the clause was capable of improvement—and capable of improvement in the direction indicated by the Amendment of the hon. Member for West Aberdeenshire (Dr. Farquharson)—still, he thought the clause did command the general approval of the House.

MR. SEXTON supported the Motion for reporting Progress, because he felt that if the Committee went on, most of the clauses would be carried. It appeared to him that hon. Members were considering the Bill with a very imperfect knowledge of the changes in the law which it proposed to effect. But those ignorant of the law might see that the Bill introduced a very doubtful and dangerous state of things. He did not know that for Ireland it would be beneficial.

MR. BRYCE said, he should not oppose the Motion of the hon. Member for Monaghan (Mr. Findlater) to report Progress, in the hope that when the Bill again came forward it would be agreed to by those hon. Gentlemen who now objected to it.

MR. HARRINGTON: Exclude Ireland.

Question put, and agreed to.

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Thursday.

MOTIONS.

MILITARY PENSIONS AND YEOMANRY PAY BILL.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

SIR ARTHUR HAYTER, in moving for leave to bring in a Bill to make further provision with regard to the Pensions of Soldiers, and to the Pay and Pensions of the Yeomanry, said, he might be permitted to say that the changes which had been made in the proposed measure since last year had completely satisfied the Chelsea Commissioners, who had withdrawn their opposition to the scheme. He might further observe that a Memorandum would be laid on the Table of the House by the Secretary of State for War before the second reading was taken, in which the provisions of the Bill would be fully explained.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR asked if it was the intention of the War Office to make any alteration in the constitution of Chelsea Hospital, and whether they proposed to do away with the Hospital, and to transfer the Staff; or whether they had other proposals in view?

SIR ARTHUR HAYTER: No, Sir; we have no intention of the kind.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR: Has the War Office abandoned that idea?

SIR ARTHUR HAYTER: That is not the intention of the Bill at all.

CLASS II.—SALARIES AND EXPENSES OF CIVIL DEPARTMENTS.

Sir LYON PLAYFAIR in the Chair.

(1.) £4,416, to complete the sum for the Record Office, Ireland.

Mr. SEXTON asked the Secretary to the Treasury who was in charge of the Vote for an explanation of an item of £160 with reference to the editing of facsimile manuscripts? He had recently addressed a Question to the hon. Gentleman in regard to the recording and indexing of Irish papers; and he wished to know how long the Department would be engaged upon this work, and what results had been attained? There was also a charge for the Keeper of the State Papers of £500. He assumed that the Keeper of the State Papers performed useful functions and that he was not overpaid; but he observed that the same gentleman also received a sum of £750 for the Office of Ulster King-at-Arms. He appeared, therefore, to be a gentleman who received one salary for doing something, and another salary for doing nothing at all. He would like to know how long this pluralism of Office was to be allowed to continue; and whether, in the case of Ulster King-at-Arms, there was any possibility that this Office, in the fulness of time, would be abolished? He believed the time had come when those who wished to flourish before society with coats of arms, alleged to have belonged to their ancestors, should pay for the social honour which thereby accrued to them; and if this gentleman was to be retained for the purpose of providing a pseudo-aristocracy, those persons who wished to assume heraldic arms and mottoes should pay for the honour. He also thought there must now be crowds of officials so well acquainted with the State ceremonials at Dublin Castle, that there was no necessity for the guests to be led by the hand by the Ulster King-at-Arms as children were led by their nurses. If it was necessary to keep up this State official, he ought to be paid by those who derived pleasure or profit from his performances.

Mr. COURTNEY said, the case was not so bad as had been represented by the hon. Member. If the hon. Member would look at another Vote for the Household of the Lord Lieutenant, he would see that the sum of £650 had been received in fees, so that, in point of fact, those who desired new coats of arms did pay for them. The Office of Keeper of the State Papers was, he assured the hon. Member, no sinecure. It had been an Office established in the year 1716.

Mr. T. P. O'CONNOR asked if the hon. Gentleman would be good enough to state the duties of the Keeper of the State Papers?

Mr. COURTNEY said, the duties were regulated by 31 Vict. c. 70. It was his duty to collect and classify the State Papers, and remove them to the Record Tower in Dublin Castle. After they had been examined, they were allowed to remain under the care of Sir Bernard Burke, or whoever might happen to be Keeper, for a period of 50 years, after which they were transferred to the Record Office, where they were under the care of the Master of the Rolls. The Keeper of the State Papers arranged the documents, and saw that they were kept in safe custody, and that they were forthcoming whenever they might be required, or whenever it was necessary to examine them. When they were placed under the care of the Master of the Rolls they were catalogued.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: From day to day?

MR. COURTNEY said, they were catalogued as they were sent in. The facsimile work in connection with the Irish national manuscripts had now been in progress for 10 or 12 years, and certain volumes had been published. It would be completed by the publication of one additional volume, which was now passing through the Press, and was expected to be issued in the course of a few weeks. Mr. Gilbert, the Secretary of the Record Office, was the person who was paid for editing these manuscripts, and he had been engaged on the work since 1872.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR asked whether they were to understand that the publication of these facsimiles, in regard to which the hon. Gentleman had given them such interesting information, was to be continued; and whether there were not other Irish ancient manuscripts which were worth being reproduced? There had been no complaint from that quarter of the House as to the manner in which the present volumes had been prepared; and he thought the feeling of the Irish people would be grossly misrepresented if a word was said to imply that they had not a right to the reproduction of these records in the best possible form. He should be glad to learn what manuscripts were represented by the volumes already published.

MR. KENNY quite agreed with his hon. Friend that the sum required for editing these manuscripts was not exorbitant. On the contrary, he believed it to be very small. As the translation of these manuscripts was said to be approaching a conclusion, it would be of some interest to the Irish people to learn from the Secretary to the Treasury whether there was any intention of translating into English any of these Irish volumes, which were of great interest. In particular, he should be glad to learn whether it was intended to continue the translation of the Brehon Laws. The late Dr. O'Donovan had translated four volumes, and there still remained something like six volumes to be translated into English. He did not know whether there was any person in Ireland who was competent to continue the translation of the Brehon Laws and other old works; but it was quite possible that there might be. It was a matter of great interest. Very few people in Ireland had so complete a knowledge of the Celtic language as to be able to read these old MSS., even if they succeeded in deciphering them. The old manuscript form of the Brehon Laws was in the Royal Irish Academy; but the existence of these works was of no practical value, except to those competent to decipher them. He believed that it would be of the greatest possible interest for the people of Ireland to learn what were the laws of their country many centuries ago. He believed there was only one edition in existence, so that the study of them was clearly restricted. It would be a matter of general satisfaction if these volumes were translated into English, so as to afford a better insight into the ancient laws.

MR. SEXTON agreed with his hon. Friend the Member for Ennis (Mr. Kenny) that the sum for editing these manuscripts was a small and beggarly item. He saw by the English Estimates that £3,000 was spent in translating the records of foreign countries; and, therefore, he thought the sum of £160 very inadequate for this purpose in Ireland. If it was necessary to expend £3,000 for editing and translating the political remains of England in foreign countries, surely £160 for editing the Irish MSS. was a very inadequate sum. He hoped the work would not be brought to a conclusion until the Government had thoroughly ascertained and satisfied the Irish Members whether any further work of the kind remained to be done. He felt great satisfaction in knowing that this work was under the direction of so competent and enthusiastic an Irish scholar as Mr. Gilbert, who had written one or two of the ablest historical works of the time. Any work of this kind would be read with interest; and he quite agreed with the hon. Member for Ennis that it would be desirable to have the Brehon Laws translated, in order to show that Irishmen many centuries ago were able to make very much better laws for themselves than Englishmen could now,

Mr. COURTNEY said, he did not understand that the hon. Member for Ennis (Mr. Kenny) complained of the amount included in the Vote.

Mr. KENNY: Certainly not.

Mr. COURTNEY said, that the right hon. and learned Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Gibson) had complained, not that the work had been undertaken of publishing these facsimiles of ancient Irish MSS., but of the expensive way in which they had been brought out, which rendered them inaccessible to the people generally. The item for editing and translating of the English records, to which reference had been made, related to chronicles and State Papers of a totally different kind from those now in question. The Vote related to certain MSS. written in Irish, the reproduction of which was now coming to an end. The cost of translating the Brehon Laws would be included in the Royal Irish Academy Vote. He believed that a gentleman named Mahoney, now dead, had been engaged in the translation of these Brehon Laws. Some four volumes had been completed.

Mr. KENNY said, that the work was not now in progress, but had been arrested.

Mr. COURTNEY: Yes; by the death of Mr. Mahoney.

Mr. KENNY: Are there not other people capable of continuing the work?

Mr. COURTNEY: I will ascertain how the matter stands; and, if possible, the work will be continued.

Mr. DAWSON said, he was glad that the Vote afforded an opportunity, in reference to this question of the translation and preservation of ancient Irish MSS., of calling the attention of the Government to a very lamentable case in connection with this matter in Dublin. The brother of the late Professor Eugene O'Curry, an eminent scholar who had spent his life in the practical work of translating these documents, died some time ago. Anthony O'Curry, whose knowledge of Irish was even more extensive than that of his great brother, assisted his brother Eugene O'Curry, and had been untiring in his labours during his lifetime. He died at an advanced age, and had left a widow, and a large family of daughters, almost entirely unprovided for, and they were frequently in circumstances of the direst poverty. He had himself, in Dublin, several times started a private subscription to help these poor people; but periodically they fell into the deepest poverty, and were continually waiting upon him and others to assist them with a few shillings towards the payment of their rent. He would ask the Secretary to the Treasury to consider the case of this poor old lady, the wife of a distinguished scholar, who really might have been better provided for but for her husband having given up the whole of his time for the benefit of the public. Mr. O'Curry, by his distinguished labours in the field of Irish literature, had left a name which would not soon be forgotten; and while he was living he had been of much assistance to his brother and other Irish scholars.

Mr. COURTNEY said, he was afraid that the hon. Member was in error in addressing him. He had no power whatever to interfere in any case of this kind. It would have to be done by communication directly with the Prime Minister, who had charge of the Royal Pension List.

Mr. DAWSON said, he would take the course suggested. He was quite sure, from the well-known kindness of heart of the right hon. Gentleman, that an appeal would not be made to him in vain.

Vote agreed to.

(2.) £11,126, to complete the sum for the Registrar General's Office, Ireland.

Mr. DAWSON wished to ask the Chief Secretary how it was that the Secretary, or Chief Clerk of this Office, assumed the title of "Assistant Registrar General," for which he had not the slightest legal authority? He had heard as a fact that this official made use of this pompous title in order, in the most insolent and supercilious manner, to lord it over the other subordinate officials. When a Question was put to the right hon. Gentleman the other day, he said this gentleman was entitled to use the name by law, because the section of the Act of Parliament allowed the Registrar General to appoint an assistant during his absence or illness. That was part of the truth, but not the whole of it. The section of the Act no doubt permitted the Chief Clerk to use the title of Assistant Registrar when the Registrar General was ill or absent; but at no other period had he authority to assume the title and that insolence in office which was the predominating character of Government officials in Ireland. He did not know whether the Registrar General, who had £1,000 a-year, was supposed to be ill or absent for the entire year; but, as a matter of fact, the Chief Clerk used the title of "Assistant Registrar" regularly, and he had no right to it except in the absence of his Chief. He hoped that they would get an assurance that he would be obliged to discontinue a title to which he had no claim except in the illness or absence of the Registrar General. If he (Mr. Dawson) failed to get such an assurance, he would certainly move the reduction of the Vote.

MR. HARRINGTON said, there was another small matter connected with this Vote which he would call attention to. In this Office, in addition to a permanent staff, a number of gentlemen had for years been employed as task writers. They were only engaged in daily service; but from their long service they were as much identified with the Office as any of the permanent officials. Lately, however, a system had grown up of giving the task work to the permanent clerks; and so men who had been practically for periods of 20 or 30 years in the Public Service, and had given up every other pursuit, because they were not regularly on the staff, were by this course deprived of their means of livelihood. They found themselves at the end of their days, when they were unfit to seek for any other position of emolument, practically deprived of the means of livelihood which the Office had supplied them with for so many years. As a matter of fact, they were in reality dismissed from the Public Service. It was not that there was any want of work in the Department, for the work was as great as formerly, and, if anything, increasing; but whoever had the distribution of the task work now gave it to the permanent clerks employed in the Office. It was all very well to assist the permanent clerks of the establishment as much as they could, and to give them the opportunity of increasing their salaries by extra labour; but everybody knew that in an Office of this kind, where strict supervision did not exist, the clerks did this work in addition to their ordinary work, not at home, but in the Office during office hours. Of course, they received extra pay for it, although it could be easily done by the gentlemen whose case he was advocating. He desired to know what the arrangements of the Office were. If the task work was not paid for, he would not mind; but it was a great grievance that these men, who had spent their lives in the Public Service, but were not salaried officials, should see their work handed over to the permanent clerks, many of whom did the greater portion of their work during their official hours.

MR. TREVELYAN said, that he had as great a feeling of sympathy as anybody who had been connected with public work must have for the class of men called "writers," whose position had been brought before the Committee by the hon. Member for Westmeath (Mr. Harrington). He should be very sorry, indeed, that anything should be done to injure their position, and, in some sense, they had a just claim for consideration. Of course, if the work were done by the clerks in the Office without payment the hon. Member would not wish to interfere.

MR. HARRINGTON: Oh, no.

MR. TREVELYAN said, he would inquire into the matter, as he understood it was the impression of the hon. Member that the work was done by the clerks of the establishment for payment. Certainly, with reference to Mr. Matheson, the Deputy Registrar General, he found that he was entitled to have that title during the absence of the Registrar General. He was informed that it was a matter of convenience that he should be appointed once for all. He would, however, look into the matter. He was told that Mr. Matheson never signed himself Deputy or Assistant Registrar General, except in the absence of his Chief; and it would be necessary to appoint him every time the Chief was absent. That would be a greater concession than any Member of Parliament had a right to demand.

MR. SEXTON said, he was glad to see that the right hon. Gentleman treated the matter in a playful spirit; but no one would think of putting the right hon. Gentleman to the trouble of appointing Mr. Matheson every time the Head of the Office was absent. That would be a reduplication of appointments which none of them would desire; but he could not see the necessity for this official to assume a superior title in order to carry on the work of the Department. He was sure that when the Prime Minister was away his work was capably performed by the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury; but the hon. Gentleman did not find it necessary to assume the title of Prime Minister. Nor was it necessary, when the Chief Secretary was away from Dublin, for the second official to assume his title. He was thankful to the right hon. Gentleman for the manner in which he had responded to the appeal which had been made to him in reference to the case of the task writers. He (Mr. Sexton) was closely acquainted with the grievances under which they laboured; and he would say that there never had come under his notice a meaner or shabbier instance of the conduct of officials in Ireland than the treatment of these poor and almost worn-out task writers. It ill became the permanent officials, who were in receipt of large and luxurious salaries themselves, to take out of the mouths of these poor task writers their small crust of bread. The Registrar General he saw had £1,000 a-year, the Secretary £600, the Superintendent £450, the first, second, and third clerks £400, £300, and £200, and yet he found that it was their policy to take from some two or three old public servants the miserable £1 or £2 a-week with which they endeavoured to maintain themselves. There could be no difficulty in finding employment for these men in the Office; and all his hon. Friend desired was that, in future, the work, if done for pay, should not be done by permanent members of the establishment. The functions of the Office were being daily augmented, and constant employment could be given to the three or four men who had been attached to the Office for so long a period, and it was the merest pretence to say that the functions and details of the work of the Office were now such as to prevent constant employment from being found. He knew one man who had been attached to this Office for 21 years, and now, at the end of his days, he found himself deprived of employment. He had known him to rise at 4 or 5 in the morning, and work till midnight on work farmed out to him by officials who only paid half the price to which he would be entitled himself. He would be ashamed to say what he believed to be the motive for this treatment; but he would, if the right hon. Gentleman desired, inform him privately what he believed to be the motive for the meanness and malignity of the conduct which this man had been exposed to by the officials. He was sure if the right hon. Gentleman knew it that he would not tolerate it for a moment. But unless some steps were taken to provide these men with suitable employment at the end of their days, as long as he remained in Parliament he would never cease from bringing the question forward when the Estimates came on for discussion. He had no desire to see the Estimates increased, or 1d. spent which could be avoided; but he did say that when a man had served the public, in whatever humble capacity, for 20 or 30 years blamelessly and efficiently, it was cruelly unjust that in the end he should be deprived of his means of livelihood, even although some paltry question of economy might arise. He sincerely hoped that when they reached the Estimates next year this cause of complaint would have disappeared.

Mr. COURTNEY remarked that the question of the position of the class of persons known as writers had been raised some time ago, and a promise had been given that it should be inquired into.

Mr. HARRINGTON wished to point out that in this matter of task work there was no possibility of the Head of the Department being able to deal with it as readily as if the men were engaged in the Office. The emoluments received for task work were in accordance with the amount of work done, and if the task writer were not able to do the work he received no payment at all.

Mr. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, he had no wish to find fault with the Head of the Office. He was inclined to think that if the Heads of Departments were aware of the position of many of their subordinates, that position would be very materially ameliorated. As the right hon. Gentleman had intimated that he would institute an inquiry into the condition of the men employed under the Registrar General, he would ask him to direct special attention to the position of the men described as transcribers. He found that they had been employed now for some 16 years. Ten years ago they were required to pass a qualifying examination; and in every respect they had discharged their duties faithfully and well. From that time to the present they had been employed in work for which they received very inadequate remuneration, although a similar class of public servants in this country received £210, £280, and £320 respectively. One of the transcribers was actually doing the work of one of the senior clerks who received £400 a-year. It would also be found that some of these men were employed as permanent officials at a time when many of the second, third, and fourth class clerks had not entered the service at all. In the year 1873-4 a Commission sat to inquire into their position, consisting of Earl Percy, Mr. Blackwood, and Mr. Hamilton. The Commission reported in favour of an amelioration of the condition of these men; but all that came of the matter was a miserable increase of £3 a-year for five years, raising the ultimate remuneration to £160 a-year as the maximum. Whereas it would appear from the present Vote that a man employed temporarily as a transcriber on the agricultural statistics rose as a fourth class clerk from £86 by annual increments to £200 a-year. The consequence was that transcribers who were employed on much more important work were in the position of seeing their juniors by many years promoted over their heads as officers of the permanent official staff, and paid much more liberally. He desired to submit the case of these men to the Secretary to the Treasury; and he was sure that, if it were found to be as he had stated, the hon. Gentleman would be glad to do something to improve their condition.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, he had a personal knowledge of the facts of the case to which the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) had referred, and he could confirm what his hon. Friend had said on the subject—that all the circumstances pointed to some motive which was not creditable on the part of certain individuals who had compelled him to occupy his present position. The poor man in whose behalf his hon. Friend had spoken could not be described as past his work, because, as a matter of fact, he was employed in doing the same kind of work farmed out to him by other officials. Therefore, it could not be from any dissatisfaction at the manner in which he did the work that he had been dismissed. With reference to the matter to which the hon. Member for Carlow (Mr. Dawson) had called attention—namely, the assumption by the Chief Clerk in the Registrar General's Office of the title of Assistant Registrar General, he wished, in speaking of the temporary character of the appointment, to refer them to Thom's Almanack, which was a sort of Court Guide and general vade mecum to those interested in official matters in Dublin. In that volume Mr. Matheson was described as Assistant Registrar General. He believed that Thom's was supplied with its information in the same way as Dod's Parliamentary information was obtained—namely, directly from those whose names were inserted. An hon. Friend informed him that Thom's Almanack was a good deal more authoritative than Dod's Parliamentary Companion; and he certainly hoped its casual information was a little more accurate than that which sometimes appeared in Dod. Perhaps, however, the inaccuracies in the latter work arose from the fashion which Members of Parliament, as well as ladies, had of understating their ages.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR believed that the last Government had inquired into the position of these men, and given promises that their position should be improved. Some years ago he had asked the Financial Secretary to see what could be done; but nothing satisfactory had yet resulted. The same complaints as those which were made in Ireland were made by the Scotch writers.

Vote agreed to.

(3.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

MR. SEXTON said, he observed, under this head, an item of £400 for the salary of the Solicitor to the Valuation and Boundary Survey in Ireland. He was bound to ask who this solicitor was? Was it Mr. George Bolton, a gentleman whose name had been frequently before the House? He also found by a foot note that the holder of this office in 1883-4 received an annual salary of £400 as Crown Solicitor for the County of Tipperary, paid out of the Vote for Law Charges in Ireland. They had, therefore, upon that record the fact that Mr. George Bolton received £800 in the course of last year from the public purse. He would like to know how, if Mr. George Bolton was Solicitor to this Department of the Valuation and Boundary Survey, and also Crown Solicitor for the County Tipperary, he found time to leave Tipperary and Dublin to go down to a gaol in the West of Ireland in company with a policeman in order to see a prisoner in his cell, who was said to have turned approver in a murder case? It was also remarkable that immediately after Mr. George Bolton's and the policeman's visit to that man he committed suicide, and was found hanging dead in his cell next day. He wished to know what connection this visit had with the functions of Mr. George Bolton as Solicitor to the Valuation and Boundary Survey Department, or as Crown Solicitor of the County of Tipperary? He would further ask for an explicit statement of the amount which this gentleman actually received per year from the public purse. It was said that his income amounted to some £2,000 or £3,000 a-year, besides which he received sums for law charges in criminal prosecutions. Probably his income was presented in such a shape that it was impossible to ascertain the actual amount of it. It was a matter of notoriety that he had contracted debts to the large amount of about £90,000, and that he was unable to offer his creditors a satisfactory composition. He had been fooling and deluding the Bankruptcy Court for a considerable time. He had repeatedly obtained leave to let some lands of his, and had pocketed the rents without giving the Court any security whatever. The Sheriff in Dublin had endeavoured without effect to levy a decree which had been obtained against this broken-down defaulter and evader of his duties and financial obligations, who was not only retained in the Public Service, but retained as a pluralist, and sent on a secret mission to an approver which resulted in suicide. This was the same gentleman who some years ago defrauded his own wife after he had deluded her into marrying him. He was reported and denounced by Mr. Justice Fry to the Lord Chancellor; but no notice was taken of it. It was sworn that he had drawn up a marriage settlement on his own behalf, the validity of which was impugned, and which was a gross attempt to defraud. This man, who had repeatedly deluded the Bankruptcy Court, conducted his domestic affairs in such a manner that the Sheriffs and Law Officers were utterly unable to seize even a chair or a table in order to execute one of the decrees obtained against him. He (Mr. Sexton) and his hon. Friends near him would have to press for an answer to the question as to how much this man received from the public purse every year. He observed that the hon. and learned Solicitor General smiled.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir FARRER HERSCHELL): I was not smiling at the observations of the hon. Member.

MR. SEXTON said, he thought that if the hon. and learned Gentleman knew the full facts of the case all his influence—which undoubtedly was very great—would be brought to bear upon the case in order to free the Public Service from the stain of any connection with such a man. The reason he mentioned these facts was that he thought it would be desirable that the Government should take steps to allocate some of the money received from the public purse, in order to satisfy the creditors of a man who had perverted the administration of justice and made his own wife the victim of his frauds. It was, indeed, a remarkable thing that the chief engine for compelling other men to continue in the paths of legality and honesty should be himself the very embodiment of illegality and dishonesty. He had to ask how long would this system of dealing be allowed to last? Would the Government allow such a shameful parody upon public justice to continue, and allow such a man to pocket his salary as Crown Solicitor for Tipperary and all the special fees, and to evade payment of his debts by numerous discreditable ingenuities? Would no arrangement be made for the benefit of his creditors, for he maintained that the scandal had reached a height that could no longer be permitted. As a protest, he begged to move the reduction of the Vote by £400, and, unless he received an assurance as to the arrangements which would be immediately made for the satisfaction of Bolton's creditors, it was the intention of the Irish Members to press the Motion with all the force they could. He believed when the action of the Bankruptcy Court in Dublin the other day was considered, it would be only reasonable that the Government should withdraw this portion of the Vote from the consideration of the Committee until the question of the character of Mr. George Bolton was decided in the same way that that of Gustavus Cornwall had been decided. Bolton had commenced an action against his hon. Friend the Member for Mallow (Mr. O'Brien) in Belfast, and the trial was to come on in a day or two. The other day, when Bolton's case came before the Bankruptcy Court in Dublin, the Judge, after there had been numerous evasions of the orders of the Court, and after Bolton's ingenuity had been exerted to the utmost, instead of making him disgorge some of his ill-gotten gains for the benefit of his creditors, postponed the investigation of his affairs, because he thought that Mr. George Bolton would probably obtain damages in Belfast against his hon. Friend. The Solicitor General for England looked surprised; but his hon. Friend the Member for Queen's County (Mr. A. O'Connor) remarked that, however easy it might be to surprise the learned Solicitor General for England in regard to the administration of the Irish law, the Irish Members were too well acquainted with the matter to be surprised at anything. Suppose that a public official in England contracted debts to the extent of £90,000, that his action was impugned and stigmatized by questionable proceedings, that the time came when a public Court called upon him to make a disclosure of his debts and assets, and his capability of meeting his obligations, what would the learned Solicitor General think of that individual, having, at the dictation of his superiors, brought an action against a public journalist for an accusation well known to be true? Suppose that in such a case he had been allowed to delay the examination of his affairs, and to keep a veil closely drawn over his repulsive character, because the Judge said he had brought an action and might probably obtain damages. He thought the learned Solicitor General would say that the Judge had departed from that impartiality which was to have been expected from his office in order to prejudice the minds of the jury unfavourably, and to put a gloss upon the merits of the case which were not consistent with a fair trial. He thought that they had a strong claim to call for the postponement of the payment of such a person's salary until his character was decided, and until it could be shown that he was entitled to be retained as a public servant. He begged to move the reduction of the Vote by the sum of £400.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

Mr. HARRINGTON said, he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would consider the point raised by his hon. Friend the Member for Sligo with regard to the postponement of this Vote until the trial. The trial would probably take place during the present week, and certainly before the Vote was likely to come up upon Report, even if it were passed now, and the House would then be in a position to judge what the nature of certain circumstances in connection with this official was. As a matter of fact, Mr. Bolton's character was about to be tried by a jury of his own selection. He had lodged an affidavit that there was only one county in Ireland in which he could hope to obtain a fair trial. This immaculate official, this manipulator of juries, this wire-puller in connection with all the trials by jury under the Prevention of Crime Act in Ireland, had himself deposited an affidavit, in which he declared upon oath that there was only one county in which he could obtain a fair trial of the action between himself and the hon. Member for Mallow (Mr. O'Brien), and that county happened to be the one in which it was well known the hon. Member had no influence whatever, and where the case would be tried by an Orange jury. He (Mr. Harrington) believed that upon that fact alone Bolton stood condemned. It showed that his character had fallen so low, that his depravity was so notorious, and his public life so well known and con-damned, that he himself declared that in 31 out of 32 counties of Ireland he could not hope to obtain a verdict; and that the only chance he had was to go to a place where the hon. Member for Mallow was personally disliked. Tomorrow they would be in a position to have Bolton's character decided by a jury of his own selection; and he submitted that, under the circumstances, they had an unanswerable claim to have the Vote postponed. Until they were in a position to know what the allegations made against Bolton were, and what the nature of his defence was, the House of Commons ought to withhold the payment of his salary. His hon. Friend the Member for Sligo had stated the amount of this man's liabilities. As a public official he had been receiving some four or five different salaries, including £400 a-year as Solicitor to the Boundary and Valuation Survey, £400 a-year as Crown Solicitor for the County of Tipperary, with very large pickings through his friend Mr. Anderson, under the Prevention of Crime Act, which brought up his income to at least £1,500 or £2,000 a-year. He was the one man in whom the whole system of Crown prosecutions in Ireland was vested. His case was somewhat similar to that of James Ellis French, the late Head of the Criminal Detective Department of Ireland. That immaculate public servant was required to hunt out criminals, and, in order to do so, he reduced himself to the level of the lowest of them by the commission of the most horrible crimes. George Bolton was the man upon whom the Crown rested for the prosecution of criminals; and he (Mr. Harrington) would appeal to the fairness of English Members whether, seeing that, in the course of a few days, there would be a definite judgment as to this man's personal character from the one jury in Ireland with whom he dared to intrust his reputation—a jury selected and manipulated by himself—it was desirable to pass this Vote? How did it come to pass that the House were compelled from time to time to listen to the history of the private lives of Irish officials? No doubt, it was a most unpleasant thing, but it was a duty to be obliged to call attention to the private character of officials; but, unpleasant though it was, it was a duty which they owed to that House and to their constituents, for so long as men of Bolton's character were retained in the Public Service in Ireland so long would the people of that country have a hearty contempt for the character of the administration there by Her Majesty's Government. With salaries amounting to £1,500 or £2,000 a-year, this man, with no family, and without even a residence of his own, had become involved in debts to the extent of £90,000. And how did he propose to meet his engagements? For nearly 12 months past a suit had been pending against him in the Court of Bankruptcy, and day after day motions had been made to delay the proceedings. Bolton was simply dodging, just as James Ellis French attempted to dodge, the accusations made against him by the hon. Member for Mallow (Mr. O'Brien). The affidavit he had submitted to the Court of Bankruptcy was a most singular document. If such an affidavit had been presented in this country by a Government official, he did not think that such Government official would have been allowed to remain in the Public Service for 24 hours. His liabilities were £90,000, and on what did he ground his application for delay? He said, in his affidavit, that he had an action pending for libel against the hon. Member for Mallow, and that he hoped that action would bring him in such damages as would enable him to be in a better position to meet the claims of his creditors, and to make a better offer. Why, anything more monstrous, anything more ruffianly, he might almost say, than that affidavit had never been presented to a Court of Justice. In no country in the world would a Judge listen to, much less act upon, such an affidavit outside Ireland. It was really insulting the intelligence of hon. Members in that House to ask for a Vote for Mr. Bolton under the present circumstances, because he had brought his battered character into Court, and hoped, by a jury of his own selection, to get such a verdict as would enable him to make his creditors an offer of a few shillings more in the pound. To whom were they to vote this salary of £400? Was it to Mr. Bolton? In his (Mr. Harrington's) opinion, it ought to be voted to Mr. Bolton's creditors. Were they to vote money to a man who had hitherto failed to lead a decent or Christian life in order to enable him to defraud his creditors? This man did not deny that he had defrauded his wife; he did not deny the allegation that he had led an infamous life while married; but he said that, though he was guilty of every crime in the Decalogue, there was one crime of which he was not guilty, but it was a crime with which he was never charged; and yet upon that point he appealed to a jury of his own selection to give him damages, so that he might do something in order to satisfy his creditors. He was surprised that that Government had not long ago taken steps to expunge this man's name from the Votes. It was scandal enough that he should be connected with one Government Department; but there was scarcely a Vote in connection with the Irish Administration in which the name of George Bolton did not turn up. They knew very well that much they had to say against the Government of Ireland was due to the action of this man. They knew that he had been selected as the man to manipulate the juries whose panelling had given such great dissatisfaction—that he was a man who, standing up in a Court of Justice as Crown Solicitor, dared to insult men of the highest and best position in Dublin because he knew them to be possessed of religious feelings and a conscience. The very moment a Roman Catholic presented himself in the jury-box this was the moral man, this immaculate Government official, this man with a high sense of conscience, who insulted him and ordered him to withdraw, no matter how law-abiding a citizen he might be, no matter how high his social position, or even if he were in the Commission of the Peace. The reason was that he hesitated at nothing in order to secure his victim. But how could it be expected, when he displayed no conscientious scruples in his dealings with his own wife or his creditors, that he would manifest any in the discharge of his public duties? He did so because he wanted a verdict, he cared not how; because he wanted results, however obtained; and it was not surprising that he did so when his antecedents were borne in mind. No matter what complaints were made of the Government; no matter what charges they made against public officials in Ireland, and no matter how strong the evidence upon which they rested them, it would have no effect upon Members in that House, who by their votes practically said that the Irish Members were liars, until, after sacrificing time, energy, and money, like his hon. Friend the Member for Mallow (Mr. O'Brien), they forced the truth of their statements upon reluctant English minds. They had a definite set of grievances to complain of. They were told of corruption under the American system of Government. No person could now be surprised at the statement of the hon. Member for Leeds (Mr. Herbert Gladstone), when he said that Ireland was the worst governed country in Europe. The hon. Gentleman might even have used stronger language to describe the state of things which prevailed; but he promised the hon. Member that as the Party to which he (Mr. Harrington) belonged grew in strength, and were able to grasp all that was occurring, they would drag into light a state of things that the hon. Member little dreamt of when he made that statement. The hon. Gentleman was proceeding to reiterate the special charges against Mr. Bolton when he was called to Order by

THE CHAIRMAN (Sir LYON PLAYFAIR), who said: The hon. Member is repeating the argument which he has already several times used in the course of his speech.

Mr. HARRINGTON said, he was putting to the Secretary to the Treasury a question as to whether he would apply himself in this case to ascertaining whether the moral character of this man was such as reflected credit on the Department to which he belonged; whether the Department had taken any steps to mark the sense of their disapproval of his conduct; and whether they approved of the extraordinary affidavit which Bolton had made in the Bankruptcy Court? He asked the hon. Gentleman whether an official who was in debt to so large an extent, an official who had brought an action for libel against a Member of that House in order that, if he succeeded, he might be able to make a composition with his creditors, ought to remain in the Public Service? He asked if the hon. Gentleman had taken any steps to make known his sense of, or his disapproval of, the conduct of an individual who had presented such an affidavit as had been described? He hoped that a statement would be forthcoming from the Government Bench which would show to every official in the Public Service, whose character and whose conduct was as discreditable as that of Mr. Bolton's, that he would not be shielded by the Government.

MR. COURTNEY said, he thought that, whatever else might be said with regard to this Vote, it was to be regretted that it afforded another opportunity of introducing the name of Mr. Bolton. It was unfortunate that the manner in which the Civil Service Estimates were made out caused his name to be so often referred to.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR: Unfortunate — unfortunate for the Government.

MR. HARRINGTON: Strike his name out of the Estimates.

MR. COURTNEY said, he would appeal to hon. Members, in view of the circumstance that the salary of this gentleman as Crown Solicitor for Tipperary was coming forward next week on the Vote for Law Charges, that this was a reason for deferring any observations they had to make with respect to Mr. Bolton until that Vote was reached. As the hon. Member for Westmeath (Mr. Harrington) said that this official was bringing an action against the hon. Member for Mallow (Mr. O'Brien) to vindicate his character—[MR. KENNY: He has no character.]—and as that action was coming on that day or to-morrow, he would put it to hon. Gentlemen opposite whether, in view of that fact, it would not be well to follow the course he had suggested? He asked hon. Gentlemen opposite whether, seeing that this action was pending, it was making a judicious use of the time of the House to say, as the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) had said, that every charge against Mr. Bolton was true; and again to say, as the hon. Member for Westmeath had said, that this official had broken every article of the Decalogue except in respect of some crime which he (Mr. Courtney) believed was not included in the Decalogue? He could not but think, in reference to some remarks that had been made, that the course then being pursued by hon. Gentlemen opposite was highly inconvenient. There were two aspects of the case which were really pertinent to the discussion of the question; first of all, there was the question whether Mr. Bolton was or was not to be retained in the Public Service. And he thought that hon. Members ought to consider whether judgment on that question should not, at all events, await the decision of the action then pending, and whether the taking of any action in that House would not prejudice the decision of the jury, or prejudice any action which the Government might think fit to take after the conclusion of the trial. The second point was as to the relations existing between this official and his creditors. The hon. Member opposite said that Mr. Bolton had presented a Petition to the Court of Bankruptcy, and he asked him (Mr. Courtney) whether he had not received official notice of the affidavit filed by Mr. Bolton in the Court of Bankruptcy. He had not received any official notice on the subject, nor did he see how such notice could have been given to him. Had the matter come before him it might have been officially considered; but no such step, as far as he was aware, had been taken. But he must point out that this was a matter for the consideration of the Judge in Bankruptcy, who would in due course determine what Mr. Bolton must do in respect of his debts—what portion of his salary he must assign for his debts—but it was not the business of the Treasury to go into that question; they could not constitute themselves liquidators to Mr. Bolton's estate, or direct him in any way to make some arrangement with his creditors. The Treasury, it was true, might have to consider the question of retaining Mr. Bolton in office; they might have to consider the necessity of obeying an order of the Court of Bankruptcy with regard to his income if that order were made. But it was obviously a question for the Judge in Bankruptcy; and it was not for that House or for the Treasury to do anything that would prejudice the action-at-law which was then pending. Again, he would point out that this was a Vote of money for an Office, not necessarily for Mr. Bolton personally. It was a Vote of money for an Office, and it did not follow that it would be paid to Mr. Bolton. If he continued in the office the money might be paid to him; but he might have to resign his office, and the question might arise as to whether the money should be paid to his creditors. Further, the question as to retaining Mr. Bolton in the Public Service or dismissing him was one which might be raised, as he had before pointed out, on the Vote for Irish Law Charges, which would come on at the end of the week, or more probably at the beginning of next week, by which time the Government would be in possession of the view of Mr. Bolton's character taken by a Court of Law, which must necessarily command more respect than ex parte statements of hon. Members made in that House.

MR. ARTHUR ARNOLD said, he thought there was no ground whatever for the postponement of this Vote, which might be interpreted and used at the trial as an ex parte expression of opinion by the Committee. He rose, however, for the purpose of putting a question to the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury with reference to the Public Service, of which he had had at one time the honour of being a member. He (Mr. Arnold) held that the rule of the Public Service was that when a man presented a Petition in Bankruptcy he ceased to be a member of the Public Service, and he asked the hon. Gentleman whether that rule was still in force; because he was of opinion that if the rule did not now exist the sooner it was re-established the better it would be for the public interest. He did not hesitate to say that the character of the Public Service demanded that this should be the case. Further, he would take that opportunity of expressing his opinion that hon. Members on both sides of the House had abstained during that day's discussion very properly from any matters relating to the question at issue in the action now pending. He laid it down as a principle that if Mr. Bolton had presented a Petition in Bankruptcy, that fact ought to be sufficient to cause his suspension from the Public Service. The character of the Public Service demanded that the rule which existed in England should be carried out in Ireland; and if any hon. Member would move for the omission of Mr. Bolton's salary on that ground he should be happy to support him.

MR. GIBSON said, the hon. Member who had just sat down had pointed out that it would not be reasonable to ask for the postponement of this Vote, because it might be used at the trial as a partial expression of opinion by that Committee. But he (Mr. Gibson) thought that neither would it be reasonable to ask for a declaration of opinion on the part of the Committee on a Motion to reduce the Vote by the amount of Mr. Bolton's salary, which might with equal possibility be made use of in the course of the trial to-morrow. As far as he had read the papers, it appeared that no adjudication of bankruptcy had yet taken place.

MR. ARTHUR ARNOLD: I understand that he has himself presented the Petition.

MR. GIBSON asked the hon. Member for Salford to take his statement. He had read the report of the case in the public Press pretty closely, and from what had occurred he was not aware that Mr. Bolton's status before the law had been in the slightest degree altered in any respect whatever. Proceedings had been taken—no doubt those proceedings were pending; but no adjudication of bankruptcy had taken place.

MR. ARTHUR ARNOLD: Is there a Petition in Bankruptcy, or is there not?

MR. GIBSON said, he wished to record his own opinion of what had taken place, and, having said so much, he desired to make a few more remarks in support of what had fallen from the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury. It had been mentioned by those hon. Members who had spoken prominently in reference to this Vote that a trial of an important character would take place to-morrow in Belfast, in which trial Mr. Bolton was the plaintiff. Now, surely that was a circumstance which should make hon. Members in all parts of the House anxious to do nothing and to say nothing which might by a hair's-breadth affect the result of that trial. For his own part, he offered no opinion with reference to that trial one way or the other. It was an action for libel, in which Mr. Bolton claimed large damages for what was obviously, if it were well founded on fact, a grave and terrible charge. As to whether that charge was made he offered no opinion, and as to what should be the result of the trial he expressed no opinion whatever; it was obvious that all these questions should be left to the constituted tribunals. Much had been said in the course of the discussion which he thought might better have been left unsaid. With regard to the venue, which had been placed in Belfast, it was alleged, that Mr. Bolton stated that in 32 counties in Ireland he could not get a fair trial. He (Mr. Gibson) was not aware that Mr. Bolton said anything of the kind. The question of venue was argued before the Court of Queen's Bench in Ireland; and the Court, having heard the arguments, stated that the case of Mr. Bolton was that the defendant was editor of a newspaper which had a large circulation, and circulated much more in Dublin than in other parts of Ireland.

Mr. HARRINGTON: As I read the report, Lord Justice Barry said that Mr. Bolton stated he could not get a fair trial in 32 counties.

Mr. GIBSON said, however that might be, it was not the point. He had read the reports of these legal proceedings in the Queen's Bench. When the Motion came on for hearing, the Judges decided that under the circumstances they were not at all at liberty to interfere with the plaintiff's selection of the venue in Belfast. The defendant was not satisfied, and he appealed to the Court of Appeal in Ireland, which consisted of so many able and eminent Judges, and the ruling of the Court was that they concurred in the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench, and that they were not called upon in the interest of justice to interfere with the venue being changed from Belfast. It was said by the hon. Member for Westmeath (Mr. Harrington) that Lord Justice Barry made an observation in the course of the proceedings with reference to the number of counties in which it was alleged that Mr. Bolton could not obtain a fair trial. He was quite willing to accept any statement as to what occurred; but that eminent Judge did not in any way whatever dissent from the judgment of the Appeal Court, which, without question, sanctioned the exercise of the plaintiff's discretion in placing the venue in Belfast. Then it was alleged against Mr. Bolton that he had sworn a certain affidavit in the Bankruptcy Court, which affidavit had been described as infamous. He would not go into the question in detail; but he was bound to say in passing that it did not seem to him to be necessarily or in any respect infamous that a man should make a statement that a verdict was pending which might place him in possession of more funds than he had at present, and consequently enable him to make a better settlement with his creditors. But why was Mr. Bolton so obnoxious to attack on the part of Members below the Gangway? Was it because he was Crown Solicitor? Why, he had for years been a solicitor in Ireland; and he ventured to say that if he had been merely Crown Solicitor, getting not a large salary, or even Solicitor to another Department with a moderate salary for discharging the duties of his office, not one word would have been said against him in that House. He (Mr. Gibson) had had official relations with Mr. Bolton for many years; he had been directly connected with him as Crown Solicitor, and his experience was that Mr. Bolton was an able, energetic, and a judicious public servant, who endeavoured to perform his duty to the public without bringing any unfair pressure to bear against prisoners. That being so, he should be wrong if he withheld his testimony on the subject. Why was it, then, at that hour of the day, that this attack had been made on Mr. Bolton? Was it not largely because Mr. Bolton's services had been used by the present Government in the exercise of their official discretion to aid and assist them in most of the important prosecutions which had arrested public attention in Ireland during the last two or three years? He believed that was the case, and that Mr. Bolton's name as Crown Prosecutor had won for him an amount of unpopularity which but for that circumstance would not have attached to him. ["No, no!"] He believed that to be a fair observation, at the same time he should be very ready to accept any statement that proceeded from minds unprejudiced on the subject. He asked whether it was wise, reasonable, or just, having regard to the fact that a trial was about to take place in which Mr. Bolton was plaintiff, and in which the hon. Member for Mallow (Mr. O'Brien) was defendant, that anything should be done on either side of the House which would convey to the public the idea that there was a desire to pre-judice the case in any way whatever. Mr. Bolton had not brought his action without advice and consideration. That must be clear to everyone. If it were a well-founded action, he was entitled to get a fair hearing; and if it were unfounded, and the jury were satisfied, the defendant was entitled to get his case heard with every impartiality. He did not discuss the merits of various observations made with reference to Mr. Bolton. He had alluded to them before, and it was not necessary to go into them again. But the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury had pointed to one circumstance which was worthy of notice. It was said that this Vote should not be allowed to pass before the trial, because there might not be any other opportunity of discussing it after the trial, in the event of its being thought right, having regard to the result of the pending litigation, to take certain action. That point had, he thought, been met by the circumstance that there would be a Vote taken in the course of the next four or five days which included the salary of Mr. Bolton as Crown Solicitor, and which would afford ample opportunity of discussing the whole matter. He had, of course, no right to regulate the action of anyone in that House but himself, nor did he seek to do so; but he did not think it unreasonable, without expressing any feeling one way or the other, to say that it was not in consonance with the requirements of the position to have a discussion on the present Vote which might be calculated to lead to opinions being formed and expressed one way or the other on the very eve of the trial. The discussion then taking place would be reported in all the newspapers of tomorrow morning, amongst others the newspapers in Belfast, and for his own part he should be very sorry if anything should escape him to the prejudice either of the plaintiff or defendant, whose case would be decided very shortly upon the evidence given before a Judge and jury.

MR. RYLANDS rose to speak—

MR. COURTNEY: As I foresee another flood of easy declamation—

MR. ARTHUR ARNOLD: I must protest against this statement of the Secretary to the Treasury.

MR. RYLANDS: I certainly protest against it.

MR. ARTHUR ARNOLD: It is monstrous.

MR. COURTNEY said, the question had been raised by the hon. Member for Salford (Mr. Arnold) as to the practice in the Civil Service under certain circumstances.

MR. ARTHUR ARNOLD: The question was raised as to whether Mr. Bolton had or had not presented the Petition in Bankruptcy?

MR. COURTNEY said, he had understood the hon. Member for Salford to ask if it were not the rule in the Civil Service that a person who presented a Petition in Bankruptcy ceased ipso facto to be a member of the Civil Service? Further, he understood the hon. Gentleman to state that if that were not the rule at present, the sooner it was made so the better. He (Mr. Courtney) wished to state what was the practice in the Civil Service with respect to both England and Ireland. The rule was that if a person became bankrupt in England, Ireland, or Scotland, it did not matter which, he at once became liable to dismissal. But it was also the case that his dismissal depended entirely on the character of his bankruptcy. If the bankruptcy appeared to be the result of riotous living and extravagance, and if there was any suspicion of fraud, the man was, of course, dismissed. But the hon. Member would know that there were bankruptcies which involved no kind of moral guilt on the part of the individual. For instance, a person holding bank shares as a Trustee who became personally liable for a large amount of money through the failure of the bank might become bankrupt, and on the supposition that that gentleman was a member of the Civil Service, it would be monstrous to dismiss him under such circumstances. It remained to him to allude to an observation which had escaped him in jest, and for which he offered his apologies to his hon. Friend the Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands).

MR. RYLANDS said, he readily accepted the apology of his hon. Friend; but he was bound to say that he could not accept with satisfaction the statement with which he had met the complaints of the hon. Member for Salford (Mr. Arnold). He had a strong impression that the course taken by the Secretary to the Treasury had certainly led to a great waste of public time. They all knew that hon. Gentlemen from Ireland occupied a very different position in that House to that occupied by English Members. He regretted the necessity under which Irish Members lay of constantly calling attention in that House to grievances connected with Irish officials. They were in a peculiar position in that respect, for if any scandals such as hon. Members from Ireland had brought under the notice of the House were to occur amongst public officials in England, the Press of the country and the public opinion of the country would crush the offenders. In this case it was the voice of a few Irish Members who represented public opinion in Ireland that the Government had to listen to. He asked whether public opinion in Ireland affected Dublin Castle? Not at all. Was it not a fact that Irish Members had only that House in which to make their complaints, and was it not a fact that they came down night after night and brought to the knowledge of the House evidence that the whole of the Public Service in Ireland was honeycombed with influences which were calculated to create a bad impression? They were told to wait the result of the trial pending. That, he supposed, was the action against the hon. Member for Mallow (Mr. O'Brien); but he would point out that, in all probability, there would be other actions brought against the hon. Member for Mallow by Government officials, and surely it could not be contended that hon. Members were to refrain from expressing their opinions upon the charges against Mr. Bolton until those actions had been decided. From their experience of what had already occurred, were they not to anticipate that the charges made by the hon. Member for Mallow had some foundation? He did not wish to prejudice the case in the slightest degree; he knew nothing about it; but he was bound to say that he had heard Questions put in that House over and over again with regard to Mr. Bolton's conduct, and that he had heard answers from the Treasury Bench which had impressed his mind with the belief that if any public official in England were made the subject of the imputations cast upon Mr. Bolton, the Government would have been bound to investigate those charges, and to have dismissed him in the event of their being found to be true. The hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury said it was an unfortunate circumstance that this gentleman's salary appeared on the Votes in such a way as to afford an opportunity of frequently raising this question with regard to Mr. Bolton. Why, if it were not for that, there would be no opportunity of discussing Mr. Bolton's conduct as a public servant.

MR. COURTNEY: I only said that in a humorous sense. I said it was unfortunate that the name should appear twice.

MR. RYLANDS said, if his hon. Friend considered the expression "unfortunate circumstance" was humorous, it did not give him that impression. He said that hon. Members from Ireland had no other chance than that which was offered by the discussion of the Estimates of controlling these matters in Ireland. They had no Parliament of their own; and, therefore, they came to that House and had to take advantage of the Votes to raise questions which deeply interested them and their constituents. He had felt constantly that English Members of the Imperial Parliament laboured under a serious disadvantage, from the fact that there was ground—serious ground—for the endeavours of Irish Members to direct attention in England to the state of affairs existing in Ireland. Now, he regretted that his right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland was not present. He thought his right hon. Friend ought to have been in his place when this Vote was under discussion. His hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor General for Ireland also was absent, although he had been in his place a short time ago. His hon. Friend the Secretary to the Treasury could not be expected to answer the questions put to him with regard to Mr. Bolton's position; he could not answer the question of the hon. Member for Salford (Mr. Arnold) as to whether the Petition in Bankruptcy had been presented by Mr. Bolton himself or by others. Well, his hon. Friend said that that did not affect the question. If a man were simply dragged into the Bankruptcy Court by having a Petition filed against him, there were answers which could be made to such a Petition, and it might, perhaps, be that the Court would refuse the application; but this was a very different position from that occupied by a man who went to the Court and proclaimed his own bankruptcy, and petitioned as a bankrupt. It was a fact that his hon. Friend the Member for Salford asked for information with regard to the presentation of the Petition in Bankruptcy. The right hon. and learned Gentleman opposite the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Gibson) gave his own impression of what had taken place; but the Secretary to the Treasury could not say whether any Petition had been presented by Mr. Bolton or not. Well, he (Mr. Rylands) had the best reasons for knowing that a Petition was presented by Mr. Bolton himself. But, whether that was so or not, what struck him was that from time to time a great deal had been brought before the House touching the conduct of this public official; and although he knew nothing personally about the matter, the impression he derived from the answers given to the Questions of Irish Members from the Treasury Bench was that it was the duty of the Executive to consider whether Mr. Bolton should be retained in office or not. His hon. Friend the Secretary to the Treasury told the Committee that there would be another opportunity after the trial had taken place of raising and discussing this question. So far, he was willing that the matter should remain over until the Vote for Irish Law Charges was reached. But although he did not dispute the argument of the hon. Gentleman that this £400 was required for the purposes of the Office, and that it would not necessarily be paid to Mr. Bolton, yet he could not agree that the Vote should be taken on that ground without discussion, because hon. Gentlemen who protested against the conduct of an employee would have no opportunity of making their voice heard unless they took advantage of the Votes as they came forward, for that was the only means of making known their grievances. He repeated that he should be willing to allow the matter to remain until the other Vote referred to had been reached, which, he believed, would afford an opportunity of deciding the question; and then, if the charges against Mr. Bolton were made good, he believed it would be quite possible to get the Committee to strike out the Vote for his salary. In conclusion, he deeply regretted that there should be a necessity for these constant representations on the part of hon. Gentlemen from Ireland, which they were perfectly justified in bringing under the notice of the House, with regard to officials in Ireland who appeared to conduct themselves in a manner that was neither creditable to themselves nor for the advantage of the people of Ireland.

Mr. SEXTON said, he thought it was unfortunate that they should be obliged to carry on a discussion involving the conduct and character of an important Irish official in the absence of the Minister who was chiefly acquainted with and responsible for affairs in Ireland—that was to say, in the absence of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland. He thought the absence of the right hon. Gentleman was all the more regrettable because the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury had pleaded, in the course of the discussion, that he had not been officially informed as to the position of Mr. George Bolton before the Court of Bankruptcy. The Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland was, as the Parliamentary Head of the Department, officially informed of Mr. Bolton's affairs, and there could be no doubt that had he been in his place on that occasion he would have been able to enlighten the Committee with regard to them; but, as he was not present, he thought there was an additional reason for the postponement of the Vote. Notwithstanding that he knew the right hon. Gentleman was very much overworked by his labour in that House, he was bound to say that he considered his absence greatly to be regretted. Although he had a serious objection to the speech of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Gibson), he took the liberty to point out that it would be well if the Secretary to the Treasury would induce himself to imitate the Parliamentary method of the right hon. and learned Gentleman. The hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury, whenever he had anything to say, made his argument needlessly offensive. There were circumstances, of course, in which the phrase "easy declamation" might be used; but it should be remembered that the retention of Mr. Bolton in his official position was well calculated to excite in the minds of Irish Members indignation; and before the hon. Gentleman accused them of indulging in "easy declamation" on that subject, he thought he should consider the propriety of retracting his ill-considered phrase about "unfortunate conscientiousness" with-which the Estimates were drawn up. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman would have preferred a system under which Mr. Bolton's salary could be buried out of sight, and not appear on the Estimates at all. He thought the phrase unfortunate, and one which could not be explained away by any reference to humour. It was a very unfortunate humour, which misled the House of Commons. The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin had accused them of want of impartiality and want of due regard for the raising of the character of debate in that House, by their attacking the character of a man who was a party to the action to be tried to-morrow. The right hon. and learned Gentleman was a skilful debater, and was accustomed with great force to urge his advice upon that House; but his (Mr. Sexton's) complaint was that his whole speech was saturated with the effort to defend the character of Mr. Bolton. He had accused hon. Members on those Benches because they brought forward what they claimed to be facts, while he spoke of the industry, zeal, and energy of Mr. Bolton in such a manner as by oblique means to convey to the jury that a verdict should be found in his favour. Well, the right hon. and learned Gentleman asked why Mr. Bolton had been singled out for attack, and he said it was on account of the manner in which he had conducted certain prosecutions. He (Mr. Sexton) repelled with all his force the accusation that any man on those Benches had attacked Mr. Bolton because of any special energy or vigour that he had displayed in the discharge of his duties. There were plenty of other men in Ireland who displayed energy and ability. Was Mr. Cornwall singled out, because he had energy and ability, which he displayed in the interest of the State? No. Mr. Bolton had been singled out, as Mr. Cornwall had been singled out because he had committed offences which rendered his retention in a Public Office a scandal; and he (Mr. Sexton) asserted for himself and his hon. Friends that so long as any official in Ireland conducted himself properly he would never be attacked from those Benches, but that when such official misconducted himself he would be made the object of attack in the manner which he deserved, and in that manner only. The fact was left out of view that for many years the main features of Mr. Bolton's life had been matter of notoriety. It mattered little whether a Petition to the Bankruptcy Court had been presented by him or against him, the fact being notorious that he owed £90,000, that he would not or could not pay 1*d.* of that money, that the Sheriff of Dublin could not execute a decree of 6*d.* against him, and that he had repeatedly evaded the order of the Court with respect to the land which he possessed. Hon. Members on those Benches were blamed for anticipating the merits of the trial which would take place to-morrow. Upon that he desired to make two observations. First, they were there as the Representatives of the people, and they said that the public interest concerned in the retention of a man of this character in an important office in the Public Service was infinitely greater than the interests either of the plaintiff or defendant in the case to be tried to-morrow. If there were any obligation upon them to be discreet and reserved in their language, how much greater was that obligation upon the Judges on the Irish Bench? But had they set an example of discretion and reserve? Why, on the very motion for changing the venue in the action against his hon. Friend the Member for Mallow (Mr. O'Brien), when his hon. Friend pleaded that his life would not be safe in Belfast, one of the Judges observed that he would be as safe in Belfast as at church—that was to say, if he ever went to church. That was the impartiality, that was the reserve of the Judicial Bench in Ireland, exhibited by a Judge when he was sending his hon. Friend, a Catholic in creed, to be tried by a Protestant jury in a Protestant Court at Belfast; when it was known that there was no man who stood higher in social character and with regard to the observances of his creed than the hon. Member for Mallow. So much for one of the Judges. Again, when this Petition came before Judge Walsh, the other day, although in the ordinary course of law the affairs of Mr. Bolton should have been laid before the public at that moment, the Judge granted him delay and gave him immunity until the trial was over, because, as he said, Mr. Bolton had brought an action against Mr. O'Brien, and there was a probability that he might obtain a verdict. That was another example of judicial impartiality and reserve on the part of the Irish Bench. When Judges behaved in that manner, were they, the Irish Members, to be accused for taking advantage of an occasion when it arose for denouncing an individual in the interests of the public? It appeared to him extraordinary on the part of the Government that they should expect Irish Members to forego discussion on Mr. Bolton's salary in this Vote on the ground that a trial was to take place. It was no fault of theirs that the trial had been fixed for to-morrow; the succession of time and events was not the work of Irish Members, and if the Government did not want the discussion with regard to Mr. Bolton to come on they could very easily have avoided it. Nothing more was necessary than to withdraw the Vote. But they had not done that, and therefore he said that if the interests of justice were involved in what had occurred or would occur in the course of the discussion, upon the Government, and not upon hon. Members on those Benches, rested the blame. The hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury said he was not officially informed on the subject of Mr. Bolton's affairs. He thought the hon. Gentleman should be ashamed of such an admission.

MR. COURTNEY said, his statement was that the Treasury had no official information with regard to the affidavit of Mr. Bolton in the Court of Bankruptcy.

MR. SEXTON contended that, when the salary of an official in Ireland was brought before the House, it was not creditable that an official charged with defending the Vote should be unable to inform hon. Members with respect to a transaction intimately connected with the character of the individual for whom the money was asked, and consequently intimately connected with the question as to whether that individual should be retained in the Public Service. He asked upon what principle of justice, when hon. Gentlemen on those Benches requested to be informed whether or not George Bolton had petitioned to be made a bankrupt, and whether or not his creditors had petitioned the Court against him, they were to be told that his salary was to be passed in that Committee without their questions being replied to, and without any answer to the question of the hon. Member for Salford (Mr. Arthur Arnold) and the remarks of other hon. Members as to whether a man would any longer be retained in the Civil Service who had presented a Petition, or against whom a Petition in Bankruptcy had been presented? He said they were entitled to receive from Her Majesty's Government the fullest information as to the state of Mr. Bolton's affairs. He could assure the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury that no sarcasm of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Gibson), no specious pleas delivered in sympathetic language, would prevent him or his hon. Friends taking advantage of every Constitutional opportunity that presented itself for criticizing the conduct of officials in Ireland. There might be another Vote to come forward next week, on which this question of Mr. Bolton could be raised; but Irish Members were so used to the manipulation of these matters by the Government, and to the devious course which they were in the habit of pursuing, when the conduct of their officials was called in question, that he would not be surprised, when the Vote for the Crown Solicitors came on next week, if they were told that Mr. George Bolton had been promoted for distinguished services; that he was no longer a Crown Solicitor, and that his conduct must not be discussed on the Vote at all. They were, he repeated, so accustomed to the procedure of the Government in cases of this kind, that, no matter how they were accused, they should do their duty, as Representatives of the people, and ask for no excuse for their mode of criticizing the personal conduct of officials in Ireland.

MR. ARTHUR ARNOLD said, he could not congratulate the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury on the method of his replies. He had himself put a simple question to the hon. Gentleman as to whether Mr. George Bolton had or had not presented a Petition to the Court of Bankruptcy? He had asked the hon. Gentleman, also, whether he had any authority for believing that he had done so, and had added that if Mr. George Bolton had presented a Petition to the Court of Bankruptcy, he ought, like any other public servant, to be immediately suspended, and probably dismissed. But the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury had presumed to meet that statement by a reference to "easy declamation," and by what he ventured to call humour. Now, he (Mr. A. Arnold) had a very strong opinion that the present was not an occasion for humour; and, moreover, although he had the highest respect for the character of his hon. Friend, he should have thought he would have been the last man in that House, when the conduct of a public servant was called in question, to attempt a rolé for which he was singularly unfitted—namely, that of humourist. Apparently, the hon. Gentleman could not give him an answer to the simple question as to whether this official, Mr. Bolton, had petitioned the Court of Bankruptcy? From information he (Mr. A. Arnold) possessed, he believed that was the case; and feeling, as he did, that in this matter Her Majesty's Government had acted with neglect in not immediately suspending Mr. Bolton from the Public Service, he should vote on the Division with hon. Gentlemen opposite.

Mr. WARTON said, he did not very much like the manner of the hon. Member for Salford (Mr. A. Arnold) in wishing to go to a Division immediately after his attack on the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury. He (Mr. Warton) was no friend of the Government, or of the Secretary to the Treasury; but he was bound to say that the hon. Gentleman had on that occasion been unfairly attacked by the hon. Member for Salford and others in the course of the debate. He (Mr. Warton) felt, with regard to the hon. Gentleman's allusion to humour, that it was a harmless and pleasant joke. He was surprised that Irishmen should have failed to perceive the harmless little jest of the Secretary to the Treasury—their minds, it would seem, having for the occasion sunk to a Scotch level. There were, of course, exceptions to the rule, and the perception of a joke was not given to all; but there was no excuse for Irishmen in a matter of this kind, and he thought it was wrong for them to take hold of an innocent observation which must have been so understood by almost everyone who heard it. With regard to the attitude assumed towards this question by the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands), he must say that he had never listened to a more unblushing Electioneering speech made by anyone in the prospect of a Dissolution. He thought there must be a great number of Irish voters in Burnley, or the hon. Member would not have said he regretted that Ireland had not a Parliament of her own. He believed that all English Members were in favour of the Union.

Mr. RYLANDS said, he had expressed no regret that Ireland had not a Parliament of her own.

Mr. WARTON said, it was true that the hon. Member for Burnley had not used the word regret; but he had asked what the Irish people could do, and said that Ireland had no Parliament of her own. That certainly was as much as to say that he regretted the fact that Ireland had no Parliament of her own; and he supposed the hon. Member's remark was intended for the Irish electors of Burnley. It was the first time during the present Session that they had heard the hon. Member announce his intention of voting against the Government in view of the approaching Election. With regard to Mr. Bolton's case, he was strongly of opinion that he ought to be retained as Public Prosecutor, because he held the threads of so many conspiracies in his hands. And he thought Her Majesty's Government would be justified in retaining him even if he had presented a Petition to the Court of Bankruptcy, which men often did with a view to arranging their affairs, after they had time to look around them, and especially on the ground that against Mr. Bolton, as Public Prosecutor, no charge had been or, he was convinced, could be made.

Mr. T. P. O'CONNOR said, he wished, on behalf of himself and other hon. Gentlemen on those Benches, to protest against the suggestion of the hon. and learned Member who had just sat down that Mr. Bolton should be retained in the office under discussion, because, as the hon. and learned Member for Bridport had alleged, there was no charge against him as Crown Prosecutor. They were not discussing in Committee that day Mr. Bolton's conduct as Crown Prosecutor. If that question were to be raised, it would be raised at the proper time. Their whole case at that moment was whether Mr. Bolton's personal character was such that he could be longer be continued with decency as a servant and official of Her Majesty's Government. That was the whole point under discussion. He did not deem it necessary to go into the rather unworthy suggestions of the hon. and learned Member for Bridport with regard to the attitude taken up on this question by the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands) and the hon. Member for Salford (Mr. A. Arnold). He would simply express his conviction that it was no small personal matter, such as the hope of securing a few votes, that made those hon. Gentlemen speak as they had done that day on the Vote before the Committee. He wished to call the attention of the Committee to the fact that they had witnessed that afternoon an opposition of a serious kind, indeed, to the attitude of the Government towards their subordinates, started by hon. Members opposite, and not by hon. Members on those Benches. That, he said, was a most significant fact. He knew it was a circumstance which would be marked with considerable satisfaction in Ireland, and he thought it was one which ought to act as a warning to the Head of Her Majesty's Government, who happened to be present on that occasion. Whenever a Napoleonic demonstration took place in Paris, the Republican journals took care to point to the fact that there were certain absentees from the demonstration, the reason being that most of those gentlemen had found their way inside the walls of gaols for conduct which, at other times, would perhaps have secured them reward. If any similar demonstration were hereafter to take place in Ireland, it might be that a large number of highly-rewarded officials in power there would find themselves in gaol for misconduct which had been allowed to pass unchecked. Apart from their strong political differences, Irish Members had a strong personal regard for the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland. For his own part, he considered him an official who acted indiscriminately, and often unwisely; but with regard to the right hon. Gentleman himself, most persons would agree with him when he said that they had for him the greatest respect as an honourable and high-minded gentleman. What was the position in which the right hon. Gentleman was placed? When he (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) saw the right hon. Gentleman in that House haggard, and weary, and distressed every day of his life, because of the association he was brought into with loathsome criminals, he maintained it was a position in which a gentleman like himself ought never to be allowed to be dragged into; but the uprising of hon. Gentlemen on that (the Irish) side of the House against the right hon. Gentleman as to his contact with officials in Ireland, was to save him, and other Englishmen in Ireland, from the stain and stigma of associating with these evil criminals in Ireland. The Vote was £400 for George Bolton, and the statement of Irish Members was this—that George Bolton ought not, and could not, be retained as an official of any Government who had a respect for itself, or a respect for the decencies of life. That was their whole case. What were their proofs in favour of that position? The Secretary to the Treasury must think that the House had been asleep for the past four years. The hon. Gentleman rose up and raised a question as to facts which he (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) thought had passed altogether into the domain of historical and undisputed facts. The charges the Irish Members brought against George Bolton were supposed by the hon. Gentleman to be supported merely by their ipse dixit. The hon. and learned Gentleman who had just spoken, and the right hon. and learned Gentleman the late Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Gibson), supposed that the attacks of the Irish Members on Mr. Bolton were because of his efficiency as a Crown Solicitor. Why, the main charge on which they relied was with regard to what had happened in 1876, before the present Irish Party in the House was thought of. The charge brought against Mr. Bolton was not made by a politician or an Irishman, but made by the deliberate judgment of an Englishman in an English Court of Law—in a judgment by Mr. Justice Fry, who charged Mr. Bolton in two characters—namely, as a solicitor and as a husband. These charges had not been, and could not be, denied by Mr. Bolton, either in one character or the other; and they should at once have disqualified him from any further employment under a decent and self-respecting Administration. What were the charges? Why, George Bolton married a lady of considerable fortune;

she asked him to draw up a deed that would give her control of her property; but betraying his trust as a solicitor, and also the more sacred duty of a husband, this man drew up a deed giving himself the disposal of her property, denuding her, in fact, of all she possessed. He drew up a deed giving himself the right of disposing of her property, and the right he so obtained he had carried to the extent of dissipating a very considerable amount of that unfortunate lady's wealth. There were several other charges against Mr. Bolton's moral character, but into these matters he (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) did not wish to go—charges affecting the character of the man which his official superiors were now considering, and which, in the case of an English official, they always did consider on the earliest possible occasion. He (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) contended that no Government, however much stronger than the one which at present controlled the destinies of this country, would dare to keep in office, for one week in England, an official against whom a Judge of the land had pronounced such a damning opinion as that pronounced by Mr. Justice Fry, in 1876, against Mr. Bolton. Take the second point. The Irish Members said that a man who had presented a Petition in Bankruptcy had no right to remain in the service of the Government. On the other side, it was declared that a Petition had not been presented by Mr. Bolton. The right hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Gibson) had, he thought, made a strong point of that—that the Petition was not presented by himself, but by some of his creditors. But, as a matter of fact, the Petition was presented by Mr. Bolton himself, and at that moment that man was in the position of being liable for £90,000, the debts for which he was unable to make anything like a decent provision. The hon. Member for Salford (Mr. Arnold) had got up and asked this very simple question, to which aye or no could have been easily given—namely, whether in this country an official who presented a Petition in Bankruptcy would not have been at once suspended until the case was decided? The Secretary to the Treasury could not deny that that was the rule.

MR. COURTNEY: I beg pardon; I stated exactly what the situation was. Whether Mr. Bolton presented the Petition himself, or whether the Petition was presented by others, I stated that the fact of a declaration of bankruptcy rendered a person liable to instant dismissal.

MR. HEALY: Why do not you dismiss him then?

MR. COURTNEY: Allow me to finish my sentence. I say, whoever presents the Petition, the fact of a declaration of bankruptcy against a public official renders him liable to instant dismissal. That applies to England and Ireland. There is an official examination into the affairs of such a public servant to determine the character of the bankruptcy. If it appears that the bankruptcy results from riotous living and improvidence, or, still more, if there is anything of fraud in the case, dismissal is absolute; but if, as may happen, a man become bankrupt through no fault of his own, but who, for instance, is in the unfortunate position of holding shares in an unlimited bank which has failed, and become liable to the extent of all he possesses for the debts of the bank, it would be a cruel and unjust thing to dismiss him. In the present case, we are waiting for the decision as to the character of the bankruptcy before we decide upon what course to follow.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, he had a clear recollection of what the right hon. Gentleman had said, and he now merely repeated what he had said before. No doubt, the rule laid down by the hon. Gentleman as to the dismissal of public servants, and their retention in office in cases of bankruptcy, was a thoroughly just and equitable rule for the conduct of the Heads of Departments in dealing with their subordinates. Lest he should misrepresent the hon. Gentleman, he wished to ask him whether it was not the fact that, pending the decision of Bankruptcy Petitions, officials were not subject to suspension from the performance of their duties?

MR. COURTNEY: Not necessarily.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: But as a rule?

MR. COURTNEY: I do not think any rule could be laid down upon this subject; it is a matter for the discretion of the Heads of Departments.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, the hon. Member for Queen's County (Mr. A. O'Connor), who had a larger experience of the Civil Service even than the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury, informed him that the rule and practice was that when an official had presented a Petition in Bankruptcy, he was suspended until the character of the Petition was decided. Well, had George Bolton been suspended?

Mr. COURTNEY: No.

Mr. T. P. O'CONNOR said, that that being so, he accepted the very just and honourable distinction the hon. Gentleman had drawn of different forms of bankruptcy. A man might be innocent, and a man might be guilty; everyone knew that. He would take the definition of the hon. Gentleman. The hon. Gentleman had said that a bankruptcy which arose from riotous living would be a kind of bankruptcy which would compel the Head of a Department to get rid of his subordinate. Riotous living! That was exactly the charge which had been established up to the hilt against George Bolton; a charge which had been established over and over again—which had been established judicially by the Judgment of Mr. Justice Fry as far back as 1876. Mr. Justice Fry delivered such a philippic against the character of Mr. Bolton, which, if any Irish Member had uttered in that House, would have caused the Chairman to call him to Order. Riotous living was the real cause of the bankruptcy of George Bolton; and yet this man, with all these charges on his head, was defended by an English Gentleman like the Secretary to the Treasury in that House, because it was supposed to be a canon in Ireland that every English official, however dirty he might be, was a tool clean enough to perform the function of administering in Ireland. That appeared to him (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) to be a discreditable and disgraceful state of things. The Irish Members were quite willing to discuss the present relations between England and Ireland in their purely political aspect; but he declared this, that if they were as strong friends of the existing relations between England and Ireland as the bitterest Tory in this country, nothing could be produced more calculated to engender amongst them disgust of the Administration than the unfortunate attitude taken by the Government with regard to the action of officials in Ireland. He would go back to the illustration with which he commenced. If there were an overflow of the existing political relations between England and Ireland similar to the overflow which occurred in France some 14 years ago, where would be the troop of officials who were now screened, defended, and protected by English Gentlemen sitting on the Treasury Bench? From Cornwall to French, down to Bolton and one or two others he could name, they could produce in Ireland a gallery of celebrities in infamy who would form a most worthy addition to Madame Tussaud's "Chamber of Horrors."

Mr. LABOUCHERE said, that considering the strong feeling that existed in Ireland on this subject, it seemed to him most desirable that all officials in this country should be entirely above suspicion. Now, what was the case with respect to Mr. Bolton? In 1876 or 1877 a Judge had himself reported, in respect to a trial to which Mr. Bolton was a party, that that gentleman had thoroughly misconducted himself. That report was made to the Lord Chancellor; and, that being so, one would suppose that Mr. Bolton would have been at once dismissed from the Public Service. He was not dismissed, however; he was retained; and what was the consequence? Why, the consequence was that Mr. Bolton, who at that time was stated by the Judge to have got into difficulties, and very serious difficulties, owing to riotous living, had now presumably spent more than he possessed, and had presented a Petition in Bankruptcy. It was said on the one side that he had presented it himself, and on the other that it had been presented by his creditors; but that was not the question. The question was, whether he was in a state of bankruptcy or not? Mr. Bolton had to admit himself that he was. If, therefore, the Committee were to vote this salary, they would be presenting a Bill of Indemnity to Mr. Bolton. Looking at the fact that he was Crown Solicitor, he ought, at least, to be suspended from his important duties until the question of bankruptcy was decided in a Court of Law. The Secretary to the Treasury told them that Mr. Bolton could not be suspended until a decision was come to, and the man was declared a bankrupt in the Court. But they all knew how proceedings were delayed in the Bankruptcy Court. The proceedings in this case might be delayed for five years.

Mr. COURTNEY: No, no.

Mr. LABOUCHERE: They may be delayed two years.

Mr. COURTNEY: The estate may be in course of winding up for many years; the settlement of the assets may occupy a considerable period; but the question of bankruptcy may be tried in a few weeks and settled in a few months.

Mr. LABOUCHERE: Then, are we to understand that during these few weeks this gentleman, who occupies the position of Crown Solicitor in Ireland, and who, by his own admission, is a bankrupt, will not be superseded? I believe he ought to be.

Mr. JESSE COLLINGS said, that hon. Gentlemen on that (the Ministerial) side of the House were put in a considerable amount of difficulty at that moment. If these charges were true—they had no means of judging as to whether they were or not; but they were so notorious, that surely the Government should know whether they were true or not—and if they were true, what were they asked to do? They were asked to vote £400 to this gentleman; and if, as he said, the charges were true and the Vote were passed, it would be one of a most immoral character; and certainly Radical Members, friends of the Government though they were, ought not to permit themselves to be dragged through the mire as to vote a sum of money to a man who had been guilty of such conduct. A man who had been guilty to only half the extent described by hon. Members taking part in that debate ought not only to be superseded now, but he ought to have been superseded long ago. He ought to have been superseded in 1876. He did hope that the Government would take them into their confidence. The only way out of the difficulty was for the Government to promise now that Mr. Bolton should be suspended—he did not think, on grounds of common morality, any other course was open to them. Suppose a report of such a transaction as that came from America or some other country, they would take it as an example of the character of the Government of such country; and he, therefore, as a matter of common respectability, as a question of vindicating the purity of the administration of the Government, asked that someone in a responsible position should now give a promise that this gentleman should be superseded until the result of the bankruptcy proceedings was known. He trusted that the Government, for the sake of their supporters on that (the Ministerial) side of the House, to say nothing of the Irish Members, would agree to that course. If they did not, they who were in the habit of hearing these charges brought against officials by Irish Members, and were in the habit of hearing them denied by the Treasury Bench, and who had no means, speaking generally, of knowing which side was right, would have to give credence to the case submitted by the Irish Representatives. As a rule, when cases of this kind came up, there was a difficulty of judging which side was right, and English Members were apt to believe in the Government case; but unless the Government acted in the interests of decency and morality in this case, for the future English Members would be apt to believe there was an equal amount of truth in all the charges brought against Irish officials. He earnestly hoped that the Secretary to the Treasury would treat this as a serious matter, and would give the desired pledge.

Mr. COURTNEY said, the hon. Member for Ipswich (Mr. Jesse Collings) was not in the House when he (Mr. Courtney) had made his statement a short time ago. He must apologize to hon. Members who were present at the time for any repetition he might make; but he would very succinctly state what his view of the matter was. The Vote was for the Valuation and Boundary Survey, and included an item for the Solicitor to this Department. It did not at all follow, by sanctioning this Vote, that this money, or any part of it, would go to Mr. Bolton. The question to the Government really was the payment of the salary to the Office, and the money might go to Mr. Bolton's successor. He admitted that that in itself would not be a sufficient plea for asking for a suspension of action on this Vote; but he had put two other circumstances before the Committee. The affairs of Mr. Bolton were now really before two Courts of Law—one the Bankruptcy Court, and the other the Court of Nisi Prius, before which an action would be tried to-morrow. Moreover, Mr. Bolton's name would come before the Committee again in relation to the Vote for Law Charges. It would come before the Committee either at the end of this week or the beginning of next; and what he put to hon. Members opposite, and what he put, with great confidence, to the Committee now, was that they should let this Vote pass, as it did not imply any payment to Mr. Bolton, but merely a payment to the office-holder, whoever he might be. The holder of the office, to whom the money would have to be paid, might not necessarily be Mr. Bolton. Mr. Bolton might be superseded or dismissed, and, in that case, the money would be paid to his successor. The mere voting of this money was no sanction on the part of the Committee of the retention of Mr. Bolton in the Public Service. They would have an opportunity of considering this question, as he pointed out, at the end of this week or the beginning of next, when the Vote for Law Charges was brought forward, and when Mr. Bolton's salary as Crown Solicitor of Tipperary was proposed. By the time that Vote was reached there would, at least, have been a decision given in the case now pending in the Nisi Prius Court.

Mr. HEALY said, he must point out to the Committee that the statement of the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down was altogether beside the question. What would be tried in the Nisi Prius Court to-morrow? Why, the issue was this—William O'Brien had made a series of charges against George Bolton. He had said to him—"You are a thief; you are a forger; you are a swindler; you are an adulterer." Mr. Bolton says—"You have coupled me with the name of French and Cornwall, and that is tantamount to an accusation of being guilty of unnatural offences;" therefore, the question to be tried to-morrow was not whether Mr. Bolton was a thief, a swindler, and so on, but whether his name being coupled with those of French and Cornwall meant, in addition to his other crimes, that he was guilty of unnatural offences. That was the only issue that would be submitted to a jury to-morrow. He (Mr. Healy) was surprised to see the Secretary to the Treasury attempting to prejudice the minds of English Gentlemen, who could not be so well acquainted with the matter as were the Irish Members, by a miserable shift of this kind. They were told it was not certain that Mr. Bolton's Petition had been presented by him.

Mr. COURTNEY: The question does not turn on that.

Mr. HEALY said, what did the Chief Secretary answer when he had put the matter to him? Why, that the Government had driven Bolton into bankruptcy. So that it was the Government who had compelled him to arrange a settlement with his creditors; and there being no other way of arrangement, he had taken refuge in bankruptcy. He (Mr. Healy) would warn the Government of this. The Chief Secretary had brought upon himself grave censure for the manner in which he had winked at the delay in bringing the case of French to an issue; the evidence had turned out to be of a terrible character; if the right hon. Gentleman had known what that evidence was, he would not have made the bold statement he did in reply to the Motion of the hon. Member for Queen's County (Mr. Arthur O'Connor). What was the case of the Secretary to the Treasury now? Why, his position was this—that George Bolton might succeed, before a jury of Orangemen, in securing a verdict for £30,000 against William O'Brien. That would be accepted by his creditors, and then there would be no bankruptcy at all. They had had the experience of the Cornwall and French case. The Government would not suspend or dismiss these officials, and they would not allow a discussion, because there was a libel action pending, and because they said it would prejudice the case; but, in spite of that, a jury of Dublin, on which there were five Orangemen, had found it impossible to go beyond the facts, and had been obliged to give a verdict for his hon. Friend the Member for Mallow (Mr. O'Brien). The Secretary to the Treasury now placed himself in exactly the same position as the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary with regard to Cornwall and French. He said—"I have the assurance of Judge Walsh that the defendant has a good case—wait till he has had his 'pound of flesh'—wait until the Orange jury has given him £30,000, and there will then be no necessity for Bolton to go into the Bankruptcy Court." The hon. Gentleman was making himself to that extent an accomplice of George Bolton, because, by insisting upon this Vote in the House of Commons, in the face of a Belfast jury, who would be only too willing to take a wink from hon. Gentlemen on the Treasury Bench, he would be practically giving a vote of whitewash to George Bolton. They were supposed in that House of Commons to be all honourable men. Some people said they were not—he was not referring to hon. Gentlemen opposite; but it was said that hon. Members on those (the Irish) Benches were not honourable men. But the Belfast jury would say—"Are we to suppose that the House of Commons, composed of the first Gentlemen in England, knowing the character of Mr. Bolton—are we to suppose that, though it is said this man is stamped with the brand of infamy, the House of Commons, having able debaters amongst them, and having discussed this question, would have passed this Vote unless they knew this man was maligned by these Nationalists?" What stand had the Government to take? The Prime Minister had rebuked him (Mr. Healy) last year for what he had said on a Vote somewhat similar to this. He had said, with regard to Crown prosecutions in Ireland, that it was a great misfortune that the Government could get no one to give evidence for them, except persons of a discreditable character. The Prime Minister had declared that he was very wrong in pointing that out, as he ought to have known that no one would think of deciding cases on the evidence of people of disreputable character. But what were they to think when the very founts of justice were poisoned by such scoundrels as Bolton? The Government wanted Irish Members to admire their administration, and to proclaim themselves at one with them, and yet, from their Detective Director and Post Office Secretary, down to George Bolton the Crown Solicitor, they chose the most infamous scoundrels and rascals they could lay their hands on for the transaction of official business in Ireland. They had divided on this Vote last year. The Irish Members had got no satisfaction from hon. Gentlemen opposite; but he was glad to think that, after all, the words of the Irish Members had not been wasted. It was consoling to them to know that even now, at the eleventh hour, the consciences of hon. Gentlemen opposite were stricken. The Irish Members had spent many an hour in vain in urging these cases on the attention of the House. They had not, in the past, obtained a single vote in support of their proposals; but even water wore away stones, and at last the Irish Members had succeeded in making some impression on the hearts and consciences of hon. Gentlemen opposite. When the Government's own followers began to repudiate and become ashamed of the officials of the Government, it was time for the Administration to take warning. The Secretary to the Treasury told them that the name of this man Bolton would come up again. Yes, it would come up again and again, because there was scarcely a penny of money voted in the Irish Departments but George Bolton had a finger in the pie; he was a pluralist of the most alarming description. There was an item for him in the Vote under discussion; he was Crown Prosecutor for the county of Tipperary; he was Under Crown Prosecutor for the county of Dublin—wherever there was a dirty job to be done in Ireland, George Bolton was there to do it. Probably, that was on the principle that, wherever dirty work was to be done they should have a dirty man to do it. But, however that was, such was the fact. Was it possible that the Government of Ireland, the British Government, the Government of the Queen had sunk so low that they could not get a decent man connected with any other Irish Department? Was that their position? Was Irish official nature absolutely fallen so low that out of the multitude of West Britons in the country they could not get one single man with a decent, honest, and sweet reputation? Was that the position of the Government, and, if it were, why were hon. Members obliged to make these references? Ought they not rather to be delighted to have the opportunity of clearing out their nest of vipers which was looked upon with the deepest hatred in the country—that nest of vipers which had stung the people to madness, and who, to a large extent, were responsible for the way in which the Government was regarded in Ireland? What was the last act they had heard of in connection with these men? Why, an unfortunate creature who had been driven to accept the position of informer had absolutely hanged himself, through remorse, in his cell. That unhappy occurrence had taken place immediately after Bolton's visit to him; like Judas, immediately the man had betrayed his friend, he hanged himself. This man Bolton went round prosecuting his dark designs, setting father against son, and husband against wife; arresting whole families, playing upon the remorse of human nature and the ties of family affection. He went like a serpent from one person to another, getting up cases, caring nothing so long as he pocketed the blood-money. By retaining such a man in the Service, they were putting a premium on crime, they were rewarding the man whose interest it was to keep up the harvest of crime in Ireland. So long as it was profitable to a man like Bolton to have criminal trials so long would these criminal trials continue. George Bolton made money out of them. It was as much a portion of his trade to obtain this blood-money as it was of any honest handycraftsman to obtain a day's work. Crime! Bolton gloated over it, delighted in it. When the country was happy, George Bolton was miserable; when the country was criminal, George Bolton was delighted. That was the man the Government employed; that was the person who swindled his creditors out of £90,000, who was condemned by an English Judge as a ruffian and as a person who ought not to be continued in any Public Department—that was the man whom an English Judge had recommended to be struck off the rolls. And yet for that man the Government asked them not only to vote this £400, but to come down some days later and vote him some further hundreds. He was not surprised that the Chief Secretary had fled from the Treasury Bench; it was convenient for him to leave this case to Gentlemen who knew less about George Bolton than he did. The right hon. Gentleman had already burned his fingers in defending Cornwall and French. He (Mr. Healy) ventured to say that the next time an Irish official was attacked in that House the right hon. Gentleman would not be so keen to come forward in his defence. Not a single representation that the Irish Members had made had ever received the slightest attention from the Government. They had pointed out again and again the state of corruption in which Dublin Castle was steeped; but it was some satisfaction to them to know that English Radicals at last had had their consciences touched, and whatever the Government thought about it, they and their constituencies would support the Irish Members in this matter.

Mr. NEWDEGATE said, no man in that House disliked despotic government more inveterately than the humble Member who now addressed them, yet the hon. Members from Ireland who sat near him must forgive him if he asked them for a moment to consider whether they had not contributed to the state of things in Ireland which had compelled Parliament to supersede the operation of the Common Law by investing the authorities in Ireland with despotic power, one instrument of which was this Mr. Bolton, the Public Prosecutor, whose character and conduct those hon. Members had vied with each other in painting in the blackest colours? It was, indeed, a pretty pass, according to their version, to which they had brought matters in Ireland. Bad as the state of things might have been and might be, he (Mr. Newdegate), who had often been accused of supporting too severe laws for Ireland, preferred the government by law to the abuses of despotic power, which he, in common with the hon. Members near him, deprecated. The case of Mr. Bolton, however, involving matters touching his character, was before two Courts of Law. Both cases were now pending; and if there was one thing more than another, in defence of government by law, that he (Mr. Newdegate) held to be essential, it was abstinence from interference or interception on the part of that House in cases pending before the Courts of Law. It was upon that broad principle that he (Mr. Newdegate), without expressing any opinion upon the character or the conduct of Mr. Bolton, would vote against the Amendment before the Committee.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. WALKER) said, he did not expect that any discussion on this matter would have come before the Committee on the particular Vote before them. The Committee had been informed, and was thoroughly well aware, that this £400 which appeared now in the Estimates was in no way connected with Mr. Bolton's position as Crown Solicitor, but was merely the salary of the Solicitor to the Valuation and Boundary Survey of Ireland. Hon.

Members must not take him as complaining of this discussion, but merely as pointing out that if the discussion had taken place at all, it would be much more convenient that it should occur on a Vote which was to be proposed—namely, the Irish Law Charges. In this matter they were dealing with a public servant who had been 33 years in the Public Service. Mr. Bolton had entered the Public Service in 1852, and since that time he had discharged his duties satisfactorily; and he (the Solicitor General for Ireland) was not aware that there was anything against him in his capacity as public servant.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR: Is there nothing against him as a solicitor?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER) said, he only wanted to say a few words on the two subjects referred to. They had two matters to consider—one was the Vote which was asked for, and the other was what was the effect of that Vote. The passing of this Vote did not put £400 into the pocket of Mr. Bolton; but the refusal of it would do this—it would condemn him before an opportunity had been given for the case now pending before the Court at Belfast to be tried. If the Vote were refused by that House, it would amount to—

MR. HEALY: Why do not you postpone it?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER) said, the refusal of the Vote would amount to a condemnation by the House of Commons of the conduct of Mr. Bolton before two actions now pending before legal tribunals relating to that conduct were tried. What were the charges made against Mr. Bolton? Why, one of them, as had been stated by an hon. Member opposite, was so old that it dated back to 1876. Its nature, which had been glanced at by some hon. Members, was this. It was alleged that Mr. Bolton, being a solicitor, had prepared his wife's marriage settlement, which was a thing no solicitor should do. If Mr. Bolton did that, and if the settlement so prepared departed from the rules which ought to have characterized it, it would follow that the settlement would be altered and placed in the proper form. That question had come before an English Court; and the English Court, as it was bound to do, had, he should say, set aside that settlement. Well, what followed? The charge brought against Mr. Bolton was investigated by the late Government in a most careful and anxious manner, and the opinion of the then Lord Chancellor, and the Law Officers of the Crown, was that, as Mr. Bolton's case had not been heard, and as it involved equitable considerations, they could not come to the conclusion that there were grounds on which they could dismiss him, and year after year since that period his salary had been put in the Estimates, and the Vote had been passed. Was it reasonable, or was it fair, now to ask the Committee, in regard to a transaction which had taken place so many years ago, that a Government succeeding the Government which had inquired into the subject should reverse the decision of its Predecessor? That would be an altogether unprecedented act, and an act of great unfairness. Further, what position were they now in with regard to Mr. Bolton's alleged Bankruptcy Petition? Let him remind the Committee of the position that Petition was in. This was not a bankruptcy in the ordinary sense of the term. It was a Petition—whether by himself or not he (the Solicitor General for Ireland) did not care.

MR. ARTHUR ARNOLD: As a matter of fact, was the Petition presented by himself?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER) said, that if he could answer that question he would; but, as a matter of fact, he did not know. Assuming, however, that he did present it himself, he (the Solicitor General for Ireland) did not think it would make much difference. The case stood in this way. Mr. Bolton, at a period when he, like other men, did not anticipate a fall in the price of land in Ireland, made large purchases of land, and gave a mortgage on the property which he had so bought. These mortgages amounted to £50,000, or thereabouts. They were debts, no doubt, in the legal sense of the term—every mortgage was a debt; but if it were argued that they were debts in the moral sense of the term—namely, debts which ought to be held as justifying the Court in condemning him for being a bankrupt—that would raise a very large question. Mr. Bolton was in debt to the extent of £80,000 or £90,000, as he himself estimated, of which some £50,000 were secured. Under these circumstances, he brought a Petition for arrangement, stated the debts, and showed the condition of his property. No doubt, there were unsecured debts.

MR. HEALY: What are they?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER) said, he had the surplus of his landed property, and also his salary, every farthing of which could be taken, and not 1d. paid to himself; and it was said that, under these circumstances, when the matter stood in that way that he was guilty of such gross misconduct in making that arrangement that the House ought to condemn him before his Petition was heard. He was speaking in the hearing of many Members who knew what bankruptcy proceedings were. If it should turn out in the course of the proceedings that Mr. Bolton had been guilty of fraud or misconduct, the Petition might be at once turned into a bankruptcy. The fullest power was vested in the Court, and the bankruptcy could be declared in the course of a week—there was no reason why there should be a moment's delay. Well, the Bankruptcy Court, having cognizance of the whole facts, would decide the question of the bankruptcy, and say whether or not Mr. Bolton had been guilty of fraud; but if the House passed a vote refusing Mr. Bolton's salary, would not that be virtually telling the Judge that he was bound by the declaration of the House of Commons to say that Mr. Bolton was a bankrupt? ["No; no!"] Yes; he maintained that it would. The mere suspension of this Vote would go a great way towards prejudicing the mind of a Judge against the Petitioner. This Vote did not give any money to Mr. Bolton; but the effect of refusing it would be to pass on Mr. Bolton a condemnation before the proper period had arrived. They were told, and they believed it was the fact, that to-morrow an investigation was to take place before another Legal Court as to Mr. Bolton's conduct.

MR. HEALY: On another issue altogether.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER) said, that charges had been made against Mr. Bolton, not only of complicity in terrible offences, but also coupled with that—or, as Mr. Bolton's accuser put it—"We do not charge him with that, we charge him with being a forger, a swindler, a defrauder of his own flesh and blood."

MR. HEALY: He did not deny that.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER) asked whether anyone would tell him that, if this case were investigated before a jury, this very charge against Mr. Bolton would not be gone into? The man's whole life and his whole character, every act of his career since he entered the Public Service, would become public property, and would be for a jury to decide upon. If the Committee took the action proposed by hon. Members opposite, it would prejudice the action of a Court of Law—it would have taken over a function that only a jury should exercise. He (the Solicitor General for Ireland) did not desire now—he thought it would be unreasonable—that they should go into these matters while a trial was pending affecting a man's most solemn interests; that was to say, affecting a man's life and character. What he (the Solicitor General for Ireland) asked the Committee to do was to pass this Vote without expressing any opinion as to Mr. Bolton's conduct.

MR. H. H. FOWLER said, he quite agreed with the hon. and learned Gentleman who had just sat down that it would be most unfair and most unjust for the Committee to condemn Mr. Bolton on either one or the other of the issues; but what he (Mr. H. H. Fowler) objected to was that they should acquit him on either of the issues. "There were two questions sub judice—first, whether Mr. Bolton's bankruptcy, or his financial embarrassments, were such as to disentitle him to remain in the Service of the Government; and, secondly, the more serious question as to his moral character, which was coming on for trial to-morrow. Now, he (Mr. H. H. Fowler) objected to be called upon to say whether Mr. Bolton was guilty or innocent. They had no facts before them. He did not know whether the man was a saint or a sinner; but what he did say was, that if the House of Commons, after this discussion, voted £400 towards Mr. Bolton's salary, the House would be expressing an opinion that Mr. Bolton was innocent of these charges, and that he ought to be retained in the Public Service. If they did such a thing as that they would be putting themselves in an entirely false position. He certainly regretted the attitude the Secretary to the Treasury had taken up, both last night and to-night, on these two unfortunate Votes, with a view of compelling them to come to a decision while these matters were pending. The course adopted by the Secretary to the Treasury had not facilitated the despatch of Public Business. The Vote which they had discussed last night was again to be discussed on Report, and to-day they had spent four hours in the discussion without having made any progress. He objected very strongly to the Constitutional theory which the hon. Member the Secretary to the Treasury had laid down—namely, that the House of Commons must not object to vote the salary of an official because it was possible that the Executive Government of the day might dismiss him after his salary had been voted. That would simply mean ousting the jurisdiction of the House of Commons altogether. The House of Commons had a right to declare itself a Court of Appeal, and they had a perfect right to say—"This is not a man who should belong to the Public Service." It was simply hair-splitting to say that the money voted was not for the man actually in office at the time. He now repeated, in presence of the Prime Minister, what he had already stated as to the growing distrust of the administration of affairs in Dublin Castle. He was satisfied that complaints so constantly made must ere long form the subject of a most searching and vigorous inquiry. In conclusion, he wished merely to say that he expressed no opinion as to this man's acts, but he would not vote that he was innocent.

MR. BROADHURST said, he appealed to the Government, as one who had voted steadily with them throughout on Irish affairs, to make some satisfactory statement to the Committee that would enable that (the Radical) portion of the House at least to give a vote in their support, if possible. He had heard the statements on the opposite side, and had heard the speeches from the Treasury Bench—both the speeches of the Secretary to the Treasury and of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland—and he was prepared to say that, in his mind, there was not one sentence in either of those statements that at all relieved them from the very grave responsibility in voting any money for the salary of a person about whom it was possible for such statements to be made, when he was holding such an important position as that of Crown Prosecutor in Ireland. Surely a legal officer, occupying such an important post as that occupied by Mr. Bolton in Ireland, should be altogether above suspicion; and he (Mr. Broadhurst), for one, should certainly vote with the Irish Members on that occasion if they went to a Division, unless some promise were made by the Government to suspend the Vote until inquiries could be made.

MR. WILLIAMSON said, the speeches he had heard from the Treasury Bench had now convinced him that he ought not to vote for the proposed reduction. He did not agree with the hon. Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. H. H. Fowler) in thinking that if he did vote for the salary of Mr. Bolton, it would be tantamount to voting a sentence of acquittal; but, at the same time, in view of what had been said, and in view of all that was notorious in this case, though he certainly could not vote for the payment of the money, he did not see why the Vote should not be postponed. No good argument, or reason, or statement had been advanced to show why the Vote should not be postponed. He urged that course as the reasonable solution of the present difficulty; but, for one, if compelled to vote, he should be obliged to vote against the payment of this salary.

SIR HENRY HOLLAND desired to state why he should support the reduction of the Vote. He should do so as a protest against the refusal of the Government to postpone the Vote as requested, and he thought on good grounds, by the Irish Members below the Gangway. He did not offer any opinion as to the character or proceedings of Mr. Bolton. He considered that it would be most improper to do so while these questions were before the Courts of Law. But he did not consider that the proposed postponement of this Vote could be taken in any way to prejudice Mr. Bolton in those proceedings. The Committee had been informed by the hon. and learned Solicitor General for Ireland that these cases would be heard in a few days; indeed, he gathered that one case might possibly be heard to-morrow, and he could not understand why the Government in these circumstances should not postpone this Vote for a short time.

MR. GLADSTONE: It is with great reluctance that I approach a question of this kind, in which I do not feel myself well qualified to give a judgment, and in regard to which I have some difficulty in ascertaining, from the speeches of hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway on the opposite side of the House, what is the precise ground on which they desire this Vote to be refused or to be postponed—I am not quite sure what their desire is.

MR. HEALY: That it should be postponed.

MR. GLADSTONE: Technically, they desire to postpone it. I have heard the speeches, which undoubtedly partook, as it appeared to me, of a warmth that ought not to be imported into a matter of this kind, which is most strictly judicial in its character. I assure Gentlemen on that side of the House that, however I may differ from them on many important matters, any allegation of fact made by them is entitled at my hands, and at the hands of the Government, to precisely the same attention as if it proceeded from persons in entire accord with us; but in this case I have much difficulty in determining what is the exact ground on which hon. Gentlemen opposite demand the postponement of this Vote. For example, there was great excitement in that part of the House when the Solicitor General for Ireland referred to the transactions which occurred in 1876, and when presumptions were raised of a character most adverse to Mr. Bolton; and, undoubtedly, the plain meaning of the various manifestations from that quarter of the House is that those transactions of the year 1876 of themselves constituted a reason why this Vote should be withheld.

MR. HEALY: There was another Judgment in 1882 to which the Solicitor General for Ireland did not allude at all.

MR. GLADSTONE: I am dealing with the Judgment of 1876. My knowledge of this case is confined to what I have heard on the present occasion; I am dealing with the indications of opinion from many Gentlemen in that portion of the House. I say it is quite impossible for this House, consistently with its own character, to go against Mr. Bolton in respect of the transactions of 1876. It is not merely because those transactions were examined by the Executive Government—whether the late Government or this Government, makes no matter—I pay the same respect to their examinations as to our own. The House, I admit, as the hon. Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. H. H. Fowler), I think, very justly said, is not in the slightest degree bound to respect the acquittal which this Government or that Government may have pronounced; but in this instance the time for considering that question has passed by. It is plain that if the House had chosen, after the investigation by the late Government, to withhold the salary of Mr. Bolton, it was entitled to do so. It did not do so, therefore that matter cannot be stirred. The House has committed itself on that subject by repeated acts of voting this salary; and even allowing, though I am not qualified to give an opinion, that it might have been a righteous thing to reverse the decision of the late Government, yet it would be most unrighteous to stir any question on that matter now. Therefore, I must say to hon. Gentlemen that I would give greater weight to what they say on this case, if it did not appear to me they were carried away by a kind of feeling with which most Members must have some sympathy, so that the balance of the judicial faculty was in their minds considerably disturbed. Well, now, Sir, I have heard, I am bound to say, three speeches with regard to which those observations of mine could have no application whatever—the speeches of the hon. Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. H. H. Fowler), the hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent (Mr. Broadhurst), and the hon. Baronet opposite (Sir Henry Holland).

MR. SEXTON: And the hon. Member behind the Treasury Bench (Mr. Williamson).

MR. GLADSTONE: Quite so. But he did not adduce any arguments upon the subject. He stated an opinion, as he was qualified to do, and I meant no reproach by not mentioning him. I take the speech of the hon. Baronet opposite (Sir Henry Holland). I am quite satisfied he approaches this question in a perfectly judicial spirit, so that his judgment carries weight. I wish to test it, however, and ascertain whether he is right. What he says is, if I understand him, that there is a possibility that the result of the legal proceedings now pending in Ireland may be unfavourable to Mr. Bolton.

SIR HENRY HOLLAND: Not quite so. I expressed no such opinion. I understood the hon. and learned Solicitor General to say that those proceedings might be taking place now, and I stated that I would say nothing favourable or unfavourable to Mr. Bolton, but would postpone the Vote, as those proceedings were now about to take place.

MR. GLADSTONE: I am glad to receive the explanation, because I must vary what I was going to say. There are two questions before us, and I presume this discussion has reference principally to the action which is to come on to-morrow. The hon. Baronet (Sir Henry Holland) is aware that there are two cases before us, one of them the case in which Mr. Bolton has brought an action in vindication of his own character, the other the case in which a Petition has been presented to the Court of Bankruptcy, and apparently, for the sake of argument, the Petition is stated to be Mr. Bolton's own. I must consider the two cases apart, and I must first take the case of the charge which is to be tried to-morrow; and I think the hon. Baronet had that case principally in his mind. Now, I want to know whether the hon. Baronet is correct—that he is just in his intentions I have no doubt—but is he right, going strictly according to justice, in contending that, because an action is coming on to-day or to-morrow, in which a public servant is prosecuting another individual who has made awful charges against him, that, therefore, the salary of that official should be withheld? I do not mean withheld finally, but for one day. I am disposed to admit that if there were proceedings by the Government against Mr. Bolton—if there were a prima facie case depending upon the credit of some public authority, and that was the matter that was going to issue—I could then well understand the contention in this House that it was right to suspend any act whatever bearing upon that individual person. But, Sir, that is not so. Upon the facts of this case I have no right to listen to the rhetoric of the hon.

Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy). Every word he speaks may be true, or every word may be untrue; but I have no right to take it into view. So far as I know, this gentleman is protecting his own character. If he is protecting his own character—

MR. HEALY: On only one point.

MR. GLADSTONE: I am quite aware of that. I am now addressing myself very much to the hon. Baronet (Sir Henry Holland), and what was evidently weighing on his mind. If Mr. Bolton is protecting his own character by an action at law, is the general proposition to be adopted that public servants, whose salaries have to be voted in the regular course of business, and who are so endeavouring to protect themselves by an action at law in which they themselves are the movers—not in which they are to be charged by some responsible authority, but in which they are the movers—will the hon. Baronet (Sir Henry Holland) say deliberately and advisedly that the fact of their so moving to protect themselves is a reason why the voting of their salary should be postponed? I can only say I cannot adopt that view; I think it is quite necessary that the Committee should consider this bearing of the case for that reason. My hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. H. H. Fowler) took occasion to repeat what he stated last night with respect to what he believed to be the tainted character and general unsatisfactory condition of the Irish Civil Service. [Oriens of "Dublin Castle!"] Dublin Castle I am always accustomed to hear cited as the synonym for the centre of the Irish Civil Service. That is a most important subject, and one which ought to be probed to the bottom. I put it to the candour of my hon. Friend (Mr. H. H. Fowler) to say when a case, difficult and delicate, and requiring the utmost accuracy of view on our part is raised, whether it is wise or altogether just to associate that case with charges against the Irish Civil Service in general? It is our duty to put that matter entirely aside. Let the Irish Service be the best in the world, or let it be the worst, we would be guilty of injustice, and would be incurring just discredit and disparagement, if we allowed ourselves to be biassed one hair's breadth in the course we take in this matter by any consideration of the general character of that Irish Service. I have endeavoured distinctly to lay down in answer to the hon. Baronet (Sir Henry Holland), differing from him with great respect, the ground on which I proceed. My contention is this—that if a Civil servant is bringing an action in protection of his own character, and if that action is going to be tried on the day or on the morrow of the day when the House is asked to vote the salary of that Civil servant, that is no reason why the Vote should be postponed, because the postponement of the Vote involves this—that the House believes there is some presumption against the Civil servant. Is it a sin in a man to protect his own character by an action at law? Is it a thing for which he should be made the subject of foul and loathsome reproach, and is a man to be put under the slightest prejudice or suspicion because he so defends himself? If upon that ground you put aside the Vote, you imply a certain amount of presumption against that individual. Then comes the other question—that of bankruptcy. I did not understand that to weigh so much upon the mind of the hon. Baronet (Sir Henry Holland). It is not a matter, I think, upon which anyone who is a civilian or layman can speak with great confidence. These transactions in bankruptcy are transactions with which I have no personal acquaintance; but my hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor General is acquainted with these matters, and upon his professional character and reputation I understand him to say distinctly, and as a responsible Officer of the Crown to assure the House, that there is nothing in the facts as they are before us which warrant a presumption adverse to Mr. Bolton of such a character as, if proved, would require or justify his dismissal from office. If that be so, then, again, I submit that although this may not be a very agreeable duty to perform, and although I know I am compelled to go against gentlemen in whose sense of justice and integrity I have confidence, yet, if that be the fact, it is our duty, through good report and through evil report, to stick to the strict lines of justice. The time will soon come when this matter can be discussed. I am sure I will never be the man to find fault with hon. Members who call upon the Government to execute strict justice upon delinquent Civil servants. But it is our duty to avoid the passing of any opinion whatever with regard to the existence of adverse presumption, unless the facts warrant adverse presumption. As I understand they do not in this case warrant such a presumption, I am exceedingly sorry this debate has taken place, because it is hardly possible to expect that the issue of the debate will not bear, in some way or other, upon the minds of some of the jury in the trial that is about to take place. I hope it will not. I trust it will not. But our duty in the matter is absolutely simple—to look to the demands of justice to a particular individual. And as I believe the Committee can only in that way avoid expressing an opinion on the subject, I hope they will support the Vote.

MR. SEXTON acknowledged with gratitude the assurance given by the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister, in the closing passages of his speech, that he would not blame or consider questionable the conduct of any Member on the Irish Benches who endeavoured to do justice in respect of delinquent officials in Ireland. The various signs of growing keenness and awakening consciousness upon the subject of the Public Service in Ireland, which had been shown by hon. Gentlemen above and below the Gangway, on the Ministerial side of the House, and by the hon. Baronet the Member for Midhurst (Sir Henry Holland), who possessed a knowledge of the obligations of public life inferior to none, entitled him (Mr. Sexton) to attach more importance to the constructive pledge of the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister that justice would be done, than he would have been entitled to attach to similar pledges given in former days. The right hon. Gentleman had spoken of the heat of some of the speeches which had been made on this subject; but he, in the same breath, admitted he was unacquainted with the facts of the case of Mr. Bolton. The Irish Members were acquainted with those facts. The facts of Mr. Bolton's official career were burnt into their minds, and if they had displayed some heat, it was not because their judicial faculties had been warped, but because their feelings had been excited by the long delay of the Government. There was an action to be tried to-morrow. The right hon. Gentleman had said that the character of Mr. Bolton was at stake. The question involved in the action to-morrow was whether Mr. Bolton had committed unnatural offences, and, whatever the result might be, the question whether Mr. Bolton should remain in the Public Service would still be in suspense. So long as United Ireland called him a forger, adulterer, swindler, Mr. Bolton made no reply. For weeks and months these accusations were showered upon him; but he maintained the silence of the coward, whose conscience was stricken by the truth. It was only when unnatural offences were attributed to him that he went into a Court of Law. The character of Mr. Bolton was not to be judged by the issue of the trial to-morrow, but by the issue of the two proceedings—the one in Belfast, and the other before the Bankruptcy Judge. What did the Committee do if they agreed to vote Mr. Bolton's salary? Why, every man who was a party to that agreement would declare his belief that there was no evidence or presumption that George Bolton was a person unfit to be in the Public Service. Because he felt that presumption was inevitable, and because he felt a supreme obligation of conscience in the matter, and because he felt every man who voted a single ld. to this disgraceful swindler would be guilty of a moral offence, he should put the Committee to the trouble of dividing.

Mr. GIBSON desired to offer a few observations to the Committee before this Vote was taken. It was very necessary indeed that the Committee should appreciate and understand exactly what the Vote was on which they were asked to arrive at a decision. When he reached the House, he was under the impression that the question before the Committee was whether the Vote should be postponed or decided now; but he had since learned that that was not the issue; neither was the question that pointed out by his hon. Friend (Sir Henry Holland), whose opinion he so highly valued. It was not a question whether the Vote should be kept over until later, and discussed with fuller knowledge and with greater appreciation—with the knowledge of what took place during the Belfast trial; but whether in advance, after a discussion which few anticipated would take place that day, and on the eve of the trial, a Vote should be taken which would unquestionably prejudice the trial. He put it to every fair-minded man in the House—was it reasonable, was it in accordance with the most elementary principles of justice, on the eve of a trial, that the Committee should be asked to arrive at a vote which, if it should be against Mr. Bolton's salary, would be an argument that must be used with considerable power in the trial to-morrow for the benefit of the hon. Member for Mallow (Mr. O'Brien), and against Mr. Bolton? That was a circumstance which he ventured to think the hon. Member for Mallow, if he were present, would not press upon the attention of the Committee. ["Withdraw the Vote!"] That was not the question before the Committee. If he understood the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) aright, the question before the Committee was that the salary of Mr. Bolton should be disallowed.

Mr. SEXTON said, he had desired to move the postponement of the Vote; but the Rules of the House would not permit him to do so. He, therefore, moved to reduce the Vote; but, subsequently, he appealed to the Government to withdraw the Motion.

Mr. GIBSON said, he would not pursue his observations with reference to that point. He intended to say only one or two short sentences more—as he had spoken earlier in the debate, he was not going to abuse his privilege. As the decision of the late Government had been referred to, he would make one observation upon that point. Some of the matters which had been referred to came under the attention of the Lord Chancellor of the Conservative Government. Dr. Ball was a man of the highest personal character and of the highest legal attainments, and he investigated the matter fully in 1879, and arrived at the conclusion, with the concurrence of the then Law Officers of the Crown, that there was nothing to call for the interference of the Executive. That was now five or six years ago, and the matter had been continuously before the public ever since. Parliamentary and Executive sanction had been given to Mr. Bolton's continuance in the Public Service from that time to the present. The late Lord Chancellor, Mr. Law, had the matter before him; he went into it fully, and saw no reason to dissent from the opinion of his Predecessor. He (Mr. Gibson) need not give Mr. Law any character in the House of Commons. If ever there was a man worthy of being spoken of with the highest respect, it was Mr. Law; everyone knew that he approached his Judicial as well as Executive duties with an earnest and anxious desire to do what was just in the interest of the Public Service. The matter came before others, and the opinion of all the Executive in Ireland was that the decision arrived at in 1879 ought not to be disturbed. That was a circumstance which was entitled to very substantial weight. Surely, the decision ought not to be disturbed on the eve of the trial of the action which Mr. Bolton had brought in vindication of his own character. He (Mr. Gibson) had said all he desired to say with reference to the action for libel which it was understood would come on for hearing in Belfast to-morrow. He offered no opinion one way or the other upon that action; the trial of the action was a matter for the Judge and jury before whom it came; but, in the name of common justice, he asked that the Judge and jury be given an opportunity of deciding the case upon its merits, and not have their minds warped by a vote of the House of Commons.

MR. HEALY pointed out that Mr. George Bolton had been appointed to the office he now held since he was attacked in 1876 by Mr. Justice Fry, an English Judge. ["No!"] Two years ago, Bolton attempted to upset his wife's will, and a second English Judge attacked him, and showed that he had acted in a most audacious manner. If his impression was wrong as to his first assertion, the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland (Mr. Walker) totally failed to deal with the second case in which Bolton was attacked by an English Judge.

MR. COURTNEY said, that, as a matter of fact, Mr. Bolton held his present office for a considerable time before 1876.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER) thought it was necessary to explain the legal proceedings to which the hon. Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy) had just referred. Mr. Bolton's dispute of his wife's will came before the Court of Probate, and the learned Judge who tried the case came to the conclusion that, under all the circumstances, it was not unnatural Mrs. Bolton should make a will unfavourable to her husband.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 58; Noes 116: Majority 58.—(Div. List, No. 178.)

MR. HARRINGTON said, that from time to time Questions had been put to the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Courtney) with regard to the action of the valuers, and one case of injustice had just been brought under his (Mr. Harrington's) notice. The hon. Member for Wicklow (Mr. Corbet), by a Question he asked in the House about 12 months ago, pointed out that the system of bracketing two farms together in the rate book had existed in the county he represented for some time past with the object of depriving the tenants of their votes. One man in Wicklow farmed 51 acres, 2 roods, and 18 perches, and his valuation was £31 10s., and another farmed 30 acres, 3 roods, and 13 perches, and his valuation was £16 10s. Because the official valuator chose to bracket the farms together in his book, the men were disqualified from voting. A Question was asked about the cases of these men, and the Secretary to the Treasury assured the House that he would attend to the matter. Twelve months had now elapsed, but nothing had been done. The season was approaching, but the men were in precisely the same position they were in a year ago. A constituent of the hon. Member for Wicklow wrote to him (Mr. Harrington) as follows:—

"There are two men in this district who have been deprived of their votes for years on account of their valuations being bracketed in the rate book. Last year Mr. Corbet was present in the Rathdrum Revision Court when they were struck off the Register, and I believe he brought the case before the House of Commons. The result of Mr. Corbet's action was that the Revising Valuer was instructed to survey these and other cases of a similar nature. He has reported to the Rathdrum Board of Guardians that he cannot survey all in time this year, although he had over six months to do so, and, strange to say, the very two about whom the question was asked are among the number not dealt with yet. Please let me know as early as possible what steps should be taken to secure these two votes."

Why men holding independent farms, and being valued at a high figure, should be bracketed together in the rate book, and thus deprived of the franchise, he could not understand. He was persuaded the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury must acknowledge the gravity of the matter. There was an impression in Ireland that such men as the two to whom he referred had, for purely political purposes, been illegally and unconstitutionally deprived of the franchise. In order to show the importance of the subject, he would read a resolution which was passed at a recent meeting of the Rathdrum Board of Guardians. It was proposed by Mr. J. Byrne, seconded by Mr. M. Byrne, and carried unanimously—

"That this Board desire to bring to the notice of the Revising Officer that, owing to the lumping of areas held separately by and rated separately on the occupiers, it appears that the Revising Barrister has held that these occupiers cannot claim their vote, because they appear jointly on the books as to area although separately as to their rating. Under these circumstances, the Board of Guardians consider the areas should now be entered separately, and beg that the matter receive the consideration of the Revising Officer at the next revision."

It was with the official valuator that the onus of separating the two names in the rate book rested. The Clerk of the Union had refused to separate the names, and could refuse to separate them. It was not his duty, and he would refuse to do it until the official valuator recommended that that course should be adopted. He (Mr. Harrington) trusted that an effort would immediately be made to do justice to the two men, at least, whose case had now for the second time been brought before the House.

MR. KENNY said, his hon. Friend (Mr. Harrington) had reasonable ground of complaint, because there seemed to be a system of "jerrymandering" in force to deprive men of their votes. That was a very deplorable state of facts, and it was very desirable there should be some explanation from the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Courtney). There were a number of items in the Vote which, although they appeared trivial, required explanation. He saw that the minimum salary of the Commissioner of the Valuation and General Boundary Survey was £1,000, and the maximum salary £1,200. The present Commissioner received £1,300, including a personal allowance of £100. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Courtney) would explain why it was necessary to make this allowance. He (Mr. Kenny) noticed also that there was a personal allowance to nearly all the officials, no matter how small their office might be. There were 13 first class valuers and surveyors getting a personal allowance of £50 a-year each; one valuer received in addition to his salary a temporary allowance of £200 a-year, paid from the Vote for the Irish Land Commission, to which his services had been transferred temporarily; an allowance of £10 a-year was paid to one of the second class valuers during the absence of the above-mentioned valuer. There was an allowance of £50 each to the chief clerk and one of the first class valuers, and an allowance of £25 to one of the first class clerical. It appeared to him that all these additional allowances were given for no reason whatever. There was another point on which he should like to obtain some information from the Secretary to the Treasury—namely, what steps had been taken to carry into effect the recommendations of the Boundary Commission? The Commissioners furnished a Report in 1882; but nothing had been done to carry out their recommendations. The tendency of the recommendations was to increase the area of the boroughs in Ireland. It was very desirable that the area of the small boroughs in Ireland should be increased. At the present time the geographical formation of the Irish boroughs was most peculiar, and it was plain to anyone that the boundaries had been circumscribed for certain purposes. It would be very interesting to the people of the different boroughs to know what steps the Government intended to take to give effect to the wishes of the Commission.

MR. HEALY said, the Irish Representatives had never been satisfied with the condition of the Valuation Department in Ireland, and a Return had been presented to the House which threw a flood of light upon the subject. There was a £12 franchise in the Irish counties, and he found that there were in Ulster 3,448 valuations between £11 10s. and £12, in Munster 1,616, in Leinster 1,507, and in Connaught 987. In point of fact, out of the 4,110 persons who were valued between the disqualifying and the qualifying figure, 3,448 were in Ulster. Above £12 it was needless to go. The Return showed very clearly how the people were cheated out of their votes. If a farm was valued at £11 17s. or £11 18s., the custom in all the Provinces except Ulster was to make it even money—say £11 15s. or £12. But in Ulster what did they find? Why, that whereas in Munster there were only 640 farms valued at £11 11s., in Leinster 582, in Connaught 363, in Ulster there were 1,354. Therefore, for the sake of 5s. in the valuation, which would probably not make a 1d. difference in the rating 1,354 persons in Ulster, no inconsiderable number under the present franchise, were cheated out of their votes. Valued at £11 18s., there were 12 in Ulster, 7 in Munster, 1 in Leinster, and 10 in Connaught. He wanted to know how this state of things arose? Could they find anything administratively clean in the whole country? His hon. Friend the Member for Westmeath (Mr. Harrington) had shown that there was a system of lumping two men together, and thus depriving them of a vote, and in the Province of Ulster, where the Nationalists and Whigs ran neck and neck, the monstrous system he (Mr. Healy) had pointed out existed. This system of chicanery was proved by the Government's own Return, and in order to mark his sense of the way the Department had acted he moved to reduce the Vote by £3,000.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

MR. COURTNEY said, that the hon. Gentleman, in order to prove his charge, would have to show that the unusual proportion of valuations between £11 10s. and £12 in the Province of Ulster, as compared with other Provinces, was not parallel with the valuation between £12 and £12 10s. With respect to the question brought forward by the hon. Member for Wicklow (Mr. Corbet) some time ago, and which was revived this afternoon by the hon. Member for Westmeath (Mr. Harrington), he was at a loss to understand how the Revising Barrister struck these persons off the list; but, as had been revealed by the hon. Member to-day, these had been valued jointly for many years.

MR. HARRINGTON said, the valuations were separate, but the acreage had been jointly entered by the clerk.

MR. COURTNEY said, he believed that, as a matter of fact, these people had not been struck off the Register.

MR. HARRINGTON said, he thought the hon. Gentleman did not understand the manner in which the lists were presented to the Revising Barrister. There was a supplemental list presented every year—

MR. COURTNEY said, the point he was making was that the valuation system had not been changed for years. He would make inquiries about the matter; and as to the other matter with respect to the proportions, he found that the graduation of the valuation was fairly distributed from top to bottom, and there was no one unduly punished. If the hon. Member for Westmeath would write him a letter and explain the matter he would look into it.

MR. HARRINGTON said, he did not wish to detain the Committee long upon this matter; but he thought it was only just that he should read the letter from which he had quoted an extract. The letter was written to one of his constituents, and put the case strongly—

"Dear Sir,—I received yours of the 16th on last night.

	s. r. p.	s. s.
Thomas Neill, Ballard,	51 2 18 val.	31 10
James Butler	30 3 13 val.	16 10

The above T. Neill sold one of two farms he held in Ballard to Mr. Butler in 1882. At the revision in said year Dr. Darley refused him, Neill, his vote, on the ground that he was not one year without the second farm, though the two farms was (sic) a quarter of a mile asunder (sic). In the spring of 1883, when the revising valuator came to Rathdrum, they went to him to have themselves separately (sic) rated, the valuer to all appearance regulated their acres and valuation, and Neill's vote was registered at last revision. However, on examining the books this season, I discovered the bracket to their names as you see on the other side. This season, when the revisory valuer came to Rathdrum, I brought them to him and pointed out their case. He said it was all right. I asked him what brought the bracket there (pointing to it). He said it was done in the office in Dublin, and that it should not be there, at the same time blotting (sic) it with his pen. The town of Ballard is in the electoral division of Ballinaclash, and polling district of Rathdrum. The second case is that of James Clanoy, Sheanamore, in the Ballinacor electoral division, and polling district of Aughrim.

James Clancy . . .	28	1	11	val.	10 10
Jas. Clancy . . .				{ val.	5 10
Terns Clancy . . .	48	0	34	{ val.	5 10
William Corter . .				{ val.	5 10

The two James Clancys (sic) above is (sic) the same man; but by lumping a portion of his land with the other two to the value of £5 10s., it brought his upper value down to £10 10s.; there (sic) by braking (sic) his vote according to Dr. Darley's plan at last revision, he was not objected to last revision and escaped. In 1893, said Jas. Clancy, being sick, sent his son and a young man named Brion to the revising valuator at Rathdrum to have his land and valuation put together (as in reality it was). When the boys told their story to the valuator, he said he supposed that was all right—the clerk (Mr. B. Manning) interfered, and said there was a political motive in that. They (sic), boys, denied there was, and pointed to Mr. Manning a mistake the collector of the poor rates made with him some time before, and stated he, Mr. Manning, had to write to the collector to refund the money. Mr. Manning then said to the officer he should go to see the ground, which he did not. Clancy thought his case was all right till I discovered it this year. The above Jas. Clancy was objected to in 1881, on the ground of the bracket and lumping as above, and when he swore that he never was in partnership with the other two, Dr. Darley registered his vote. Had he been objected to last revision, his vote would surely be broken. You can see Dr. Darley's ruling in 1881 in the above case, and compare it with his ruling in 1893 in the case of Michael Lambert, junr., Cappagh, in the electoral division of Ballinacoe, and polling district of Aughrim. Lambert was not objected to; but Mr. B. Manning read him out as bracketed with two others, and Dr. Darley, without a moment's hesitation, struck his name off the register, though I am told he is not in partnership with them. I have several other cases of bracketing, as you know; but we cannot tell now long they are so. I understand some of them was (sic) bracketed in the time of Griffith going round valuing. However, I see by advertisement in The People that Mr. Manning (sic) has got back the revised valuation, and we will soon (sic) see how the bracketing and lumping is disposed of.

"I remain, dear Sir,

"Faithfully yours,

"JOHN BYRNE."

Mr. HEALY said, he thought it would be a very bad case upon which the hon. Gentleman would not be able to say something for himself; but it was only with the greatest difficulty that he had been able to get this Return from the hon. Gentleman, and he was sure that if he had asked for fuller particulars, they would have been refused him. Indeed, it was refused in the form in which he originally asked for it, and it was only after some correspondence that the Lord Lieutenant, who was extremely ready to give information whenever he could, that the Return was granted. The position he took was this—that between £11 10s. and £12 there ought not to be 8,000 people disfranchised in a small country like Ireland. This would not happen in England, because in England there was not the same valuation. Of these 8,000 people more than half were in Ulster. This was a remarkable state of things, and one which required to be investigated. He did not wish to put the Committee to the trouble of a Division, and if the hon. Gentleman could give some assurance that steps should be taken to prevent this injustice he would not persist in his Motion.

Mr. COURTNEY said, that the complaints made by hon. Members opposite in connection with the valuation of tenements in counties would be no longer possible when the Representation of the People Bill should have passed. He would, however, inquire whether there was any real reason for suspecting a misuse of the present powers of valuers.

Mr. DEASY said, he did not think the hon. Gentleman could have the least doubt as to the way in which these valuations ought to be made. The present improper policy had been carried out for a very long time. In the town of Bandon, the representation of which was for many years in the hands of the family of the Earl of Bandon, there were 300 or 400 voters; but it had been found a few years ago that there were 50 houses valued at between £3 15s. and £4. Now, that number of votes would turn the scales at an election in favour of the Nationalists, and he had no doubt that if an impartial valuer inspected those houses, he would raise the valuation of each to over £4. The result of the present system was that a small minority returned Members of their own political leaning. Representations were made to the valuation officer, in Dublin, last year, to the effect that improvements were made in a large number of houses, and that, therefore, the valuations of those houses should be increased, and the result was that 25 or 30 new voters were put on the list, which proved that this was a matter that ought to be dealt with. Another important question had been touched upon, but no satisfactory answer had been given by the Secretary to the Treasury. It was asked when the Boundary Commissioners would present their Report, and when the Government intended to carry out its recommendations? A few weeks ago it was proposed that the city of Cork should be re-valued; but, on consideration, it was found advisable that that should not be done until the Boundary Commission, who were to inquire into the matter, had presented their Report. The effect of this delay on the part of the Commissioners was the suspension of improvement works, because it was found, in the City of Cork, that large and wealthy districts lying outside the border of the borough boundary, which should bear a large proportion of the taxation of the city, could not be taxed under the present arrangement. An unfair proportion of the cost of such work would, therefore, fall on the occupiers within the present area of taxation, and press heavily on the poor people who would derive least benefit from such expenditure. He hoped the Government would lose no time in carrying out the recommendations of that Commission when they were presented. With regard to the manner in which Clerks to Unions discharged their duties in putting electors on the valuation lists, he knew that in consequence of their action a great number of people who were clearly entitled to the franchise in the county of Cork were prevented from having it. The same thing prevailed in other counties, he believed, to a great extent. He did not say that this was intentional on the part of the Clerks; but it certainly happened, and it was important that the Government should take some steps to remedy it.

MR. HEALY said, it was veryvidious to divide against the salary of a person like Mr. Green, and, after the promise of the hon. Gentleman, he would withdraw his Motion. Mr. Green, by a stroke of the pen, had struck off nearly 20,000 persons, and he did not think it would do any harm to give Mr. Green a good warming up.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

CLASS III.—LAW AND JUSTICE.

(4.) £54,651, to complete the sum for Law Charges.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR called attention to the inadequacy of the annual Index to the Statutes, and to the fact that there was no Index to the Scotch Statutes.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (SIR HENRY JAMES) said, that there was a considerable amount of work going on from time to time in the revision of the Statutes. For instance, a Bill before the House with respect to Summary Jurisdiction involved the repeal, either in part or altogether, of no less than 153 Statutes. Different persons were employed on the revision, and each editor prepared his own headings, which might lead to some amount of difficulty. He would inquire whether any alteration could be made so as to make the Index to the Statutes more simple for those who were not lawyers.

MR. GREGORY remarked, that he had experienced the same difficulties as the hon. and gallant Member with regard to this Index. One improvement, of which he would urge the adoption, was that the Statutes should be numbered not only by the years of the Reign, but also by the year in which they had been passed. If that could not be managed, the Index at least might be so arranged. He believed that the Commissioners were doing their work very well, and that the public was very much indebted to them.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR said, that, as far as he could make out, there had been no great advance in the work recently.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR asked whether it was not the case that the Ushers in the Courts were in the habit of levying fees which they had no right to demand; and also of paying special jurors only a sovereign instead of a guinea, thus gaining 12s. on each trial, unless the jurors insisted on being paid a guinea?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (SIR HENRY JAMES) said, that he would inquire into the matter.

Vote agreed to.

(5.) £2,707, to complete the sum for the Public Prosecutor's Office.

MR. RYLANDS asked whether it was to be understood that there was to be an entire change in the system adopted with regard to public prosecutions? He was of opinion that there should be no charge upon public funds arising out of these charges. It seemed to him that, as this system of public prosecutions had not turned out at all as satisfactory as had been expected, the Government would have to find the Public Prosecutor other employment; but if they could not do that, they were not entitled to come to Parliament so early for power to compensate Sir John Maule, the Public Prosecutor. He hoped to hear from the Secretary to the Treasury that there would be no compensation given; but if that assurance could not be given, the only course would be to oppose the arrangements proposed by the Government.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) pointed out that the question raised by the hon. Member for Burnley did not arise upon that Vote. There was a Bill before the House for the purpose of carrying out what had been suggested by the Committee in regard to the Public Prosecutor. There was a clause in that Bill relating to compensation, and that clause would afford an opportunity of discussing the point mentioned by the hon. Member.

MR. LABOUCHERE observed, that his hon. Friend had raised the point simply with a view to obtaining an explanation; and unless some satisfactory explanation was given as to this gentleman, who received £2,000 a-year for doing very little, the Bill would probably not pass this Session.

SIR HENRY HOLLAND begged the Committee to observe that the observations of the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands) had really little or no bearing upon the question before the Committee. That hon. Member argued against giving any compensation to the present Public Prosecutor, in case the office was abolished; and that argument would be very properly urged when the Bill before the House for altering the office of Public Prosecutor had obtained a second reading, and when the clause providing for compensation came before the Committee on the Bill. But at the present time they did not know that that Bill would become law; and they could not assume that it would do so, as much opposition was threatened to it, and as it was blocked by the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy (Sir George Campbell). They must, therefore, provide for the continuance and working of the office during the present financial year; and to do so, they must vote the proposed Estimate, and whether they should do so was the question before the Committee, and not the question whether, if the office was abolished, Sir John B. Maule should receive any or what compensation. He (Sir Henry Holland) had more than once strongly advocated a change in the existing office of the Public Prosecutor, and the amalgamation of that office with the Solicitor of the Treasury's office. The Committee, of which he was a Member, had recommended that change, and the Bill was introduced to give effect to their recommendations. He had always understood that the hon. Member for Burnley advocated the same view; and, if such were the case, he would beg him to let the Bill have a second reading and go into Committee, when the question of compensation could be fully discussed. By opposing the Bill, he would only help to make it necessary to vote this Estimate, not only for the present financial year, which was absolutely necessary, but for the next and, possibly, other succeeding years.

MR. WARTON was glad to find that the Government at last intended to get rid of this atrocious sham. The Government seldom saw things until too late; but they ought to have seen three years ago that this office was a farce. With regard to the Bill itself, the hon. Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. H. H. Fowler) was wrong in supposing that he had blocked the Bill. He thought this sham ought to be put and end to, and he would press the Government to endeavour to carry that out.

MR. GREGORY desired to know what were the relations between this office and the Board of Trade in regard to bankruptcy proceedings? He had taken some part in the Bankruptcy Bill of last year, and he had always contemplated that one of the great advantages of it would be the public examination of a bankrupt with a view to the disclosure of his affairs; but a great many disclosures had been avoided by bankrupts absconding. So there had been an entire concealment of the state of affairs, and the whole matter was left in a state of suspended animation. He wished to know whether the Public Prosecutor had been put in motion with respect to these cases? So far as he knew, no attempt had been made to trace these people. He admitted that they had gone beyond the jurisdiction of our Bankruptcy Court; but there would have been no difficulty in tracing them and putting in force the law applicable to such cases; and he ventured to think that the proper person to do that was the Public Prosecutor, on the initiation of the Board of Trade. He was most anxious that the working of the Act should be efficient; but that depended on the way in which it was put in operation by the Board of Trade. It was contrary to all acknowledged principles that facilities should be given to these people to get out of the way, and that the Court should have no notion as to what their conduct had been, or how their liabilities stood. He thought some steps ought to be taken to enforce their attendance, and to make them submit to the examination provided for under the Act.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, the observations of the hon. Member showed that this matter ought not to be disposed of in a hole-and-corner manner. This sham office ought to be abolished, and not allowed to remain a burden on the British taxpayer. But it was proposed not only to abolish the office, but to give statutory power to compensate those who had received appointments. Could the Government give the Committee some assurance that by the course they proposed they would not be tying their hands with regard to such compensation as they might think equitable?

Vote agreed to.

MOTION FOR PRINTING.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY, who had on the Paper a long Notice of Motion, the object of which was to amend the Standing Orders of the House of Lords relating to Labouring Class

Dwellings, by a series of Amendments, so as to provide that "in the case of any Private Bill which proposed to take compulsory, or by agreement, in the Metropolis, twenty or more houses, or in any city, borough, or other urban sanitary district, ten or more houses, occupied wholly or partially by persons belonging to the labouring class, the promoters of such Bill should deposit at the Office of the Local Government Board before the end of November a statement of the number, description, and situation of such houses; and no such Bill should be read a second time, until the Local Government Board had reported with respect to the housing of the people thus displaced; and, further, that the Committee on any such Bill should insert such clauses as would secure the provision of suitable accommodation within a distance of one mile from their place of residence for such number of persons as the Local Government Board should specify in their Report, unless they (the Committee) should see fit, either with or without condition, to modify or waive such requirements," said, that in rising to move that the said Amendments be printed, he would intimate that they had been finally approved by two Royal Commissions, including the one which was now sitting, and had been accepted by the Government. There had been a delay, which their Lordships might have observed, of a considerable time, during which they had been retained on the Paper, because it was thought very desirable to hear all the objections which Parliamentary agents, representatives of Railways, and other persons, might have to make, before adopting the ultimate form which the Standing Order was to take. He believed the Standing Order, as it was now proposed to be amended, would meet with scarcely any opposition from these persons. The main object of the Amendment was one of extreme importance—namely, that in the construction of any railway, through the Metropolis or elsewhere, there should not only be compensation given to the poor and working classes who were evicted from their houses, but that the amount of house accommodation that was available for persons of that class should not, as far as possible, be diminished by works of that kind. Hitherto, it had been imagined that if the existing tenant were sufficiently compensated, all had been done that was necessary to do; but there was a further and larger and much more important consideration—that the houses available for the working classes were scantily supplied, and that the number of them was liable to constant diminution; while the working classes—those who required accommodation—were, of course, constantly increasing with the growth of the population, and the increased industry and prosperity of the country. It was, therefore, very desirable that all works which were authorized by Parliament should, as far as it was practicable, be prevented from diminishing the amount of accommodation for the working classes which now existed. That was really the object of the Standing Order as proposed to be amended. This would be carried into effect by bringing in the Secretary of State or the Local Government Board to supervise the action of the Railway Companies or other promoters of Bills; and the Committee was charged to see that wherever working class accommodation was destroyed, a corresponding quantity should be provided. He begged to move that the Order, as proposed to be amended, be printed with a view to its being taken into consideration on Tuesday next.

Moved, "That the proposed Amendments to the House of Lords Standing Orders on Labouring Class Dwellings be printed."—(The Marquess of Salisbury.)

THE EARL OF WEMYSS said, he apprehended that the Orders would work in this way—that accommodation within one mile should be found.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: "Found" hardly expresses it—"dwellings shall be provided" are the words in the Orders.

THE EARL OF WEMYSS said, he did not see how that was to be done except by turning others out.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, there was scarcely a district in London in which accommodation could not be found by making buildings taller; but the Orders were not intended to work in an iron manner. It was not desirable to insist on unreasonable conditions.

Motion agreed to.

Ordered, That the said Amendments be taken into consideration on Tuesday next.

TRAMWAYS (IRELAND) PROVISIONAL ORDER BILL.—(No. 168.)

(The Lord President.)

COMMITTEE.

House in Committee (according to Order).

LORD INCHQUIN said, agreeably to his Notice, he would move the insertion in the Bill of the clause he had placed upon the Paper. He had withdrawn the Motion which he moved on a previous occasion, as he considered that the new clause which he now proposed would effect the object he had in view—namely, the protection of the ratepayers of the different counties who guaranteed the capital of these tramway undertakings. He thought that some provision of this character was really required.

Moved, to insert the following Clause:—

“The capital authorised by this Act shall not be issued save as said capital may from time to time be required for the actual construction and carrying out of the said undertaking, and the certificate of the Board of Trade in that behalf shall be the evidence of such requirement: Provided that the Board of Trade shall reserve their final certificate in respect of not less than five per cent. of the whole capital until twelve months after the line has been opened and worked for traffic.”—(The Lord Inchiquin.)

LORD CARLINGFORD (LORD PRESIDENT of the COUNCIL) said, he was sorry that the noble Lord opposite (Lord Inchiquin) should persevere with this Amendment. It really would have a very hard and, possibly, a fatal effect on these tramway undertakings. It would prevent local capital being invested in the tramway lines constructed under the Act of last year, and would throw the promoters of those lines entirely into the hands of financiers. As he had previously stated, he was quite ready to insert in this Bill the provision which had been inserted in the West Clare Bill by the Irish Privy Council.

LORD INCHQUIN said, that as the noble Lord the Lord President of the Council did not think it prudent to insert this clause in the Bill, he would withdraw it. He really thought, however, that the Government should insert some protective clauses in all Provisional Orders, and send out a Memorandum to Grand Juries, calling attention to the matters which should be inserted in the Presentment for the protection of the county interests.

Clause (by leave of the Committee) withdrawn.

On the Motion of The LORD PRESIDENT, Amendment made by inserting Clause 9 of the Tramways (Ireland) Provisional Order (No. 2) Bill in the Bill.

Further Amendments made.

The Report of the Amendments to be received on Monday next; and Bill to be printed as amended. (No. 211.)

POOR LAW GUARDIANS (IRELAND)

BILL.—(No. 201.)

(The Lord President.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

LORD CARLINGFORD (LORD PRESIDENT of the COUNCIL), in rising to move that the Bill be now read a second time, said, that it had been several times before the House of Commons, and almost made its way through that House; but it had reached the House of Lords now for the first time. It was a Bill upon which there had been a large amount of agreement in the other House amongst Irish Members as to its main provisions, which he would call the second reading portion of the Bill; although, upon other and minor points, there had been a difference of opinion. The Bill was not a Government measure, and it did not reach that House as a Government measure; but as no independent Member of their Lordships' House had taken it up, and as it appeared to him that it was a Bill of considerable importance to Ireland, he thought it ought to be brought under the notice of the House. He had, therefore, undertaken to move the second reading. What he would call the main provisions of the Bill were contained in the first and second parts of it. The main object of the Bill was to put an end to the present system of voting at Poor Law elections for Guardians in Ireland, by substituting for the voting papers, at present in use, vote by ballot. That was a change which, in his opinion, would be one of great value in that country. He could not conceive any much worse system than the present system of voting for Poor Law Guardians. The unfortunate voter —as everyone who knew Ireland must be aware—was exposed to every kind of the most contrary influences—to the influence of the landlord, the agent, the bailiff, the local Land League, the red-hot Nationalist, who might be his next-door neighbour, the priest, and the curate; and he was pressed and pulled in all directions by these various forces. Such a state of things was thoroughly objectionable; and under such pressure, and such contrary motives and passions, the system of voting papers was liable to great abuse, and it was pretty well known that great abuse had taken place. He could not doubt that it would be a great improvement to substitute vote by ballot for that system; and if a general measure were introduced dealing with local government in Ireland, he had no doubt that this provision would form part of it. Then there were improvements, as concerned registration, in the way of constructing a Register of Voters; and the Bill also proposed a great improvement in the way of giving proper means and facilities for the hearing of Petitions against elections of Guardians. It was proposed, under the Bill, that Petitions should be referred to the County Court Judge. At present, nothing could be more objectionable than the way in which these points were decided—namely, by means of inquiries held by Poor Law Inspectors. It was left to the Local Government Board to hold an inquiry as to whether a particular Guardian had been properly elected or not. The result was, that there were constant collisions between the Boards of Guardians and the Local Government Board, whose duties in this respect were very onerous and invidious. His right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary for Ireland had informed him that, since the Spring Poor Law elections, the return of 127 Guardians had been disputed. Eighty of these cases had been decided; the rest remained still to be considered, and of those considered, 10 had been set aside. That was a state of things which would be cured at once by the provisions of this Bill. Then there was a clause providing that the elections should be held triennially, instead of annually, which, he considered, would be a great improvement. That, in his view, was the main part of the Bill that he would ask their Lordships to read a second time. There were other points of considerable importance.

Lord Carlingsford

There was a provision with regard to the rateable qualifications of Guardians. That qualification, which now varied in Unions, at the discretion of the Local Government Board, it was proposed to fix at £12. At present, in many Unions it was higher, and in many others lower than that sum. Another provision fixed the maximum number of votes which any one voter might give at 18. That number had been taken, under the advice of the Law Officers, as that which was intended by the existing law—that was to say, six votes might be given by the same person in each of three different capacities—namely, as owner, as occupier, and as holding a beneficial interest. There were other points which were those mainly in dispute in the other House, and which would, no doubt, be mainly in dispute in this. One provision proposed to reduce the number of ex officio Guardians from one-half to one-third of the whole body. That, he believed, was now the legal proportion of ex officio Guardians in England, and it was also the proportion fixed in the original Irish Poor Law, although it was afterwards raised to one-half, he did not know why. Again, at present, any Resident Magistrates became ex officio Guardians, and if the number of Resident Magistrates was not sufficient, it was filled up from owners within the Union who resided elsewhere; but it was a chance, of course, who those gentleman might be. The Bill proposed, while reducing the legal number to one-third, that the Justices should themselves elect the members to constitute that one-third from their own body. It was found, by experience, that gentlemen so elected for the express purpose of attending the Boards of Guardians were far more likely to act than those who found themselves on those Boards by haphazard, so to speak. By this change it was hoped they would get magistrates who would regularly attend the Boards. But the proposal which had been most objected to was that which provided for the abolition of proxy voting. At present, the owner could hand over his proxies to his agent, as was often done, in blank, leaving him to vote for whatever Guardian he pleased. The owner might be living out of Ireland, and, knowing nothing about the persons who were candidates, left it to his agent to vote for him. Of course, he knew the ground on which such a system would be defended—that of the due representation of property; but he submitted that on principle, and on its merits, it was very difficult to defend such a system. He quite admitted, however, that that was a question which was very well open to discussion; but it was a question which could be very well discussed in Committee, if the House read the Bill a second time. He observed, indeed, that in the other House, several prominent Members of what was called the “Popular Party” thought there were other possible modes of dealing with that particular question. There was, at all events, great objection to the exercise of the voting power by a mere absentee landlord, who sent over a proxy which lasted from one election to another. The proxy was not even required to be exercised for a particular election, but it would last for a considerable time.

THE MARQUESS OF WATERFORD: For one election only.

LORD CARLINGFORD (LORD PRESIDENT of the COUNCIL) said, he very much doubted that statement of the noble Marquess; anyhow, the system was much objected to. That, however, was a matter which was quite open for consideration in Committee; but he might say that the Local Government Board had the power, and would be prepared, as far as they could, to exercise the power, of so fixing the elections in the different Unions that owners of property might be able personally to exercise their right of voting in Unions in which they were interested on different days. That was how that matter stood. He had said that these last points, though of considerable importance, were not the essential principle of the Bill; and he would ask their Lordships to read the Bill a second time, because he held that, in the present circumstances of Ireland, the change in the present system of voting to vote by ballot would be of great advantage as preventing much abuse and a vast amount of the harassing and undue pressure to which voters were subject. Further than that, the question of a change in the system of proxy voting to which he had alluded was a matter very well worth discussing, and it could be discussed in Committee. No doubt, there was very much to be said about the due representation of property in these elections, and it was often urged that the argument in favour of the case in Ireland was much stronger than in England, because, in Ireland, the rates were divided—one-half falling on the landlord and one-half on the tenant—while in the case of holdings under £4 the rates were paid wholly by the landlord. That was a consideration which their Lordships would bear in view. On the other hand, he thought it right to say that, in his opinion, it was very doubtful whether this attempt to divide the rates between landlord and tenant in Ireland had been very successful; and as to the comparison with the payment of poor rates in England, he thought it was a matter of great doubt whether, in the long run, the landlord in England did not pay more than the landlord in Ireland. The question had often been discussed how far the rates were thrown on the landlord in this country. Certainly, in present circumstances, an English tenant in taking a farm would take the rates into account, and make the fullest allowance for them; and if, on the expiration of his lease or agreement, matters were not arranged to his satisfaction with the landlord, in connection with his rent, the tenant would throw up his farm and look for another. The case, however, was different in Ireland. A diminution of the rent in proportion to the rates was not so easily made in Ireland, inasmuch as freedom of contract entered so little into the question of the settlement of rent, a fact which he considered one of those elementary truths that were plain to everyone who had learned to open his eyes to the conditions of Irish life. He very much doubted, therefore, whether, in spite of the artificial division of the rate between the landlord and the tenant in Ireland, the rates did not, in fact, fall to a larger extent on the landlord in this country than they did in Ireland. That, however, was a matter of argument; and he now asked their Lordships to read the Bill a second time, on the ground that the main object of the Bill was a good one—that of substituting for the present system of voting papers vote by ballot.

Moved, “That the Bill be now read 2.”
—(The Lord President.)

THE EARL OF LONGFORD, in rising to move that the Bill be read a second time that day three months, said, that he did not think the reform proposed at all such a pleasant one as the noble Lord opposite (Lord Carlingford) had seemed to regard it, and there were good reasons why it should be postponed for a certain time. The measure, in the first place, did not come from aggrieved Guardians or ratepayers, but from the politicians who had been organizing the Irish Boards of Guardians into amateur political debating societies for their own purposes. The noble Lord the Lord President of the Council had not quite correctly described the parentage of the Bill, nor the circumstances of its passage through the other House. He (the Earl of Longford) found that the names which originally appeared on the back of it, were Mr. O'Brien, Mr. Gray, Mr. Mayne, Mr. O'Sullivan, and Mr. Marum. Now, he desired to speak of those Gentlemen with all respect as Representatives of considerable constituencies; but they were members of an extreme political Party, and one of their articles of faith, according to their own utterances, was to bring the landlords to their knees. If this Bill were passed, it would have an effect in that direction. The noble Lord, in moving the second reading of the Bill, mentioned its passage through the House of Commons; but he scarcely gave an idea of how the Government had treated the opponents of the Bill. He (the Earl of Longford) found that the Bill had been introduced by private Members early in the year. It came on for second reading on the 2nd of July, and then Mr. Trevelyan, on behalf of the Government, smiled upon it and spoke favourably of it. He (the Earl of Longford) thought the right hon. Gentleman had adopted it; but the noble Lord the Lord President of the Council said that the Bill was not regularly in his hands. It was adopted by him, however, so far as speaking favourably of it; and he showed his approval of it by indicating certain Amendments to which he would consent, and which would remove some of the objectionable features of the Bill. The result was, the Irish Members and the Government having joined, the opponents of the Bill were helpless, and did not divide against it. Here he might observe that a majority supporting the Government in the other House were described as an intelligent representation of the will of the nation; whereas, in their Lordships'

House, a majority against the Government were spoken of in altogether different terms. With this indication of Mr. Trevelyan's view on the part of the Government, the Bill went to the next stage, which came on the 15th of July. The Amendments which Mr. Trevelyan had referred to were then adopted, and the Bill was toned down by the omission of some of the conditions to which the opponents had strongly objected. The Report stage of the Bill was taken on the 17th of July; and on that occasion, to the astonishment of the opponents of the measure, the same Amendments to which Mr. Trevelyan had acceded two days before were cancelled, and the objectionable conditions were reinstated in the Bill with no further notice than the insertion in the Votes of that morning. The third reading of the Bill was low down on the Orders of the Day, and did not come on until 2 o'clock; and, notwithstanding the earnest protests of the few opponents of the Bill who were present, by a Division at close on 4 o'clock in the morning the Bill passed in its present objectionable state. That was the mode in which the Bill had passed through the House of Commons, and in which it had come to their Lordships for consideration. He was far from charging any Member of the Government with sharp practice in the matter; but he scarcely knew in what other way to characterize what had occurred; and, if he were not to say another word, he thought he was justified in asking their Lordships to reject such a slippery Bill in such slippery hands. However, he had a few words to say about the merits of the Bill, in regard to which he took a somewhat different view from the Lord President. This Bill, if passed, would be the means of creating further sources of ill-will between the different classes living in Ireland. As regarded election of Guardians by ballot, and for a term of three years, if they were considering a new mode of constructing the Poor Law system, there might be something to say on those points; but the present system was not, by any means, open to the objections to which the noble Lord had referred. The conditions of the Poor Law in England and in Ireland were quite different. The proposed change was really a theoretical rather than a practical one, and it might very well wait for consideration hereafter. The owners of property had great reason to view this Bill with suspicion; and when he said this, he did not in any way take an exaggerated view of the rights of property. As regarded himself, he lived a good deal in Ireland, and generally on good terms with his neighbours, except sometimes. The Poor Law was a very heavy burden indeed upon the owners of property; and in the construction of the Poor Law system one-third ex officio Guardians were placed upon the Board. Subsequently that proportion was increased to one-half, as it now remained; and, considering the amount owners of property contributed to the rates, they were fully entitled to the representation they at present enjoyed. They paid more than half the poor rate, and they were entitled to half of the representation. There was certainly no pretence for the assertion that the elected Guardians were habitually overborne by the ex officio Guardians. The circumstances of the case made it impossible; because the elected Guardians, being always resident in the Union, were available at all times, the contrary being the case with the ex officio Guardians. Those gentlemen having occupations at a distance were rarely all available at one time. On such occasions as the election of Chairman—or to resist political questions which had no concern with the Poor Law administration—on such occasions, though rarely, the ex officio Guardians might be able to assert themselves in favour of something like order. In four Unions with which he was connected the elected Guardians had recently displaced ex officio officials in favour of members of their own body. He did not think that the proposal in the Bill to reduce the proportion of ex officio members from a-half to one-third could be reasonably defended. A change on which the noble Lord (Lord Carlingford) had spoken, and about which he thought he appeared to be a little uncertain, was the matter of the abolition of the proxy. Upon that point, if the noble Lord wished for further information, he could refer him to the speech which Mr. Trevelyan delivered in June, 1883, and in which he would find himself most completely refuted in almost everything he had said. There was no real abuse in this matter of voting by proxy. It was not the case of a standing authority handed over by an absent man to a deputy. The proxy form filled up was an elaborate one, must be signed in the presence of a witness, and could only be used on one occasion. A further clause in the Bill reduced the qualification for the Guardians in many cases. This was really most unwise. The policy of Parliament now was to impose upon Boards of Guardians new and additional duties, and it was not desirable at all to reduce their status. If their status was reduced, they would become a chorus to be worked by the wire-pullers as political agents. The central clauses of the Bill were elaborate arrangements for raising disputes as to elections of Guardians, and for deciding disputed cases. The Land Act had created disputes in almost every parish in Ireland, and it was unnecessary to introduce these further differences of opinion. On the whole, he would say that the Bill was not required for the better administration of the Poor Law. It was brought forward for altogether different purposes, and he trusted their Lordships would reject it. Therefore, in order to give them an opportunity of doing so, he would move its postponement for three months.

Amendment moved, to leave out ("now") and add at the end of the Motion ("this day three months.")—(The Earl of Longford.)

LORD FITZGERALD said, there were provisions in the Bill to which he also entirely objected. He particularly referred to the clause providing for a reduction in the proportion of the ex officio Guardians to the elected from one-half to one-third. Whether such a change might be wise eventually he did not presume to say; but, in his judgment, it certainly was not wise at the present time. If the Bill should reach Committee, and if the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Longford) moved the rejection of that clause, he promised that he would support him. He could not support the proposal to abolish proxy voting. It would be unfair, and to do so would be to create a further divergence between the law of England and Ireland to which he objected. One of the main principles of the Bill was voting by ballot, and to that he was favourable; but he contended that it was not necessary to protect tenants from the landlords as had been suggested. They required no protection in that direction; but he did think they required protection from certain other external influences, and he therefore approved of the clause providing for voting by ballot. The Bill contained a great deal of useful matter, such as the provision for making an elected Guardian a Guardian for three years, and for trying all questions as to disputed elections of Guardians before a County Court Judge without a jury. He thought that a cheap and very Constitutional mode of settling such disputes. He hoped the House would accept the second reading of the Bill, seeing, as he had said, that it contained a great deal of very useful matter, and that they could then go into Committee, where all proper Amendments could be made. It would then be for the House of Commons to accept them, or to take the responsibility of rejecting them.

THE MARQUESS OF WATERFORD said, he was glad to find that the noble and learned Lord opposite (Lord Fitzgerald) agreed that the greater part of the Bill was most objectionable. The only two points which he appeared to approve were the provisions for making the election of a Guardian last for three years, and for trying election petitions in regard to Poor Law matters before a County Court Judge. As far as he (the Marquess of Waterford) himself was concerned, there was only one thing in the measure which he believed was good, and that was that the elections should take place every three years. The law, both of England and Ireland, had worked very well, and he maintained that the new machinery was entirely unnecessary. But the Bill bristled with various other proposed changes in the law, and it was not worth while reading the Bill a second time, merely for the purpose of passing into law two such provisions as those of which the noble and learned Lord approved. The Bill was entirely different from any other that had ever been proposed in the House of Commons. No previous Bill destroyed the ex officio element. He could not make out where the noble Lord (Lord Carlingford) found the agreement of which he spoke as to the provisions of the Bill. He (the Marquess of Waterford) was satisfied that the Conservative, and he believed a great portion of the Liberal Members in the House of Commons were entirely opposed to a great number of its provisions.

LORD CARLINGFORD (LORD PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL): I spoke of the principle of vote by ballot.

THE MARQUESS OF WATERFORD said, the Bill would take away from those who contributed, to a large extent, to the payment of rates all control over the disbursement of those rates. In Ireland the landlord paid half his tenant's poor rates, and the whole of his poor rates if he was rated under £4. The landlords of Ireland thus paid about five-eighths of the whole rates of Ireland, and this Bill would take from them the power which they now possessed over the expenditure of Boards of Guardians. He thought their Lordships had every right to reject the Bill. He was advising them to do so, not on his own authority, but on the authority of a Gentleman who ought to know better than anyone else at this moment what should be done in Ireland. He meant the authority of the Chief Secretary for Ireland, who said last year that the number of owners to occupiers was most disproportionate, and that in the richest Unions they were in the proportion of seven or eight to one. Yet the Chief Secretary for Ireland supported such a Bill as this, which would still further reduce the number of ex officio Guardians. They were to be, according to the clause in the Bill, not one-third of the Board, as had been stated by the Lord President, but one-third of the elected Guardians, which was one-fourth of the Board.

LORD CARLINGFORD (LORD PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL): No, no.

THE MARQUESS OF WATERFORD said, the Bill proposed that the ex-officio should be one-third of the elected Guardians, and therefore one-fourth of the whole. It was a very easy calculation. He believed that in Ireland the ex officio Guardians were at one time only a third; but that the proportion was raised to a half in 1847 by Lord John Russell, a Liberal Minister, on account of the jobbery and extravagance that existed. Mr. Trevelyan had entirely changed his tactics since last year. He then stated that, having regard to the fact that the owners paid one-half of the rates, it would be extremely unjust if, practically, the whole election was handed over to the occupiers. He (the Marquess of Waterford) could not make out the influence that had been at work since then. The right hon. Gentleman entirely forgot that if the Bill passed it would have the effect of abolishing proxy voting, for owners who had property in various districts and Unions in Ireland could not be travelling about for three weeks, as would probably be necessary to record their vote, especially as the elections might in many cases take place on the same day.

LORD CARLINGFORD (LORD PRESIDENT of the COUNCIL) said, the Chief Secretary for Ireland also said that the present system of proxy voting was detestable.

THE MARQUESS OF WATERFORD said, he would admit that Mr. Trevelyan did say that; but he did not show why it was detestable. That he should have changed his opinion on the subject was perfectly extraordinary. The whole measure showed an intention to oust the owners from managing the money which they themselves paid. It was a monstrous proposal which reduced the ex officio Guardians to one-fourth of the Board. He must say that it was an extraordinary thing that his noble Friend should bring up to their Lordships a Bill that was passed through the House of Commons in such a way as this Bill. Last year Mr. Trevelyan said he was in favour of continuing the ex officio Guardians; but this year the clause had been knocked out in Committee in the House of Commons by the Government themselves, and on Report Mr. Trevelyan came forward and re-inserted it. That change spoke volumes for the pressure that could be brought to bear on the Government and on Mr. Trevelyan by 30 Members acting together. The provisions of the Bill would entirely revolutionize the whole system of the Poor Law in Ireland. Some of them might not be as vicious as others; but there was only a single point of which he could approve. If the law in Ireland was assimilated to that in England, and the occupiers paid their own rates, there might be no such objection to the Bill; but when in no case the occupier paid more than half the rates, and in many instances no rates at all, he could not conceive how so iniquitous a Bill could ever have been brought before their Lordships' House. He would give an instance of how the Boards of Guardians in Ireland carried on their work. Mr. Sexton, speaking two years ago in Ireland, suggested how the expenditure of the landlords might be increased by making them pay rates for the families of suspects and evicted tenants; and on looking over a Return of the Tralee Board of Guardians he found that that Board allowed £1 15s. each to the families of suspects, while they only allowed from 1s. 6d. to 5s. for the same number of a family of other distressed persons. That was the way in which the rates were disbursed by elected Guardians in Ireland; and, of course, this came much heavier upon the landlords. He had a letter that morning from a gentleman in Ireland, a Catholic, and a strong Liberal, who said that if this Bill passed he and his friends, as ex officio, would never go into the Board of Guardians again, because they would only be laughed at and insulted. The Bill would give a most frightful impetus to jobbery of every description. Last year the Carrick-on-Suir Guardians had to be disbanded, and paid Guardians were sent down. If the Bill was allowed to pass, this would soon have to be the case in almost every instance in Ireland, for the extravagance of Boards elected as these would be could hardly be described. He therefore trusted the Bill would be rejected.

SHERIFF COURT HOUSES (SCOTLAND) AMENDMENT BILL.—(No. 193.)

(The Earl of Dalhousie.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^d."
 —(The Earl of Dalhousie.)

THE EARL OF WEMYSS said, that his noble Friend (Lord Abinger), who had opposed the Bill on Tuesday, had given Notice of his intention to renew that opposition. He (the Earl of Wemyss) would venture very humbly to suggest to him, having supported him on the previous occasion, whether it might not be desirable for him to withdraw his opposition, because, from information he had got from Scotland, he believed that, upon the whole, the arrangement which had been come to was a very fair one, so far as the Treasury was concerned. This Bill, as it now stood, would give advantages to Scottish counties which had already gone to expense in the erection of Court Houses, the cost and maintenance of which up to the present time had mainly fallen on the rates. These counties were at present entirely out in the cold, as they did not come under the provisions of the Act of 1860. As regarded the security which the Treasury hoped to obtain against undue expenditure, he thought there was nothing unreasonable in that. Indeed, looking at the Bill as a whole, he ventured to think that it was one in the interests of the Scottish counties, and that it should pass into law.

LORD ABINGER said, that, since he put the Motion for the rejection of the Bill on the Notice Paper, he had been in communication with the Lord Advocate and several noble Lords from Scotland on both sides of the House; and, upon the whole, he thought the general opinion seemed to be that they had better come to a compromise, rather than fight the measure. He thought some points of the measure were very objectionable; but, after all, in matters of compromise, they could not expect to have everything their own way. Some of the counties would benefit by it, and others would suffer by it; but, on the whole, he thought it was the general feeling of the Peers from Scotland that the Bill should pass.

THE EARL OF ROSEBERY said, he wished to call their Lordships' attention to the fact that the Bill was read a third time in the other House four days after the "Massacre of the Innocents." The "Massacre of the Innocents" included, as their Lordships knew, the Secretary for Scotland Bill, whilst this Bill, which was one of much less advantage to Scotland, was allowed to proceed. He confessed he should like to be able to give his friends in Scotland some explanation of this.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, it appeared to him that the explanation was extremely simple. This was a very small and unimportant Bill, while the Secretary for Scotland Bill, as his noble Friend (the Earl of Rosebery) would himself admit, was one of great importance, and in a different category altogether.

LORD BALFOUR said, he was glad his noble Friend (Lord Abinger) had not persisted in his opposition to the Bill, because he thought, on the whole, it was a Bill which could fairly be accepted. The point, however, he wished to represent to the House was this—he thought the Scottish counties were not fairly treated in the way in which this Bill was introduced. The Members of the Government knew perfectly well that the principal meetings of the Scottish counties—of Commissioners of Supply, and such meetings—were held towards the end of April and the beginning of May. The Government must by that time have made up their minds to introduce this Bill, because it was introduced very soon afterwards in the other House. In a matter of this kind, so closely affecting the administration of counties and the laying on of assessments, it was surely only natural that the Commissioners of Supply should have been given an opportunity of expressing their opinion on the matter; but by the course which the Government took in introducing the Bill towards the end of May, it was very likely to slip through without any notice being attracted to it. It was read a second time in the other House very soon after its introduction, and slipped quickly through several stages, and, being a Money Bill, no Amendment could have been put into it in this House. Therefore he must say he thought the time chosen by the Government for introducing the Bill was a most unfortunate one. He had only this further to say—that if the Secretary for Scotland Bill had passed, they might have been insured against such procedure on the part of the Treasury in future. He thought the only cure against their being treated in this way in Scotland was to have a responsible Department to look after the affairs of that country; and, for his own part, he sincerely trusted that Bills of this kind, so much affecting the administration of counties as this did, would be introduced at an earlier period of the Session, and before the principal meetings of those having charge of the administration of the counties.

Motion agreed to: Bill read 2^d accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House To-morrow.

House adjourned at a quarter past Six o'clock, till To-morrow, a quarter past Ten o'clock.

QUESTIONS.

POOR LAW, (IRELAND)—DR. CALAGHAN, MEDICAL ATTENDANT, NENAGH
UNION DISPENSARY.

MR. LEAHY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, What action the Local Government Board have taken upon a request made to them by Mr. John M'Cormack, carpenter, of Nenagh, county Tipperary, to the effect that Dr. Calaghan, the medical attendant of the Nenagh Dispensary District of the Nenagh Union, having been served with a red ticket on Friday the 29th May last, which made it his duty to visit immediately Alice M'Cormack, the daughter of the complainant, a girl who was lying at that time dangerously ill, the said Dr. Calaghan allowed four days to elapse, and did not visit the girl until Monday the 2nd of June?

MR. TREVELYAN: In this case the Local Government Board called upon the dispensary doctor for an explanation; and it appears that, though he admits the red ticket may have been left with him, he can find no trace of it. There was no neglect or forgetfulness on his part. He passed the house of the sick child's parents twice on the day on which the ticket is believed to have been left with him, and could have called without any inconvenience to himself, if aware that he was wanted. The doctor had previously to this occurrence, and also after it, prescribed for the child, who is now quite well.

ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY—THE LICENSED TRADES OF KILLES-SHANDRA.

MR. BIGGAR asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If he has received a memorial from the licensed trades of Killeshandra, complaining of the constabulary bringing quite a number of charges before the Petty Sessions Court which Mr. T. D. Gibson, R.M. decided were unsupported by evidence; and, if so, will he say whether he proposes to take any, and, if so, what action in the matter?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, several complaints have been made, and are being inquired into. The matter is one which requires and shall receive full investigation.

SALE OF INTOXICATING LIQUORS ON SUNDAY (WALES) ACT—OPERATION OF THE ACT.

MR. WARTON asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether it is a fact, as reported in the last number of Truth, that the Mayor of Wrexham has stated that drunkenness had trebled since the Sunday Closing Act (Wales) came in force; and, whether a Police Inspector there stated that, on the previous Sunday, nearly half the people were drunk?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I have received two letters on this subject—one from the Mayor, who says he expressed a personal opinion much to the effect stated in the Question; the other from one of the Justices to say that the other Justices present did not concur; and they seem to think that the Mayor's views were not unnaturally influenced by his own professional pursuits.

INDUSTRIAL SCHOOLS (IRELAND).

COLONEL COLTHURST asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether his attention has been called to the refusal of the County Tipperary Grand Jury of the South Riding at the recent assizes to grant any contributions towards the maintenance of children in industrial schools?

MR. TREVELYAN: The secretary to the Grand Jury informs me that no application was made for a presentment under the Act; but that a gentleman asked the Grand Jury to give some assurance that money would be granted at a future Assizes to a school which is not yet in existence. The reply was that the Grand Jury could not pledge any future Grand Juries, and the foreman declined to pledge himself personally.

POOR LAW (IRELAND)—ELECTION OF GUARDIANS, CARMEN DIVISION, COOTEHILL UNION—THE INQUIRY.

MR. HEALY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If it has come under his notice that, at the sworn inquiry in Cooteshill Workhouse on the 8th instant, relative to the validity of the late election for Carmeen Division, Mr. Armstrong, Local Government Board Inspector, formally ruled that the solicitor for Mr. Owen McCabe, defeated candidate, had no right to an inspection of the claims under Form A 1 to the votes given to which he objected; will any steps be taken to remedy the injury done to the case of Mr. McCabe by their non-production; is it the fact that, at the same inquiry, it transpired that Vaughan Montgomery, Esq. J.P., Crilly, Aghnaeluy, county Tyrone, lodged a claim to vote as lessor of Patrick McCabe, Mountain Lodge, on a valuation of £19 10s., and that, by the sworn evidence of Mr. P. McCabe, his lease, and rent receipts, it was proved that Mr. Montgomery had no interest, directly or indirectly, in this holding; and, will he ask this magistrate for an explanation of the filing of this claim.

MR. TREVELYAN: The Local Government Board consider that their Inspector was wrong in refusing to permit an inspection of the claims referred to. They have so informed the Inspector; and they have told Mr. McCabe that, if he desires it, the inquiry shall be reopened to afford him an opportunity of inspecting them. Mr. Montgomery has been written to on the subject of his claim; but his explanation has not yet been received. On such an inquiry I presume that it will be competent for anyone to proceed, and make of Mr. Montgomery any inquiries desired.

MR. HEALY: There are two points in the Question—the first that of forgery, which is one for the Government; and I presume there is a question for the Lord Chancellor as to whether he will supersede Mr. Montgomery.

MR. TREVELYAN said, that he believed if an offence was proved the party would be open for prosecution and a fine of £10.

POOR LAW (IRELAND)—ELECTION OF GUARDIANS—EDENDERRY UNION, KING'S COUNTY.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether the attention of the Local Government Board has been called to the fact that, at the Poor Law election held in March for Edenderry Division, Edenderry Union, King's County, Lord Arthur Hill was allowed to record six votes, although the name of Lord A. Hill does not appear on the rate book, or in any of the legal documents used in the Land Commission Court in the proceedings with the tenants living on that part of the estate out of which Lord A. Hill claims to vote; whether the clerk of the Union, who acted as returning officer, allowed the Trustees of the Marquess of Downshire to record ten votes more than they were entitled to; whether the clerk compelled the rate collector to give a receipt to a son of one of the candidates, who was then allowed to vote out of a portion of his father's land, not being an occupier, and still living in his father's house, and having no more claim than the other children; whether the votes of several tenants were disallowed on the ground that they owed seed rate, although all the seed rate due to the Union was, long before the election, wiped out by a Resolution of the Board of Guardians; whether the Local Government Board have arrived at any decision yet after four months' consideration; and, whether they will grant a sworn investigation, or allow the same person to act as returning officer at future elections?

MR. TREVELYAN: I am informed that the proxy of Lord Arthur Hill was allowed votes on a statement of claim in respect of rent from property of which he is owner in fee. It is not necessary that he should be rated. The tenants and occupiers are the persons rated in such cases. On the 12th of last month I informed the hon. Member, in reply to a former Question, of the facts as to the excess votes allowed to Lord Downshire's trustees. The allegation in the third paragraph of the Question is being inquired into. The votes of several persons were properly disallowed, on the ground that they owed seed rate. The Board of Guardians have no power to wipe out seed rate legally due. The Local Government Board have come to a decision on the matter complained of in respect of this election, and have set aside the election of one of the Guardians returned. They have fully instructed the Returning Officer as to the several points raised, and they see no sufficient ground to supersede him in his office.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR asked whether those persons who had not paid the seed rate would be permanently disfranchised while the seed rate was not paid?

Mr. TREVELYAN, in reply, said, he believed that the non-payment of the seed rate, like the non-payment of any other poor rate, was permanent in its effect so long as the rate was not paid.

Mr. ARTHUR O'CONNOR: The Guardians having wiped out the seed rate, will they be disfranchised for a sum which is no longer demanded from them?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. WALKER), in reply, said, that the same effects applied to this rate as any ordinary poor rate. It was really a portion of the poor rate.

POST OFFICE (IRELAND)—THE GENERAL POST OFFICE, DUBLIN — THE STAFF OF THE SECRETARY'S OFFICE.

COLONEL KING-HARMAN asked the Postmaster General, If a revision and additions to the staff of the Dublin Secretary's Office of the General Post Office was promised in February last, and which revision and additional staff was rendered imperatively necessary owing to the large increase in the correspondence arising out of telegraph and parcels post business, and, if so, why it has not been carried out; if it is the fact that the corresponding office in Edinburgh, though performing fully a third less work than the Irish Department, has been revised and additions made to its staff; and, if he will state what has been the cost of the hands temporarily employed in the Dublin Secretary's Office to meet the pressure arising out of the increased duties there?

Mr. FAWCETT: In reply to the hon. and gallant Member, I have to say that there is no intention to revise the establishment of the Dublin Secretary's Office, and there has been no promise to do so; but it is possible that some slight addition may be made to the existing numbers. The cost of two officers temporarily lent from London is 15s. a-day each; but these gentlemen will shortly return to their ordinary duties. Four additional lower division clerks at Edinburgh have been authorized.

RISH LAND COMMISSION (SUB-COMMISSIONERS)—MR. JOHN M. WEIR.

COLONEL KING-HARMAN asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If he will state the grounds upon which Mr. John M. Weir, who is a shopkeeper at Cookstown, and is believed to have no practical knowledge of land or farming, is to be reappointed a Sub-Commissioner under the Land Act?

Mr. HEALY: Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask you, on a point of Order, whether the hon. and gallant Member is in Order in putting a Question of this sort, which contains matter of a contentious character, inasmuch as it states that Mr. Weir "is believed to have no practical knowledge of land or farming." As the belief is one which is only in the mind of the hon. and gallant Gentleman, I wish to know whether a Notice of that kind ought to be allowed to appear on the Paper?

Mr. SPEAKER: I think the Question, as it stands, is not out of Order, as it inquires whether a gentleman in a certain office is or is not unfit to be reappointed?

Mr. HEALY: Then, before the right hon. Gentleman answers the Question, I would like to ask whether he will be prepared to state the grounds on which all the other Sub-Commissioners, to whom I and my hon. Friends objected, were reappointed?

Mr. TREVELYAN: I should be exceedingly unwilling to promise that. As to the Question on the Paper, I can only say that the Lord Lieutenant, after consultation with the Land Commissioners, made such selections for reappointment as it was thought would be most conducive to the Public Service, and Mr. Weir would not have been selected if his work had shown that he had no practical knowledge of land or farming.

SALMON FISHERIES PROTECTION.

Mr. SEXTON asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, If vessels of the Royal Navy are used for the protection of salmon fisheries anywhere on the coast of Great Britain; whether applications made to the Admiralty for vessels of the Royal Navy to protect salmon fisheries in Lough Foyle, in the River Lee, county Cork, in the Youghal River, county Cork, and in other places in Ireland, were uniformly refused, on the ground that it was the duty of the Conservators and other persons interested in the salmon fisheries to afford the necessary protection; whether it was agreed between the Admiralty and the Irish Inspectors of Fisheries that no vessel of the Royal Navy should be used for such a purpose unless in case when the inspectors apprehended a breach of the peace; whether, in the absence of any statement of such an apprehension, and without any reference to the Inspectors of Fisheries, the Admiralty have quartered a gunboat on the coast of Sligo and Donegal, in the Ballyshannon Fishery District; why this course has been adopted; whether the gunboat will be withdrawn, and the protection of the fisheries be left, as in every other case throughout Great Britain and Ireland, to the Conservators and other persons interested; and, whether a Copy of Correspondence between the Admiralty and other Departments of the Public Service, as to the employment of vessels of the Royal Navy in protecting salmon fisheries, will be laid upon the Table?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN:

Before I reply to the series of Questions addressed to me by the hon. Member, I would beg to refer him to the answer given on the 30th of June last to a Question put to me by the hon. Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy), which covered the whole ground, with the exception of the individual case in Donegal Bay. Vessels of the Royal Navy have been formerly used for the protection of the salmon fisheries in Great Britain; but it may be understood generally that they are no longer so employed. The answer to both parts of the second paragraph of the Question is in the affirmative. No definite arrangement such as is indicated in the third paragraph of the Question has been come to; but the subject is still under consideration. With regard to paragraphs 4, 5, and 6 of the Question, it is the case that on a requisition to the Lord Lieutenant a Coastguard cruiser was ordered into Donegal Bay, owing to the fact that a large number of Coastguardsmen were withdrawn for a few weeks for the purpose of undergoing their annual drill in the Reserve Squadron. That vessel will no longer be required when the men return. The general policy of the Government has been to leave the duty of protecting all the fisheries, except the sea fisheries, to the Conservators of the respective districts. I stated on the previous occasion to which I have referred that the Correspondence on the subject cannot well be produced, it being of a confidential character between the two Departments.

FISHERY LAWS (IRELAND) — CLERK AND INSPECTOR OF SALMON FISHERIES, BALLYSHANNON.

MR. SEXTON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If it is a fact that the salaried Clerk and Inspector of Salmon Fisheries for the district of Ballyshannon, county Donegal, is also the lessee of a salmon fishery in that district; whether, as such Clerk and Inspector, he is the legal agent of the Board of Conservators of the District, and charged with the duty of prosecuting for breaches of the Fishery Laws, and in the event of any breach of the Fishery Laws by himself, as lessee of a salmon fishery in the district, or by his employés, his duty as Clerk and Inspector would be to prosecute himself; whether the Irish Inspectors of Fisheries have remonstrated against the existence of this state of facts; and, whether it will be permitted to continue?

MR. TREVELYAN: The Inspectors of Fisheries report that they have been informed that the fact is as stated in the first paragraph of the Question; and, that being so, the possibility of such an anomalous state of affairs as is suggested in the second paragraph would appear to arise. The law gives the Inspectors of Fisheries no control over the action of the Board of Conservators in this matter. It is possible, however, that, nevertheless, a remonstrance on the part of the Inspectors might have some effect, and I shall ask them to communicate with the Conservators with regard to this office.

PUBLIC HEALTH—VACCINATION.

MR. HOPWOOD asked the Secretary to the Local Government Board, Whether the Department has revised and sanctioned the issue of a pamphlet called "Facts Concerning Vaccination;" whether the following statements, among others, appear:—

"No risks of injurious effects from it need be feared;" "The fear that a foul disease may be implanted is an unfounded one;"

whether the Department has been informed by the Committee of medical experts appointed to report on Dr. Cory's case that it is possible for syphilis to be communicated in vaccination from a syphilitic person—and, whether such statements will be allowed to be made under the authority of the Board?

“Notwithstanding that the operation be performed with the utmost care to avoid the admixture with blood;”

MR. GEORGE RUSSELL: The National Health Society have published a pamphlet under this title. It was revised by the medical officer of the Local Government Board, and the Board have stated that it might be used with advantage in house-to-house visitation. The quotations given in the hon. and learned Member's Question are taken apart from the context. The pamphlet points out—

“That with due care in the performance of the operation no risk of any injurious effects from it need be feared,” and that such mischief as the communication of a foul disease by vaccination—

“Could only happen through the most gross and culpable carelessness on the part of the vaccinator.”

These statements are in no way inconsistent with the Report of the medical experts respecting Dr. Cory's case. The Committee reported expressly that—

“The infants from whom Dr. Cory took lymph for his experiments on his own arm were in such a condition of obvious syphilitic disease as would certainly have precluded their use as vaccinifers by even an inconsiderate and reckless vaccinator. Indeed, they were selected by Dr. Cory for his self-vaccination because they were unquestionable syphilitic cases. It is a rule of practice in the profession not to use in vaccination lymph taken from a child in whom there is any suspicion whatever of syphilitic taint, or, indeed, in whom there is any skin disease although of a character known to be harmless; and the observance of this professional rule is strictly enjoined by the Local Government Board in its instructions to public vaccinators throughout the country.”

The Board see no reason to alter their views with regard to the pamphlet in question.

PALACE OF WESTMINSTER—WEST-MINSTER HALL (WEST FRONT).

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL asked the First Commissioner of Works, Whether, since the Report on Westminster Hall (just presented) shows that, from the time it was built, and “divers lodgings” were attached on the west side, till the Law Courts were demolished the other day, the space on the west side of the Hall always has been occupied by useful buildings, he will fully consider the growing wants of Parliament, and provide for them?

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: Sir Charles Barry intended to erect an additional wing to this building, running from St. Stephen's porch and meeting another wing from the Clock Tower. This extension, however, was abandoned some years ago, and I can hold out no prospect of the proposal being revived.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL: I beg to give Notice that, considering the strong opinion expressed by the Prime Minister in regard to the delegation of the duties of this House, I shall take an early opportunity of asking him, whether he will use his influence with the First Commissioner of Works not to make such delegation physically impossible by devoting the only available space to a piece of sham ancient architecture?

MR. DICK-PEDDIE asked, whether there was to be a Supplementary Estimate proposed this Session for the buildings in Westminster Hall?

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: Yes.

LAW AND POLICE (METROPOLIS)—THE REFORM DEMONSTRATION.

MR. DIXON-HARTLAND asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, By whose authority Members of Parliament were prevented by the police from passing through the Strand on Monday afternoon on their way to this House?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I have received the following answer from the Chief Commissioner of Police:—

“The orders given to the police were that they were to afford every facility in their power to Members of Parliament; and, if any mistake was made, it was not from want of instruction. I do not understand how a Member was stopped in the Strand, unless by the procession itself, and, if particulars are given, I will inquire into the cause.”

MR. DIXON-HARTLAND: I wish to ask, whether the police had any orders to draw a cordon across Westminster Bridge and refuse everyone passage, stating that, Members or no Members, no one was allowed to pass. I was stopped myself in the same way, and I should like to ask what steps the right hon. Gentleman will take if that were done contrary to his orders?

Mr. Hopwood

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I will take no steps at all. My orders were these. I was very anxious that Members should not be interrupted, and when I originally saw the plans of the police, I found there had been no provision made for keeping open the main access to the Houses of Parliament. I directed, therefore, that a clear road should be kept from Charing Cross down to the Houses of Parliament, and that was done, as everyone knows, most efficiently. Of course, I could not go all over London looking where Members of Parliament might be. I could not instruct the police to do that. The general instructions were to give every facility they could. I also considered whether it was possible, so as not to interfere more than was necessary with the traffic, to break at intervals the procession, in order to allow the traffic to go through; but, on consideration with the police, it was seen that such a course would lead to great confusion—that the procession would fall into confusion, and that it would lead to that interruption which it was most desirable to avoid. Therefore, we determined that could not be done. In these circumstances, of course, a certain amount of personal inconvenience was inevitable. That always happens, and must happen, whenever there is a crowd—whether there is a Volunteer Review, whether there is a procession, an entrance of Garibaldi into London, a triumphal return from Berlin, or anything of that kind. There is always a certain amount of inconvenience caused by a crowd in London. The only thing the police can do is to minimize the inconvenience as much as possible; and I think the general opinion of London, and England, and of Europe is that the police did their duty admirably on this occasion, and that the public suffered as little inconvenience as possible.

MR. WARTON asked the Postmaster General, Whether he is aware that a Post Office van was delayed for two hours, standing in front of the Army and Navy Club, on the occasion of the so-called "Demonstration" of last Monday; and, whether, should any similar "Demonstrations" be announced, he will take such steps as he can to insure the free passage of vans and carts in Post Office employ?

MR. FAWCETT: I find that a Post Office van, and also a mail cart, were detained on the spot referred to for about two hours last Monday afternoon, and a communication has been addressed to the Commissioner of Police upon the subject. Generally speaking, I am informed that the police exerted themselves to prevent delay to the mail vehicles.

Subsequently,

VISCOUNT FOLKESTONE said, he wished to ask the Secretary of State for War a Question of which he had been unable to give him Notice—namely, Whether it was true, as stated in a letter to The Times, that three Yeomanry bands in uniform took part in the Reform Demonstration on Monday; whether that act was not an infraction of the Queen's Regulations; and, whether the authorities intended to take any notice of such infraction, and to take steps to prevent such conduct in the future?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I cannot answer that Question without Notice. It is extremely improbable that any such thing occurred.

VISCOUNT FOLKESTONE: I will put the Question again to-morrow.

LABOURERS (IRELAND) ACT, 1883— BALLYMENA BOARD OF GUARDIANS.

MR. SEXTON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is a fact that the agricultural labourers of the electoral divisions of Ahoghill and Portglenone, county Antrim, applied last year, immediately after the passing of the Labourers (Ireland) Act, to the local sanitary authority, the Ballymena Board of Guardians, to make an Improvement Scheme in virtue of the Act, and that the application was attended with no result; whether, towards the end of March this year, a representation, in conformity with the statute, was laid before the Ballymena Board, in the interest of the labourers above mentioned, together with a report from Alexander Young, M.D., Ballymena, describing the houses of the labourers in question as being—

"In a truly wretched condition," "evidently unfit for human habitation," "covered with scanty and decayed thatch, the walls in numerous instances split and rent, in many cases ready to come down, in all more or less saturated with moisture," and whether the Report declared an Improvement Scheme to be requisite; whether the Ballymena Board adjourned the question twice, on the third occasion refused to make a Scheme, and held back the Report of Dr. Young until the meeting after that at which they had resolved upon such refusal; whether the Board, in compliance with section ten of the Act of 1883, have sent to the Local Government Board a copy of the representation, accompanied by their reasons for not acting upon it; and, what steps the Local Government Board will take in reference to the matter?

Mr. TREVELYAN: Sir, I am informed that a Memorial relating to the two electoral divisions referred to was put forward in October last, and the Guardians appointed Committees to inquire into the matter. The Portglenone Committee reported that, in their opinion, action was not necessary in that division. It was subsequently agreed that a scheme should be formulated for Ahoghill; but the matter was delayed too long to admit of anything being done this Session. In March last, a Memorial was addressed to the Guardians, asking them to adopt a resolution in favour of an improvement scheme, and to receive a deputation on the subject, which they did. I am informed that it is not a fact that these representations were accompanied by any Report from Dr. Young, or that the Report, when subsequently received, was in any way kept back. The clerk states that, on his return from the Board's meeting on the 7th of June, he found a Report from Dr. Young, who is not the medical officer of health, without date, in his private office, and that he submitted it to the Board at their next meeting on the 14th of June. A proposal to formulate a scheme was several times before the Guardians, and was finally rejected on the 7th of June. This was reported to the Local Government Board on the 15th of July, the reasons stated being, that in the divisions specified, as well as throughout the entire Union, there are numbers of cottier houses unoccupied for which tenants cannot be procured. The Local Government Board are not empowered to take any very practical steps in the matter. It rests with the sanitary authority to prepare a scheme, and submit it if they see fit to do so. The hon. Member has called my attention to a matter in the 5th paragraph; and I will see whether an inquiry can be ordered.

Mr. SEXTON asked, would the right hon. Gentleman call upon the Local Government Board to remonstrate with the Ballymena Board of Guardians for the delay in dealing with the scheme of the 7th of June?

Mr. TREVELYAN: I will see about it.

POST OFFICE (IRELAND)—THE CLONMEL MAILS.

Mr. MOORE asked the Postmaster General, Whether he has come to any decision as to the acceleration of the Mails between Dublin and Clonmel; whether it is a fact that the Inspector of Mails in Ireland has recommended that the Mails for Clonmel be thrown out and taken up at Thurles; and, whether the only objection to this course is the exorbitant price demanded by the Limerick and Waterford Company for carrying the Mails between Thurles and Clonmel?

Mr. FAWCETT: I have not yet been able to come to any decision as to the acceleration of the day mail to Clonmel. The question of delivering and taking up the Clonmel mail at Thurles by the mail trains while in motion is still open to consideration; but, even if no difficulty existed on that point, I fear that I should not be justified in calling for a train to be run from Thurles to Clonmel solely for the Mail Service. The circumstance would be different if the Company were running a train for passenger purposes at hours suitable for the Mail Service.

In reply to a further Question from Mr. MOORE,

Mr. FAWCETT said, that further inquiry should be made.

TOWNS IMPROVEMENT (IRELAND) ACT —FINES FOR DRUNKENNESS.

Mr. HEALY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If it is the fact that the Inspector General of Constabulary has, since 1878, directed the police, where a local town court is established under the Act of 1854, that persons arrested for drunkenness within the town limits, but residing outside the town, are not to be brought before the Town Justices; whether this has the effect of diverting the fines from the Borough Fund to the Constabulary Fund, which latter receives one-half of all such fines at Petty Sessions; whether this is excused on the allegation that the warrant of a Town Justice cannot be executed outside the boundary; whether, if this be so, the Lord Chancellor will appoint the Town Justices to the County Commission; if not, will any steps be taken to amend the powers of Town Justices as to trans-boundary warrants; is it the case that at present the Inspector General is empowered to indorse town warrants under section seventy-seven of the Act of 1854, as well as under the Petty Sessions Act; and, whether, as many towns complain of the great loss caused to their funds by the rule of the police, a change will in future be made?

MR. TREVELYAN: The Constabulary have been informed that the effect of a recent decision, in a case tried in the Court of Common Pleas, is that they are entitled to take proceedings in their own names as complainants at Petty Sessions against persons found drunk in the public streets of towns under the Towns Improvement Act, and that only one moiety of the fines recovered in such cases is payable to the Town Commissioners. They are also directed to take that course in the cases of persons residing outside the town. In these cases the Constabulary Force Fund receives one-half the fines imposed at Petty Sessions; but I am advised that it is not right to represent such half as diverted from the Borough Fund, inasmuch as the legal title of the Constabulary Force Fund to its share is equally clear with that of the Borough Fund. The practice of not bringing before the Town Justices persons arrested for drunkenness within the town limits, but residing outside the town, is not justified on the ground stated in the Question—namely, “that the warrant of a Town Justice cannot be executed outside the boundary”—but on this—that the Constabulary maintain order and act as guardians of the peace in these towns; and that although the Town Commissioners have statutory power to utilize the services of the Constabulary as night watchmen (on paying for them), yet they do not do so, but leave the work of watching the town and maintaining order, and suppressing drunkenness to the Constabulary without making any payment. If the Constabulary were employed as night watchmen, they would take out summonses in the name of the Commissioners, and then the whole of the fines would go to the Borough Fund. The Government are advised that the present arrangement is not unreasonable or unlawful.

POST OFFICE (IRELAND)—DELIVERY OF LETTERS AT DALKEY, CO.
DUBLIN.

COLONEL KING-HARMAN asked the Postmaster General, Whether he will take steps to remedy the very great inconvenience suffered by persons residing at Dalkey and the adjoining districts, in the county of Dublin, by the non-delivery of their letters until nearly ten o'clock in the morning, the consequence of which is that a great number of persons who have daily business avocations in the city of Dublin cannot receive their letters before leaving home; whether this inconvenience, and also the annoyance caused by the unnecessarily late delivery of letters in the evening, are wholly attributable to a want of a sufficient number of letter-carriers and assistants; whether it is true that the already overworked postmen have had their labours increased by the means of transport for the Parcel Post having been reduced; whether a promise was given to the residents of Dalkey that their grievances in this particular should be remedied after the acceleration of the Irish Mail; and, whether he will consider the propriety of having the mails sent direct to Dalkey, instead of keeping that office as a sub-office to Kingstown, having regard to the very large number of business and professional men who reside at Dalkey and its neighbourhood, especially during the summer and autumn months?

MR. FAWCETT, in reply, said, he had ascertained that the first delivery at Dalkey was finished at 9 o'clock in the morning, and he thought that was not an inconvenient time. If the hon. and gallant Member opposite (Colonel King-Harman) had any special case to complain of, he would have inquiries made about it. He regretted to find that Dalkey did not profit as yet by the accelerated mail service to Dublin, because it was necessary to keep the hour of delivery at its former point, in order to include letters arriving from the Irish provincial towns. He would inquire whether anything could be done to accolerate the delivery in this respect. Letter-carriers at Dalkey only took light parcels, which did not delay the delivery.

COLONEL KING - HARMAN asked, whether the means of transport had been reduced by the taking away of a horse and cart from the district? He could give a great many instances of delay in the matter.

MR. FAWCETT said, the horse and cart were found expensive, and no harm was done by discontinuing them. People were able to get their letters quicker by the present arrangement.

AFRICA (WEST COAST)—CONSULAR JURISDICTION.

MR. BUCHANAN asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the Order in Council to extend British consular jurisdiction on the West Coast of Africa, so as to insure the more speedy and economical apprehension of criminals, is now prepared; and, when it will be laid upon the Table of the House?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: The Order in Council referred to is not yet completed; but it is expected to be ready shortly, and will be laid in due course.

PARLIAMENT—PALACE OF WESTMINSTER—WESTMINSTER HALL—THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

MR. NEWZAM-NICHOLSON asked the Chief Commissioner of Works, Whether his attention has been called to the last paragraph of the interesting Report of Mr. J. L. Pearson, R.A., on Westminster Hall, which states that by the rules of the British Museum he has been unable to obtain some important tracings to accompany his Report, especially from the Orace Collection; and, whether he can suggest a method by which such important drawings and information, for a National purpose, can for the future be obtained, without difficulty, from a National establishment like the British Museum?

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK, in reply, said, that as one of the Trustees of the British Museum, he trusted he might be allowed to answer the Question. The answer was that, according to the rules of the Museum, tracings were not allowed to be taken from drawings or prints without the permission of the keeper. No application was made by Mr. Pearson to the present keeper; and if any was made in the time of his predecessor there is no record of it in the office. The permission is given in special cases, when no injury is apprehended; but the general rule is a necessary precaution for the protection of these valuable documents.

OVERHEAD TELEGRAPH AND TELEPHONE WIRES—LEGISLATION.

SIR HENRY TYLER asked the Secretary to the Local Government Board, Whether he is aware of the number of wires now stretched overhead in various portions of the Metropolis, of which about 230 may be counted between the Royal Exchange and St. Michael's Church, Cornhill, and about 200 between the Mansion House and Queen Street, over Queen Victoria Street; and, whether, having regard to the danger thus occasioned to persons using the streets, especially in thunder-storms, snow-storms, and in high winds, he will consider if the time has arrived when some means should be taken to deal with this question?

MR. GEORGE RUSSELL: We are aware that there is a large number of wires stretched overhead in the Metropolis, and have no reason to doubt the statement as to the number of such wires in the localities mentioned. In replying to the hon. and gallant Member for East Aberdeenshire (Sir Alexander Gordon) I stated that we would consider whether a Select Committee shall not be moved for next Session for the purpose of inquiry and report on the subject. I am advised by the Postmaster General that of the 230 wires mentioned by the hon. Member only six belong to the Post Office, and of the 200 only four.

MERCHANT SHIPPING—PILOTAGE—PORT OF SLIGO.

MR. SEXTON asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether, in consequence of the action of the Board of Trade, in granting pilots' licences to two masters of steamers trading to and from the port of Sligo, and the action of the Sligo Harbour Board, in granting pilots' licences to four other masters of steamers trading to and from the port of Sligo, the regular outside pilots of that port, who gained their licences after apprenticeship, and have acted in connection with the port for many years, are now almost deprived of their means of living, their average incomes having fallen from £35 to about £12 a-year; and, whether any steps will be taken to give them compensation?

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: It is the duty of harbour authorities, and in their default of the Board of Trade, under the Statute, to grant, after examination, certificates to masters and mates, enabling them to pilot the ships in which they serve. This has been done by the Board of Trade in two cases at the Port of Sligo. I do not know what licences have been granted by the Harbour Board. There is no provision for giving compensation to persons who had been acting as pilots before such certificates were granted. No funds are at my disposal for this purpose.

PALACE OF WESTMINSTER—HOUSE OF COMMONS—TELEGRAPHIC NEWS-RECORDING INSTRUMENT FOR USE OF MEMBERS.

MR. GRAY asked the First Commissioner of Works, if he has yet come to a decision whether he will allow a telegraphic news-recording instrument to be erected in the House for the use of Members; whether, immediately after the subject was last mentioned in the House, the Company which supplies such instruments offered him to erect one in the House on payment of the cost of erection only; if he can state how many hours it would take to put up one of these instruments; and, whether he can hold out any hope of one being at work this Session, or during the proposed Autumn Session, or during the Session of 1885?

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE, in reply, said, he had consulted with the Serjeant-at-Arms, who had charge of the arrangements for supplying telegraphic news to the House, and he was of opinion that the proposal of the hon. Member did not offer any facilities over the present system to hon. Members which would justify a change. The Company would propose to supply the instrument at a rental of £50 a-year, with certain occasional charges; whereas the present Telegraph Company supplied its news free.

PUBLIC HEALTH—THE UPPER AND LOWER THAMES.

MR. LABOUCHERE asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether he will take into consideration the expediency of obtaining full powers to deal at once with the dangers to which the inhabitants of the Metropolis and of the Lower Thames Valley are exposed, owing to the absence of land water in the Thames, and to the pestiferous nature of the water that circulates between Bailey Creek and Teddington, and to obtain money for carrying into effect such a scheme as he may deem necessary to mitigate these dangers? In putting the Question, he would ask leave to read the following extracts from the Report of the principal Dockmaster of the East and West India Dock Company to the Directors of the Company:—

"This half-year we have raised 73,100 tons what we considered a good year's work before 1881. The river is in a fearful condition, the stench from the sewage is very bad, and the water very thick and black. It is awfully sickening, and we have had during last week high tides, and through having to draw down after every high tide water to Trinity datum for the protection of the lockgates, causes a strong tide to rush in before the following high water at Blackwall entrance and Eastern Dock entrance, bringing in an enormous amount of sewage. I reckon in four days last week not less than 400 tons entered each tide, for as fast as I dredged in Blackwall Basin I found almost the same water the next day. The banks of the basin are covered with a green slimy substance, and smell very bad. Some steps should be taken by correspondence through the daily newspapers, or by direct reference to the Chairman of the Royal Commission, to keep the question open, or it will have the same fate as other Royal Commissions when the excitement dies out."

Minute of Board—

"The condition of the water is such as tends to the enervation of the staff, and would be a factor in inducing cholera. The matter should be pressed upon the notice of the Board of Works and the Government, with a view to the river being dealt with, not only in the interest of the Docks, but of the citizens at large."

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: I have had this subject under consideration; but the matter is not one with regard to which I can propose legislation during the present Session. I have, however, instructed Mr. Harrison, one of the Inspectors of the Board, to report to me as to the condition of the part of the Thames on which the Lower Thames Valley abuts, and whether, in his opinion, any temporary arrangements can be made by the Local Authorities with the view of removing the evils which are stated to exist, and providing a remedy.

EMPLOYERS' LIABILITY ACT—MINING ACCIDENTS.

MR. MACFARLANE asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If it is true that the Reports of the Official Inspectors of Mines, in cases of explosions, are refused to persons suing for damages under the Employers' Liability Act, and to the counsel in such cases, and that such officers can refuse to give evidence when summoned in support of a case; and that, in consequence, the strongest and most reliable evidence of negligence is unavailable for suitors; and, if he proposes to remove this obstacle to the requirements of justice?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I am not aware, nor have I been able to discover, that any Reports have been so refused; but, speaking generally, I concur in the spirit of the Question, and will take care that instructions are given that if Reports are applied for they shall not be refused, unless under special circumstances.

EDUCATION DEPARTMENT—COMPULSORY SCHOOL ATTENDANCE.

MR. RANKIN asked the Vice President of the Committee of Council, Whether during the recess he will take into his consideration the advisability of altering the age of compulsory school attendance from five years to seven years of age, with a view to prevent children from leaving school by passing the fourth standard at so early an age as many do at present, and also with a view to lessen the great difficulty experienced by magistrates in having to convict parents for not sending young children of five and six years of age regularly to school?

MR. MUNDELLA: Considering that there are 1,345,196 children of all classes between five and seven years of age, of whom 920,000 are on the registers of public elementary schools, I am not prepared to adopt the suggestion of the hon. Member. What ought to be done, and what I hope will be done very soon, is to follow out the recommendation of the Royal Commission on Technical Instruction, and enact that Standard V. shall be the minimum for total exemption.

EGYPT (EVENTS IN THE SOUDAN)—EXPEDITION FOR RELIEF OF GENERAL GORDON—VOTE OF CREDIT.

LORD EUSTACE CECIL asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether any Supplementary Estimate or Vote of Credit will be presented to the House, before the Prorogation, to defray the cost of any expedition that may be necessary for the relief of General Gordon and the defence of Egypt?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: The Government have arrived at no decision to present a Supplementary Estimate before the Prorogation to defray the expenses of any expedition that may be necessary for the relief of General Gordon. It is probable, however, that a Supplementary Estimate will be required in connection with expenses being incurred in preparations for the defence of Egypt; and I shall probably be able to give the noble Lord a definite answer to-morrow.

MR. W. E. FORSTER asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether he can give the House any information with regard to General Gordon's present position; whether the rewards which the Government have offered for information are now in force, or whether they lapsed in the month of June; and, whether it is true that the Nile will be at its lowest at Khartoum by the end of September, so that it will then be more difficult to send relief to General Gordon up the Nile, and also more difficult for him to leave Khartoum by the river, especially by the White Nile, than it is at present?

LOD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: I have from time to time given the House all the information in the possession of the Foreign Office in regard to General Gordon's position. The rewards have not lapsed except in the case of the messenger mentioned at page 67 of "Egypt (No. 25) 1884;" but complete discretion as to money rewards has been given to Mr. Egerton, as stated in No. 43. It is high Nile at Khartoum about the beginning of September, and this lasts about a month. The river begins to fall early in October, and is half Nile by the end of that month. Above Khartoum the Nile attains its greatest height early in September.

MR. LABOUCHERE asked the noble Lord whether steps are still being taken with a view to convey to General Gordon instructions to withdraw, if possible, from Khartoum and the Soudan without further bloodshed; and, whether steps will be taken to inform, if possible, the Mahdi that Her Majesty's Government has already recognized the independence of the Soudan, and that, as messengers have been despatched to General Gordon ordering him to withdraw from that country, he was acting contrary to those instructions if he slaughters Soudanese, unless in self-defence?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: The answer to the first part of the hon. Member's Question is in the affirmative; to the second, in the negative.

EGYPT—COLLECTION OF TAXES—USE OF TORTURE.

MR. LABOUCHERE asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether instructions have been sent to Her Majesty's Representatives in Egypt to inquire into the alleged use of torture in levying taxes from the fellahs, and to see that, if such is the present habit, it will no longer be pursued?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: If my hon. Friend will refer to the Papers on Egyptian affairs which have just been distributed, he will find from the Report of Sir Evelyn Baring, dated June 28, that he is of opinion that the use of torture by the courbash in the collection of taxes has practically ceased. Her Majesty's Government, after consulting Sir Evelyn Baring, did not consider that further instructions were necessary, as those already given are quite distinct. The use of torture and the courbash is illegal, as will be seen on reference to the Proclamation given at page 36 of "Egypt (No. 6) 1883," and since that the Penal Codes have been enacted, which put an end to any punishment except those specifically there mentioned.

CRIME AND OUTRAGE (IRELAND)—ATTACK ON THE RESIDENT MAGISTRATE, CO. SLIGO.

COLONEL KING-HARMAN asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, if he has received any information as to an attack having been made upon the Resident Magistrate for Sligo on the 13th instant?

MR. TREVELYAN: I am informed that, about 10 days ago, the Resident Magistrate, while taking a walk after dusk, was struck by a stone, which was thrown over the fence from an adjoining field. He chased and secured a man who, he believed, threw the stone, and, having demanded his name and address, he let him go. It was subsequently ascertained that the name and address given were false. Mr. Molony does not himself consider that the affair was an outrage.

MR. SEXTON: Where did this happen?

MR. TREVELYAN: While the magistrate was taking a walk along the river side near the town.

LOWER THAMES VALLEY MAIN SEWERAGE BOARD.

MR. BARRAN asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether, having regard to the importance of the sewage of the Lower Thames Valley being diverted from the river at the earliest moment, to the applications made to the Local Government Board by Heston and Isleworth, Kingston-on-Thames, and Richmond, for the severance of those places from the Lower Thames Valley Main Sewerage Board, and to the Report of the Select Committee on the Bill of this Session—

"That the continuance of the Joint Board is not only unnecessary, but operates as a hindrance to the several authorities purifying the sewage of their respective districts," he will now give facilities for the dissolution of the Joint Board and sub-division of its district as recommended by the Committee; whether those objects could be effected by a short Bill passed during the present Session; and, if he is not prepared to bring in such a Bill, what other steps does he propose to take in the matter in the interest of the public and the localities?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: The Lower Thames Valley Main Sewerage District, as I have already stated in reply to a Question of the hon. Baronet the Member for Finsbury (Sir Andrew Lusk), was constituted by a Provisional Order, which was issued by the Board after local conferences and inquiries, and was subsequently confirmed by Parliament, after very full consideration by a Select Committee. It is true that the Select Committee on the Bill of this Session recommended the dissolution of the Joint Board and the setting up of new districts. But that recommendation was made after hearing the evidence of two only out of the 11 constituent authorities, and without hearing any evidence whatever on the part of the other nine constituent authorities, or the Main Sewerage Board on the subject. The Board have received communications from Heston, and Isleworth, and Richmond as to separation from the district; but no similar application has been made by the Kingston-on-Thames Sanitary Authority since 1881. I am not in a position to dissolve the district and set up other districts without giving those interested full opportunity of making their representations on the subject at a local inquiry. I am, as I stated in reply to the Question of the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere), obtaining a Report as to whether any temporary arrangement can be made by the Local Authorities with the view of mitigating the evils stated to exist.

VISCOUNT FOLKESTONE said, he wished to say that the Select Committee heard the promoters of the scheme.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, if he was wrong on that point, he was right in stating that the Committee did not hear nine out of the 11 opponents.

VISCOUNT FOLKESTONE said, that the Committee, having heard two of the opponents, considered that they had sufficient evidence before them.

ARMY — MILITARY BARRACKS AT LONGFORD—RESIDENCE FOR THE MEDICAL OFFICER.

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether it is intended to buy or take on lease a house for the Army Medical Doctor outside the Military Barracks in Longford; and, whether there is not ample accommodation within the barracks, there being now twelve quarters unoccupied there?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: No proposal of the nature indicated in the Question has been made to the War Office; and if such a proposal had been made, careful inquiry would be made before it was sanctioned.

Sir Charles W. Dilke.

ARREARS OF RENT (IRELAND) ACT— COLONEL DIGBY, J.P.

MR. HARRINGTON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is true that Colonel Digby, J.P. Westmeath, obtained from the Land Commissioners, under the provisions of the Arrears of Rent (Ireland) Act, certain arrears of rent alleged by him to be due of a tenant of his named James Rickard; whether this James Rickard had actually parted with the interest in his tenancy to a man named James Egan, who paid to the landlord all arrears due of the holding; whether, after this payment was made, Colonel Digby received, and he and Rickard divided between them, the money thus obtained from the Land Commission; and, whether, if these allegations are well founded, he will order fresh proceedings to be taken against Colonel Digby, and take steps to secure the due hearing of the charge before a competent tribunal?

MR. TREVELYAN: I am informed that, on the joint application of the landlord and tenant, the Land Commissioners extinguished arrears of rent amounting to £5 15s., and that a sum of £2 17s. 6d. was paid to the landlord. The tenant, Rickard, alleges that Colonel Digby gave him £2 7s. 6d. of this sum—from which it would appear that he retained 10s. of it for himself—under what circumstances does not appear. I am also informed that it is a fact that Rickard sold the interest of his farm in November, 1882, to a man named Egan, and that of the price given—£40—a sum of £21 10s. was paid to Colonel Digby for rent and costs. Whether this included all arrears I cannot say. An explanation will be written for, and, on receipt of that explanation, these Reports shall be laid before the Law Officers for directions whether these Reports disclose an offence, or a case for further inquiry.

MR. HARRINGTON: Will the right hon. Gentleman communicate with the tenant Egan, who purchased the holding, and who may have valuable information to give?

MR. TREVELYAN said, there was enough information on the subject to satisfy the Law Officers.

MR. HEALY: Is it usual, when a person is charged with theft, for the Government to write to him for an explanation?

CONTAGIOUS DISEASES (ANIMALS) (IRELAND) ACT—CATTLE INSPECTOR, KILMACTHOMAS UNION.

MR. LEAMY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If the Lord Lieutenant recently refused to sanction the appointment of a gentleman to the post of Cattle Inspector to a Southern Poor Law Union, on the ground that he was not a fully qualified veterinary surgeon; and, if so, whether in future only qualified veterinary surgeons will be appointed to the post?

MR. TREVELYAN: It is presumed that this Question relates to the Kilmac-thomas Union, County Waterford, in which the Lord Lieutenant refused, in April last, to sanction the appointment of an Inspector who was not a qualified veterinary surgeon, on the ground that the Local Authority could procure the services of a duly qualified veterinary surgeon for the office. The Order in Council dealing with the subject requires that the persons appointed shall be veterinary surgeons, unless the Lord Lieutenant is satisfied that it is impossible to procure, or that for other sufficient reason it is undesirable to appoint, a person so qualified.

PRISONS (IRELAND)—THE LATE GOVERNOR OF LIMERICK PRISON—SUPERANNUATION.

MR. O'SULLIVAN asked Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland, Under what Act of Parliament had the grand jury of the county Limerick power to alter and increase the retiring allowance of the late Governor of the County Limerick Prison by thirty-three pounds ten shillings per annum over and above the amount fixed by a previous grand jury in that county?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER): Mr. Eagar, the late Governor, was appointed prior to the Prisons Act, 1877, and his position was continued under the Prisons Board till last year, when he was retired consequent on the abolition of Spike Island. The superannuation allowance is regulated by the Superannuation Act, 1859, and a Treasury Minute of 14th January, 1879, and the Prisons Act, 1877, provides for an apportionment of the allowance on the county in respect of services prior to April, 1878. The power of the Grand Jury, to make a presentment for this is retained by the Prisons Act. The portion payable by the county would have been prima facie £160 18s. per annum; but the Grand Jury, in the summer of 1883, passed a resolution that, on account of Mr. Eagar's good and long services, the allowance should be £194 15s. 6d. This was the first and only resolution passed by the Grand Jury, and it was founded on the authority I have mentioned.

POST OFFICE (IRELAND)—DAY MAIL TO CORK.

MR. LEAMY asked the Postmaster General, If he is aware that about five-sixths of the passengers from Dublin to Waterford travel via Maryburgh, and if, under the proposed agreement for the acceleration of the mails from Dublin to Cork, the Great Western mail will not stop at Maryburgh, these passengers will be compelled to travel via Carlow; whether such an arrangement will give an unfair advantage to the Great Southern and Western line over the Central Ireland Railway, which would thereby lose a large share of its present passenger traffic; and, whether he will bear this fact in mind when considering the proposed agreement?

MR. FAWCETT, in reply, said, that, in carrying out the acceleration of the day mail to Cork, Limerick, &c., it was not intended to alter the present day mail train from Dublin at 9 A.M., which would continue to stop at Maryburgh; but the new special train would not call there, a stop being unnecessary for mail purposes. He regretted that the effect of the new arrangement should be in any way unfavourable to the Waterford and Central Ireland Railway Company; but, so far as the day mail to Waterford was concerned, he saw no reason why such an improvement of the service by the present route via Carlow should not be affected as should secure as long an interval for replies by return of post as an accelerated service via Maryburgh. Inquiries on this point were being made.

INDIA—THE SALT TAX.

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY asked the Under Secretary of State for India,

Whether his attention has been drawn to an article in The Lancet, published two months ago, in which that high medical authority asserts that—

“As the diet of the Hindoo is almost entirely farinaceous and vegetable, it is a cruel injustice to impose a tax that renders a physiological necessary a high-priced luxury;”

and, whether the Government will take into account the opinion of The Lancet in arranging their future policy with regard to the Salt Tax in India?

Mr. J. K. CROSS, in reply, said, that the Government of India was fully aware of the objections which might be urged against the Salt Tax, and bore them in mind when considering its fiscal changes.

UNION RATING (IRELAND).

COLONEL COLTHURST asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is the intention of the Government to give effect to the recommendation of the Select Committee of 1871-2 with regard to Union Rating in Ireland; and, if so, whether such legislation will embrace outdoor as well as indoor relief?

Mr. TREVELYAN, in reply, said, the Government were very anxious to give effect to the recommendation referred to. The system in Ireland should be assimilated to the system in England, both with regard to indoor and outdoor relief.

JAMAICA—IMPORTATION OF COOLIES.

Mr. A. PEASE asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether, in view of the large amount of debt which the importation of Coolies has already entailed upon Jamaica, and also, in view of the despatch of Her Majesty's Secretary for the Colonies of the 29th September 1877, relieving the people of the Island from future taxation for this purpose, Her Majesty's Government have any intention of adopting the proposal of the Commissioners, that the importation of Coolies shall be renewed, and supported from the general taxation of the Island?

Mr. EVELYN ASHLEY: No decision has yet been arrived at on the proposals of the Royal Commissioners relative to Coolie immigration into Jamaica; and, indeed, it is a question on which the Government would not think it right to give any definite directions until the new Jamaican Legislative Council had an opportunity of considering it at their meeting in September next. I may point out, however, as to the terms of my hon. Friend's Question, that the importation of Coolies has never been stopped, and that, under present arrangements, the expense of hospital treatment for the Coolies is maintained from the general taxation of the island.

AFRICA (SOUTH)—BECHUANALAND.

SIR HENRY HOLLAND asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether he can give to the House any information as to the condition of affairs in Bechuanaland; and, whether he will lay upon the Table further Papers relating to that Country, before the Supplemental Estimate is considered?

Mr. EVELYN ASHLEY: Further Papers on Bechuanaland are in preparation, and will be laid on the Table before the end of the Session; but not, I fear, in time for the Supplementary Estimate. It would be impossible, within the limits of an answer to a Question, to give the general account asked for; but when the Supplementary Estimate is moved, I shall be ready to state any information we may be in possession of. Meanwhile I may say that we have received a telegram from the Governor of the Cape, in which he informs us that the following Resolution has been carried in both Houses of the Legislature of the Cape Colony—namely,

“That, in the opinion of this House, it is expedient, pending the ratification of the London Convention of 1884 by the Volksraad of the South African Republic, that the Colonial Government be authorised to open communications with the Imperial Government, with a view to submitting to Parliament, next Session, a measure for the annexation to the Cape Colony of the territory of the south-western border of the South African Republic, now under British protection—that is to say, Bechuanaland.”

SIR HENRY HOLLAND: That will include the so-called Republic of Stellaland and Gushen?

Mr. EVELYN ASHLEY: Yes; all these territories.

ARMY—LOSS OF LIFE IN EGYPT.

Mr. STANLEY LEIGHTON asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether his attention has been drawn to the following approximate estimate of loss of life in Egypt since the English occupation appears in trustworthy sources of information, to wit:—

	Number of Killed.
1882. Destruction of Alexandria (Ann. Reg. 1882, p. 368) . . .	2,000
Tel-El-Kebir (ditto, ditto) . . .	1,000
1883. Massacre of Hick's Army (ditto, 1883, p. 389) . . .	11,000
Attempt to relieve Sinkat (ditto, p. 391) . . .	760
1884. Massacre of Baker's Army (Despatch to Sir E. Baring, Blue Book, Egypt, No. 12, 1884, p. 36) . . .	2,346
El Teb (Graham's Despatch, ditto, p. 121) . . .	900
Tamasi (ditto, ditto, p. 161) . . .	2,000
Total . . .	20,000

and, whether he will submit the above statement to official inspection for correction and amplification, and lay the amended statement upon the Table of the House?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I have referred to the authorities which are quoted in the Question, and the numbers which are given in the hon. Member's statement appear to be correctly stated from these authorities. However, except in the case of Baker Pasha's force, and the Battle of El Teb, they appear to be estimates only. We have no means in the War Office of correcting or amplifying these estimates. I do not see there would be any advantage in embodying the estimates referred to in a Parliamentary Return; but it would, of course, be open to the hon. Member to make any use he thinks fit of the information which he has compiled.

SCOTLAND—THE MUSEUM OF SCIENCE AND ART, EDINBURGH.

MR. BUCHANAN asked the First Commissioner of Works, Whether, inasmuch as by the munificence of a private benefactor all difficulties as to the allocation of the space in the new wing of the Edinburgh Museum of Science and Art are obviated, he will give instructions for the work to be begun at once?

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: Yes, Sir; tenders will be invited for this building in a few days.

IRELAND—THE MUSEUM OF SCIENCE AND ART, DUBLIN.

MR. DAWSON asked the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether any further progress has been made in the selection of the design for the Science and Art Museum, Dublin, and how soon the arrangements are likely to be complete?

MR. COURTNEY, in reply, said, the hon. Member knew that the recommended design proved, on valuation, to involve an expenditure much above the prescribed limit. They had, therefore, been driven, in justice to the other competitors, to inquire into the other designs. Two of these could not be entertained under any circumstances; valuations were in progress as to the other two, which the Committee of Advisers had placed in order of merit. The Board of Works were considering what preliminary work could be done in anticipation of the final decision.

MR. DAWSON: What is the difference between the cost of the selected design and the sum which the Government is prepared to give?

MR. COURTNEY: I do not think it would be fair to state that until the other designs have been examined.

MR. DAWSON: Is not the hon. Gentleman aware that it is a matter of a very few thousand pounds?

MR. COURTNEY: No.

MR. DAWSON: Will the hon. Gentleman state what it is, if he knows it?

MR. COURTNEY: It is not fair to other competitors to state what this difference is.

MR. GRAY: Is it the fact that the competitors, whose designs are now under consideration, are Englishmen, and that the competitor whose design has been set aside is an Irishman? And more particularly, I wish to ask the hon. Gentleman, whether he hopes to be able to state the decision of the Treasury in this important matter before the House rises?

MR. COURTNEY: I have no information as to the nationalities of the competitors. I hope the examinations will be completed in time to announce them to Parliament.

MR. DAWSON: I wish to ask the hon. Gentleman, whether it is not the fact that this question, which concerns the education of the Irish people, has been, for the sake of a few thousand pounds, 16 years in contemplation, and has not yet been settled?

MR. COURTNEY: I have already told the hon. Gentleman that it is not a matter of a few thousand pounds.

MR. DAWSON: I ask, is it a fact that it has been 16 years in contemplation by the Government?

SHIP BROKERAGE (FRANCE).

MR. CHARLES PALMER asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether he will lay upon the Table of the House a Return of the Correspondence with Shipping Associations and Reports from the British Embassy at Paris, on the question of Ship Brokerage in France (in continuation of Parliamentary Paper, Commercial, No. 12, 1883)?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: There will be no objection to lay upon the Table the Correspondence to which my hon. Friend refers, and it will be at once prepared for publication.

MR. CHARLES PALMER asked, Whether the noble Lord would state that any more energetic steps would be taken to bring this matter, in which the commerce of this country took so great an interest, to a satisfactory conclusion?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: I can hardly admit that more energetic steps are necessary, because these negotiations have been carried on in Paris by Mr. Crowe with great ability. No doubt the matter is one of importance. It is now before the Secretary of State, and it may be advisable, if no satisfactory result is soon arrived at, to take some further steps.

METROPOLIS—STATE OF THE STREETS AT NIGHT.

MR. SAMUEL SMITH (for Mr. CROPPER) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been drawn to remarks made at a meeting last week of the "Central Vigilance Committee," at which His Grace the Duke of Westminster stated that the condition of certain streets of the Metropolis was "notoriously scandalous and disgraceful," for utter shameful "not to be equalled in the whole world;" that tradesmen "in some of the principal streets" live under what is really

"a Reign of Terror," and, if they took "individual . . . or isolated action," they would be in fear of being boycotted; whether the powerlessness of the police in regard to this nuisance is owing to a difference of opinion on the part of the magistrates in regard to the evidence necessary to support convictions for the offence specified in Sub-Section 11 of 2 & 3 Vict. cap. 47, sec. 54; and, whether it may not be possible to obtain a consensus of magisterial opinion on this point?

MR. PULESTON asked, whether, in view of the unfortunate state of things arising from the suspension of the main provisions of the Contagious Diseases Act, the Government would not restore those provisions, pending the introduction of the long-promised Bill on the subject?

MR. ONSLOW asked, if the right hon. Gentleman was aware of the extent to which innocent young men and innocent old men were accosted by females in the streets?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: My attention has long been directed to this subject, and I think it one of very great importance. I am glad to see, by the Question of my hon. Friend behind me (Mr. S. Smith), that he attributes a great part of the evil to the helplessness of the police in the matter. That is entirely my opinion. I believe the condition of the streets will never be made what it ought to be unless further powers are given to the police, as in Glasgow and other towns. Clauses to that effect were introduced into a Bill which passed the House of Lords, and I deeply regret that that Bill cannot pass into law this Session. It is not necessary for the Government to consider the question, because they have embodied their views in the clauses of that Bill. I am glad to see, from the Questions on the Paper, that those views will have the support of the Vigilance Committee; and, with their support, I have very little doubt that the Bill will pass into law, and will have the effect desired.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS said, the right hon. Gentleman had expressed the opinion that the police ought to have further powers. He entirely agreed with the right hon. Gentleman; and he wished to ask, whether he could not give effect to that view in a short Bill this Session?

Mr. Dawson

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he wished he could think that a short Bill would involve a short discussion on this subject. The information he had on that point hardly encouraged him in such a hope. Short Bills sometimes took a long time in passing.

MR. PULESTON said, that the right hon. Gentleman had not answered his Question, whether something could not be done in the way of restoring the suspended powers of the Acts he had referred to, so as to prevent that condition of things which arose from the withdrawal of the police?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, that the Government did not propose to do anything of the kind referred to. They considered that the police in towns had ample powers, which they might put into operation if they chose so to do.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR asked whether the right hon. Gentleman was aware that there were several large establishments in which the girls employed slept on the premises five nights in the week, but were not allowed to do so on Saturday and Sunday nights?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he had no cognizance of that.

MR. SAMUEL SMITH asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been called to the following extracts from a speech made by the Right honourable the Earl of Shaftesbury, at the Annual Meeting of the "Central Vigilance Committee" at Willis's Rooms on July 16th 1884:—

"There are hundreds and thousands of poor girls, as honest, good girls as ever lived, engaged in their daily occupations in London at a distance from their homes. Often, in the winter season, especially, they have to return home after dark, and they are exposed to every form of temptation. Unless you could hear from their own lips, as far as they dare communicate it to you, what they see or hear, it would seem almost too monstrous to believe. A gentleman called upon me the other day who had been in Regent Street. He said he was at the head of a very large firm, and he had in his establishment from 200 to 300 married women and young single women. He said, 'I am obliged constantly to go as far as I can with these women when they leave their work to see them safe beyond a certain point, because there are people waiting in the neighbourhood for the purpose of alluring them away, and perhaps indulging their horrid inconceivable taste by pouring the most filthy wickedness into the ears of these young girls.' That is the case with reference to one large establishment, and I have heard it with regard to others. If you want to correct the evil you must go to this male solicitation, as well as female solicitation (applause). You must create a strong public opinion, which will prevent the evil practices of these men, many of whom are in a decent position in society, and have ample means. You must prevent these men going out night by night as they do, indulging their beastly proclivities, and corrupting and dishonouring society to the utmost extent possible. You must know that circumstances have very much altered now in respect to the work of these young women, who, as I say, have to work some two or three miles away from their homes. A short time ago the hours of labour were very much limited, in some of the workshops, and they managed to get home in decent time, but now, by the permission of the Secretary of State, with the view to the relief of certain trades, the hours of labour are so prolonged that many of these poor girls cannot leave their workshops until nine or ten o'clock at night. Then they have perhaps three or four miles to go from their work to their homes. What they say is, 'so long as we can keep together we are tolerably safe, but the time comes when we must separate to go in different directions to our homes, and that is the time when we are exposed to these annoyances, too dreadful to describe.' That is the state of things in our streets;"

and, whether he is prepared to consider, during the recess, some remedy for this deplorable state of things?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he thought he had substantially answered the Question already.

ARMY—MARRIED SOLDIERS' QUARTERS AT WOOLWICH.

BARON HENRY DE WORMS asked the Secretary of State for War, with reference to his statement that the overcrowding of the married soldiers' quarters in the Cambridge Cottages at Woolwich would at once be remedied, Whether it is the fact that, although negotiations have taken place for renting sixteen houses, in order to afford proper accommodation for the married soldiers, no result has been arrived at, and the overcrowding still continues, causing much inconvenience and danger to the health of the troops and of the inhabitants of the adjacent districts?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Authority has been given to the General Officer Commanding at Woolwich to hire cottages for the purpose of relieving the married soldiers' quarters; but it is necessary that the sanitary conditions of the cottages should be carefully examined before they are actually taken over. This inspection, and the consequent repairs, will be pushed on as rapidly as possible.

POST OFFICE—THE TELEPHONE COMPANIES.

Mr. JACOB BRIGHT asked the Postmaster General, When he will be able to return an answer to the Telephone Companies in regard to matters in discussion between them and the Post Office Department?

Mr. FAWCETT: The United Telephone Company and its affiliated Companies have submitted to me three different proposals, the consideration of which involves many complicated and difficult details; and I am sure it is of great importance that these proposals should be carefully considered in all their bearings. I have personally devoted all the time to their investigation I could spare, but have not yet been able to complete it. I may add that from four other licensed Companies I have not received any statement; but I have informed them that if they do not at once furnish me with one, I must decide without having their views before me. Although I cannot fix the precise day, I can but repeat the promise that there shall be no unnecessary delay; and I can assure my hon. Friend (Mr. Jacob Bright) that no one can be more anxious than I am that the question should be speedily settled.

Mr. GRAY asked whether the right hon. Gentleman expected that his decision would be pronounced before the Post Office Estimates were taken?

Mr. FAWCETT said, he should do everything he could to speedily arrive at a decision; but he felt that the interest not only of the Post Office and the public, but of the Telephone Companies themselves, required that that decision should not be a hasty one; and, therefore, he should not like to give the hon. Member a pledge.

Mr. GRAY said, that on Monday he would address a Question on the subject to the Prime Minister. He would ask whether the right hon. Gentleman was aware that a question was in dispute as to the respective rights of this House and of a Government Department to override the House's decision?

POST OFFICE (IRELAND)—THE MAILS IN CAVAN.

Mr. BIGGAR asked the Postmaster General, Is it a fact that in the town of Cavan the mail closes at six o'clock in the evening, although the train which carries it on does not start from Clones, twelve miles distant, until fifteen minutes past nine p.m. in consequence of the bags from Cavan being now sent, as they were a century ago, by a one-horse car taking two and a-half hours to make the journey, although there is direct communication between both towns by rail which could be accomplished in twenty minutes; is it also a fact that by this arrangement the towns of Arva, Killeshandra, Ballynagh, and Carrigallen have to post their evening letters in the middle of the day, from three to half-past three o'clock p.m., several other minor offices in the district being also equally inconvenienced; whether, within the past two years, the Town Commissioners of Cavan, and representative meetings of merchants, traders, bankers, and other inhabitants of the different towns mentioned, have not by memorials pointed out this great grievance more than once to him, and requested a remedy; his reply being, in one case, that the Railway Company for this short journey claimed an exorbitant price; and in the other, that the matter "would have attention;" whether it is not a fact that a train arrives from Dublin and the west at eight p.m. each evening, by which passengers cannot proceed further because of the breach in the service at this point; and, whether it is in the power of the Government to compel the Great Northern Railway Company to supply this great public service by running a train from Cavan at a quarter-past eight p.m., for mails and passengers, at a reasonable price, in connection with the arrival of the Midland Great Western train each evening, there being no difficulty in arranging for the return morning service, a train being already running, which, by a slight attention to time, can be utilized for this purpose?

Mr. FAWCETT: It is the fact that the night mail between Cavan and Clones is conveyed by cars, there being no existing trains at hours suitable for the mail service. I will have further inquiry made as to the possibility of coming to some arrangement with the Railway Company; but unless the trains could be utilized for ordinary traffic I fear the cost of running them specially for the mails would be greater than the correspondence for the district affected would warrant.

POST OFFICE (IRELAND)—THE LETTER CARRIER BETWEEN BALLYCONNELL AND DERRYLIN.

MR. BIGGAR asked the Postmaster General, Whether it is a fact that a few months ago a person named M'Mullen, who acted as letter-carrier between Ballyconnell and Derrylin, committed several breaches of trust in opening letters containing cheques, coin, etc.; whether, since M'Mullen absconded, a person named M'Garvey has for three months performed the duties; whether there was any cause of complaint against M'Garvey; and, whether it is now proposed to give the appointment to a brother of the former employee M'Mullen?

MR. FAWCETT: In reply to the hon. Member's Question, I beg to say that George M'Mullen, the postman referred to, was employed under an allowance to the sub-postmaster of Ballyconnell to provide for the work, and that his services were dispensed with in consequence of his not performing it satisfactorily. The suspicion which had previously fallen on M'Mullen of tampering with letters was not the cause of his losing his situation. M'Garvey has been employed by the sub-postmaster as a temporary arrangement only, pending the appointment of a permanent postman in M'Mullen's place. William M'Mullen, who has been nominated and who is about to be appointed, was strongly recommended. So far as I am able to ascertain he bears a very good character, and I do not think that the fact of his brother's performing his work unsatisfactorily ought to stand in his way.

In reply to a further Question from Mr. BIGGAR,

MR. FAWCETT said, he did not know whether the two brothers had lived in the same house; but, in consequence of the misconduct of one brother, he made special inquiries as to the conduct of the younger brother, and people in the neighbourhood informed him there was nothing whatever against his conduct.

ARMY (AUXILIARY FORCES)—MILITIA OFFICERS.

SIR FREDERICK MILNER asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether it is a fact that there are 792 vacancies for Officers in the Militia, and that some Regiments want more than half their establishment of Officers; and, whether, under these circumstances, the rule will be enforced by which Officers are retired under the age clause, particularly in Regiments where the forced retirement of Officers would cause another vacancy?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: The actual vacancies for officers of Militia amount to 795; and in 11 regiments the vacancies amount to half the number of officers. As regards the forced retirement of Militia officers, I can only repeat the answer I gave on the 16th June to the hon. Member for Clare (Mr. O'Shea)—

"Under the Regulations now in force lieutenant-colonels retire at 55, majors and captains at 50 years of age; but in all cases officers are permitted, on the recommendation of the General Officer commanding, to serve five years longer. Having regard to the efficiency of the service and the maintenance of a fair flow of promotion, it would not, in my opinion, be desirable to suspend these Regulations."

I am not aware of any present reason for changing the opinion I then expressed. This serious deficiency is, however, under the consideration of the Department, with a view to the suggestion of some remedy if possible.

SIR FREDERICK MILNER asked whether it was worth while to spend so much money on the Militia if they were not to be maintained in an efficient state?

LAW AND POLICE—ARMED BURGLARS.

SIR FREDERICK MILNER asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether, in view of the dastardly outrages recently committed by armed burglars, he will consider the advisability of immediately introducing a short Bill, giving the Judges power, on conviction, in all cases where weapons, dangerous or destructive to human life have been used, or, (if thought advisable) where they have been found on the person of the burglar, to order flogging, in addition to the punishment already provided; and, whether the punishment of flogging has been found to have a most salutary and deterrent effect, in cases of garotting and robbery with violence?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: Sir, this is a matter which has often been considered, and a great deal is to be said on both sides; but I would rather not commit myself to an opinion in the negative. Certainly, the last time when it was proposed to extend to various offences the punishment of flogging, the opinion of Parliament was decidedly adverse.

GIBRALTAR AND SPAIN—EXPULSION OF SPANISH SUBJECTS.

MR. WODEHOUSE asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether the statement reported to have been made by the Spanish Home Minister, in the Spanish Senate, that 5,000 Spaniards had been expelled from Gibraltar in retaliation for the measures adopted by the Spanish Government to prevent an invasion of cholera, is correct?

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY: No, Sir; the action taken by the Gibraltar Government was in nowise one of retaliation, but one of necessity. There would have been, and is, no objection to admit the Spaniards as usual, did the Spanish Government allow them to return each night to Lines. This, however, the Spanish officials will not allow. They have, therefore, been kept out, as, if once admitted, they would not be allowed to return to Spanish territory, and the Government of Gibraltar would be compelled to lodge, feed, and employ these aliens, and in the event of a visitation of cholera would find the city, which is already crowded, saddled with the addition of thousands of Spanish subjects.

LAW AND JUSTICE (ENGLAND AND WALES)—ISLE OF WIGHT PETTY SESSIONS.

MR. ARNOLD MORLEY (for Mr. SEELY) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been called to a paragraph in the Hampshire Independent of the 16th instant, which states that, on the preceding Saturday, the whole business of the Isle of Wight Petty Sessions was brought to a standstill, and great inconvenience thereby sustained by the refusal of two magistrates to take their seats on the Bench, although they were within the building at the time; and, whether, if this allegation is true, he will, either himself or through the Lord Chancellor, convey to these gentlemen his disapproval of their conduct?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: Before I take any official action, I should have more authentic information of the matter than is contained in a newspaper paragraph. When the circumstances are brought before me, then I shall see what should be done.

EGYPT—THE CONFERENCE.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF asked the Prime Minister, Whether the labours of the Conference had arrived at such a point that he could inform the House whether application was likely to be made to Parliament to sanction any official arrangement?

MR. GLADSTONE: No, Sir; I cannot give any information at present. The Conference met to-day, and meets again on Monday. I cannot say positively, but I am not without hope, that after that meeting on Monday I may be able to give more definite information on the subject.

ABYSSINIA—THE TREATY.

MR. M'COAN said, he wished to ask a Question as to the non-appearance of the Abyssinian Treaty. The other documents were published that morning, but the actual Treaty was not. When would it appear?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE, in reply, said, he believed that Paper would be distributed in the course of the day.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (IRELAND)—MR. J. D. ELLIOTT, RATE COLLECTOR FOR THE BLACKROCK TOWNSHIP COMMISSIONERS.

MR. SEXTON: I wish to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, in reference to the debate which took place in Committee of Supply on Tuesday evening, during which certain pledges were given by the right hon. Gentleman, If he can now inform the House whether the Local Government Board have arrived at any decision; and, if so, what decision, as to the further employment of Rate Collector Elliott?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, the following letter has been received by the Under Secretary from the Blackrock Town Commissioners:—

“Blackrock Township, Secretary’s Office, Town Hall, Blackrock, July 23, 1884.—Sir,—In reply to your letter of the 13th ultimo, I am directed by the Commissioners of Blackrock to state, for the information of His Excellency the Lord Lieutenant, that the reason which led the Commissioners to realize the securities given by Mr. Elliott at the time of his appointment was as follows:—Finding the rates much in arrear, the Commissioners called on Mr. Elliott for an explanation. He at once informed them that relying upon the practice which had existed ever since Blackrock became a township—namely, that a period of two years was allowed to the collector for the collection of the rates, he had retained in his hands money belonging to the Commissioners which he had collected and was then unable to pay them in cash. He made a full disclosure of the sums so retained, and handed over to the Commissioners house property, which they have reason to believe will, together with the securities referred to, cover the amount, and they obtained from him additional securities to replace those realized, and to provide for his punctuality in future. I am directed to add that the Commissioners have, of course, altered this vicious system of collection which led to these irregularities.—I have the honour to be, Sir, your obedient servant, J. M. PORTER, Secretary. To the Right Hon. G. O. Trevelyan, M.P., Chief Secretary for Ireland.”

The Irish Government and the Local Government Board have no doubt whatever that Mr. Elliott ought to be removed from his office. This can be done at once by issuing a Sealed Order, under the 33rd section of the 1 & 2 Vict., c. 56; but the Board of Guardians might complain of such a mode of dealing with one of their officers without communicating first with them. The Board of Guardians will accordingly be requested at their next meeting to call upon Elliott to resign, and to inform him that the Local Government Board has determined not to allow him to retain a position of trust in the Poor Law, and that they will be prepared, under the section above referred to, to remove him if he does not resign. I am sorry to make what would otherwise be a premature statement; but considering that the Blackrock Town Commissioners have practically refrained from answering our letter from the 13th June to the 23rd July, and then only did it under pressure, I should hardly be justified in taking any other course, and therefore

I think Parliament is entitled to hear, at the earliest moment, our decision.

MUNICIPAL ELECTIONS (CORRUPT AND ILLEGAL PRACTICES)

BILL.

MR. GLADSTONE: I wish to state, for the convenience of the House, that we are desirous of going forward with the Municipal Elections (Corrupt and Illegal Practices) Bill; and I shall therefore ask the House to go out of Committee soon after half-past 11 this evening.

MR. GRAY: I beg to ask the right hon. Gentleman, whether it is still intended to proceed with the Medical Act Amendment Bill?

MR. GLADSTONE: I hope to be able to state that to-morrow.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: The Bill is down for Monday.

MR. GLADSTONE: Yes; but I hope to be able to state the intentions of the Government regarding it to-morrow.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

ULSTER CANAL AND TYRONE NAVIGATION BILL.—[BILL 244.]

(Mr. Courtney, Mr. Herbert Gladstone.)

BILL REFERRED TO SELECT COMMITTEE.

MR. COURTNEY said, he had to inform the House that he had two alterations to make in reference to this Bill. The first was simply a Resolution, authorizing the insertion of money clauses. That was a matter of course. The other matter was—it had been found that the Bill must be referred to a mixed Committee—three Members to be nominated by the House, and two by the Committee of Selection. He should, therefore, propose to discharge the Order for Committee on next Monday, and move that it be referred to this Hybrid Committee. It would not prejudice the important provision asked for by the hon. Member for Monaghan (MR. HEALY)—prohibiting the sale of the Canal to any Railway Company—as to which he hoped to be able to arrange satisfactorily.

MR. HEALY asked if the hon. Gentleman would give any assurance as to who the Members of the Committee would be, or would this proposal in any way withdraw from the House the power of Amendment?

Mr. COURTNEY, in reply, said, that when the Bill had been reported from the Committee it would be competent for the House to recommit it. As the number of the Committee was so small, no assurance could be given as to who the Members would be.

Order for Committee upon Monday next read, and discharged.

Bill referred to a Select Committee of Five Members, Three to be nominated by the House and Two by the Committee of Selection.

Ordered, That all Petitions against the Bill presented two clear days before the meeting of the Committee be referred to the Committee; that the Petitioners praying to be heard by themselves, their Counsel, or Agents, be heard against the Bill, and Counsel heard in support of the Bill:—Power to send for persons, papers, and records; Three to be the quorum.

SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES.

SUPPLY—considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

CLASS III.—LAW AND JUSTICE.

(1.) £105,764, to complete the sum for Criminal Prosecutions, Sheriffs' Expenses, &c.

Mr. WEST said, he wished to call attention to a matter which properly arose under this Vote. In the first place, he thought there ought to be a diminution in the amount of the Vote, seeing that there had been a considerable diminution of crime in the country during the last few years; and he thought, if certain steps were taken, which he intended to point out, the amount of the Vote might be still further reduced. The Committee would be aware that, in accordance with the recent decision which they had come to among themselves, the Judges now thought it their duty, when on Circuit, to deliver the gaols of all the Sessions' prisoners who might be in prison at the time they went on Circuit. The operation of that rule had, no doubt, very considerably increased the expense to which the country was put in connection with criminal prosecutions; and he would ask his hon. Friend the Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Courtney) to state, if he was able to do so, what the difference was in the average charge of cases tried at the Assizes as compared with those tried at Sessions. The way in which the new rule operated was this. When a Judge went into an Assize town—and he might mention Manchester, because, as hon. Members knew, he was connected with the administration of justice in that city, and, therefore, was acquainted with what occurred there, although he had no doubt that the same thing occurred in other towns—when a Judge went into Manchester, whether the number of prisoners in gaol was large or small, he had to try them all, and the practice involved a considerably increased charge under the present rule, although he was not aware what the actual increase of expense was. His opinion, however, was that the cost of the trial of prisoners at Assizes was almost double the cost of trial at Sessions. It was obvious that it must be so. The Assize fees were heavier than those at Sessions, and the witnesses, both for and against the prisoners, were engaged for a much longer time. There was another matter which he thought deserved the attention of the Committee, and it was this—even the innovation to which he objected did not involve alone an increased expense to the Imperial Exchequer, but it also inflicted a very great hardship upon prisoners. He would give, as an illustration, a case which occurred the other day, and which happened over and over again. By the practice which the Judges adopted of trying all these prisoners at the Assizes, accompanied by the power they possessed of trying them at a central station, prisoners were frequently taken from very long distances to the Assize towns, and it was often very difficult for them to bring up their witnesses. The other day, under this arrangement, a prisoner was sent from Barrow-in-Furness all the way to Manchester to be tried. It appeared to him (Mr. West) that it was a very great hardship upon the prisoner, even if he were guilty—for he was only a boy, and sentenced to a few days' imprisonment—to be tried in another and a distinct Division of the county of Lancaster, after having been sent, on a charge of committing some trifling offence, all the way from Barrow-in-Furness to Manchester, a distance of more than 70 miles. If he wished to call witnesses, how could he bring them up, when they might have to remain in Manchester for a week or 10 days before the trial came off? These were difficult-ties which arose from the new practice which had been adopted by the Judges. He was not complaining of the Judges at all, nor would he say that, under the present system of administering the law, they were not right in what they did. But the evil of which he complained was a great one; and he could not help thinking that the Government and the House of Commons ought to look into the matter, and devise some remedy for a state of things that ought not to be allowed to continue. The gentlemen serving upon the jury were also complaining of the fact that the duty of trying such offences was thrown upon them; and that was not all. The Judges themselves who had adopted this new practice were frequently found making public declarations that a great hardship was thrown upon them when they were called upon to try such cases. He, therefore, could not help thinking that some remedy ought to be considered and, if possible, adopted; for, as the matter went on, it would become more and more important. It was known that the Judges had lately entered into a bargain with the Treasury as to the scale upon which they were to be paid their Circuit expenses. What that bargain was he did not know; but he hoped to hear something about it in the discussion of the present Vote. If the newspapers were right, the public were given to understand that the expenses of the Judges during the time they were on Circuit were to be paid by the day. He was afraid that the tendency of that arrangement would be to throw a good deal of unnecessary work upon the Judges. He was not prepared to say that the Chairmen of Court of Quarter Sessions or the Recorders would shirk their own part of the duty; but where there were a body of men paid for the discharge of certain duties, and another body either not paid at all, or at a very diminished rate, somehow or other the paid body very generally got a larger share of the work than the unpaid body. Whether that would be the result in this case he was unable to say; but such a scheme would tend towards an increase of the duties of the Judges; and on the part of the Chairmen of the Courts of Quarter Sessions and the Recorders there would be no disposition to allow the Judges to do a little more of the work, so that those who were not quite so well paid for it might do a little less. He hoped his hon. Friend the Secretary to the Treasury would be able to tell the Committee what was the difference in the average cost of trying cases at the Sessions and at the Assizes. He further trusted that his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General (Sir Henry James) would be able to hold out some hope that a remedy would be applied to this undoubted evil, both in regard to the juries, the public, and the Judges themselves.

MR. COURTNEY said, he would leave it to his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General to reply to the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. West) upon the legal aspect of the case, while he himself (Mr. Courtney) would only deal with the financial part of it; and he was afraid that, even upon that point, he was able to give his hon. and learned Friend very little information. The present system had only been in operation for little more than a-year; and, consequently, there was not much experience to go upon. Further experience, therefore, was needed, in order to ascertain how it would work. The only way in which the financial effect could be ascertained would be by comparison with the relative number of prisoners tried at the Sessions and at the Assizes, and then comparing the average cost at the Sessions with what the cost of trying prisoners at the Assizes was, together with the length of the sittings.

MR. WEST said, he did not wish to trouble his hon. Friend with the average expense; but what he would like to get at was the difference between the cost of trials at the Sessions and at the Assizes.

MR. COURTNEY said, he was afraid he was not in possession of the figures which his hon. Friend asked for. The actual cost of trials might depend very much upon various circumstances. For instance, there was the case, to which his hon. Friend had referred, in which a prisoner had been sent from Barrow-in-Furness for trial in Manchester. It was a very difficult matter to ascertain the cost of a trial, seeing that a prisoner might be detained at the Assizes for a much longer time before his trial came on than he would be at the Sessions. He would endeavour to ascertain whether any calculation of this kind could be made.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he could only state, in reference to the legal portion of the matter, that, as far as he was personally concerned, he was in favour of remitting the trial of all smaller classes of offences to the Court of Quarter Sessions. He saw no reason why they should not be tried there, instead of being sent to the Assizes. It was most important, not only in regard to the expense, but in consideration of the other important functions the Judges had to perform, that their time should not be unnecessarily wasted in the trial of trivial offences on Circuit. At present there were four Assizes, instead of the two they had formerly; and if the trials at the Court of Quarter Sessions took place immediately before the trials at the Assizes, the duties of the Judges might be relieved. If that were not so, prisoners might be left over for trial for a considerable period.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS said, he thought the suggestion was worth consideration whether, if there were four Assizes in the year, as he hoped there always would be now, the holding of the Quarter Sessions just before the Assizes might not be important in order to prevent what was little short of a scandal under the present arrangement? No doubt, it would be improper for the Judges to leave prisoners in gaol awaiting trial for a long period; and at present it was necessary, as a matter of law, that the Judges should effect an entire clearance of the gaols as far as possible; but if the Sessions were going to be held very shortly after the Assizes, would it be absolutely necessary, as it was under the present terms of the Commission, to effect an entire delivery of prisoners from the gaols? Was it not possible to alter the terms of the Commission, and thus get rid of the evil?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, it was a moot point whether it was absolutely necessary or not that the Judges should effect an entire clearance of the gaols. He thought that the Judges had come to the conclusion that it was not absolutely essential; but the practice had been to deliver the gaols, and leave no prisoner awaiting trial.

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT said, that if that were the opinion of the hon.

and learned Gentleman the Attorney General (Sir Henry James), he would call his attention to what happened at the Spring Assizes at Lewes this year. A certain learned Judge went down to deliver the gaols at the Assizes, and prisoners were sent to be tried both from East Sussex and West Sussex. But what happened? The Judge got through a certain portion of his work, and he then stated that he had to go somewhere else, and all the prisoners who were untried had to be taken back to gaol without trial—a thing unheard of before. From his neighbourhood all the prisoners were sent to Lewes, and the witnesses had, of course, all to attend there; and the cases ought, therefore, to have been disposed of at once. He did not blame the learned Judge, because he had no doubt that he was obliged to go somewhere else; but the fact remained that the gaols were not delivered, the cases were not tried, and the prisoners had to be taken back to Lewes again some one or two months later. He thought it a circumstance which ought not to have happened; and, therefore, he had called attention to it.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir FARRER HERSCHELL) said, he entirely agreed with his hon. and gallant Friend opposite (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) that it was most undesirable—and he might even use a stronger expression than that—that the trial of prisoners should have been delayed in the manner described. He hoped the recent arrangements would prevent such an occurrence in future. The new arrangement prescribed that if there happened to be more work in a particular town than was expected, or more than the Judge could satisfactorily get through in the time fixed for holding the Assizes, another Judge should be sent down to his assistance from London in order to secure that the whole of the work should be got through.

MR. H. H. FOWLER said, the recent arrangement, as they were told by the hon. and learned Attorney General (Sir Henry James), did not touch the grievances of the Judge's time being occupied in trying Court of Quarter Session cases. A scandal occurred at Wolverhampton some years ago in consequence of a Judge considering it his duty to clear the gaols. In some of the cases the parties were not ready to proceed with the prosecution; and, therefore, the Judge discharged all the prisoners, and let them loose upon society. He had in his possession a letter from the late Lord Chief Justice Cockburn, in which that learned Judge stated that in his opinion, when prisoners were sent for trial to the Court of Quarter Session, it was not the duty of the Judge of Assize to deliver the gaols. The remedy he (Mr. H. H. Fowler) would suggest was that the prisoners committed for trial to Quarter Sessions should only be tried at Quarter Sessions, and that it should not be imperative on the Judges to interfere in any way whatever. He would ask whether the Commission could not be altered so as to set the question at rest? The Commission was altered once, and altered so as to remove the difficulty; but, subsequently, on account of some difference of opinion among the Judges, it was altered back again to the old form, thus bringing about the same difficulty and expense.

MR. WEST said, that the difficulty just alluded to by his hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. H. H. Fowler) reminded him (Mr. West) that before the Judicature Act was passed the Commission issued for the county of Lancaster was in a different form from that issued for the other counties in the country. It was issued in such form that the Judges were not required to deliver the gaols. He might call to the attention of his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General a circumstance which had happened within his own knowledge. Within the last year an Assize had been put off because the Sessions had been fixed for two days after the date proposed for the Assizes; and if the Assizes had been held on the proposed day, the Judges would have had to have tried all the Sessions' prisoners.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR asked for information in reference to the examination of the accounts under this Vote before the Comptroller and Accountant General.

MR. COURTNEY said, it was impossible for the Treasury to enter into a detailed examination of the accounts which were sent in by the local authorities, when payment of the expenses actually incurred was ordered.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR said, he knew that perfectly well; but he wanted to know how the various charges in the accounts were examined, and by whom?

MR. COURTNEY said, he could only state that the gross amount paid over to the local authorities would be about £150,000.

Vote agreed to.

(2.) £289,822, to complete the sum for the Supreme Court of Judicature..

MR. ARTHUR ARNOLD said, that he was himself in full sympathy with the proposal for continuous sittings, and he also agreed with the doctrine laid down by Jeremy Bentham—and he was glad to see a strong disciple of Bentham on the Treasury Bench in the person of his hon. Friend the Financial Secretary (Mr. Courtney)—that a law tax—that was an undue cost of law—was the worst of all forms of taxation. He did not propose to move the Amendment for the reduction of this Vote which stood in his name; but he would now address himself to a statement recently made by the Lord Chancellor in reply to a deputation from the county of Lancaster. The Lord Chancellor, referring to the Chancery Court of the Duchy of Lancaster, expressed an opinion that it might be possible to constitute that Court a portion of the Supreme Court of Judicature; but that a material element in the case would be the disposition, on the part of the locality, to find the necessary funds. A Return moved for last year had been produced, showing the surplus fees of the Palatine Court; and he would ask his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General (Sir Henry James) whether he could say what the position of the public in the county of Lancaster was in regard to the surplus fees, which amounted to about £80,000? The Lord Chancellor, in reference to the Supreme Court, said that the matter was going to be made clear by a new Order as to the process of trying Admiralty and Chancery cases on the spot. He wished to know if the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General or the Attorney General could give any explanation of that new Order, and what would be the arrangements after it was issued in reference to the Assizes held at Manchester and Liverpool, because the Lord Chancellor did not make it clear whether, in the event of the business not being completed, for instance, at Manchester, the Judge would return from Liverpool to Manchester in order to deal with the unfinished business. He understood that morning that the Judge now sitting at Manchester had ordered a delay of the Commission for Liverpool, until he had completed the business at Manchester. He thought that was a perfectly fair arrangement, and he had no question to put in regard to it; but he hoped the hon. and learned Solicitor General would be able to give some information on the other point.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir FARRER HERSCHELL) said, he was unable to state what form the Order would take. He knew, however, that it was proposed to provide for the hearing, both at Manchester and Liverpool, of Chancery cases that were entered for trial locally, and the Judges would go to Manchester and Liverpool to try Chancery cases at certain stated times. With regard to Admiralty cases, they often involved a great deal of expense; and it was frequently found that the arrangements that were found suitable for the hearing of Chancery cases were not at all suitable for the hearing of Admiralty cases, inasmuch as it was desirable to fix a day for the latter cases, when it was possible to get the witnesses to attend. There would always be a difficulty, therefore, in sending anyone down to try Admiralty cases locally; and he was unable to say how it was proposed to deal with them; but, as regarded Chancery cases, it was proposed that the Judges should go both to Manchester and Liverpool in order to try them in those cities.

SIR HENRY HOLLAND said, he wished to call the attention of the Committee to the Writ Department of the Central Office of the Supreme Court. Last year a complaint was made by the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands) that the number of clerks in this Department was too large, and the expense too great, for the work that had to be done; and he (Sir Henry Holland) was disposed to concur in that view. It was then stated, in reply, that new arrangements were to be made, which would tend to reduce the Staff, at all events, the expense of the Department. But he observed that the contrary was the case; for, in the present Estimate, there was an increase of £494 in respect of the first and second class clerks, and, admitting the decrease of £200 in respect of the third class clerks, there still remained an increase of £294 in lieu of the promised decrease. He desired to know the reason of this increase; and whether it was probable that the new arrangements would soon lead to a decrease? He desired to put another question to the Government in respect of this Vote. It was stated last year, during a discussion, that the reason why the arrears in the Chancery Division of the Supreme Court were so much larger than in the Common Law Division was that the business was greater because the scale of costs in the Chancery Division was 30 per cent higher than in the Common Law Divisions, but that new rules were being made, or to be made, to equalize the scale of fees in all the Divisions. He wanted to know whether such rules had been made; and whether, if they had been made, they had been sufficiently long in operation to enable the Government to judge whether the effect of them has been to equalize the business and arrears in the Chancery and Common Law Divisions?

MR. R. T. REID said, he would suggest that Probate and Divorce cases, as well as Chancery and Admiralty cases, might be tried in Lancashire, and also in other centres throughout the country. It was notorious to those who were familiar with the practice of the Probate and Divorce Court that the expenses were very heavy, and that a great part of them were incurred by reason of the large number of witnesses who were brought up to London and kept in attendance for a long time. If they were about to send Judges to such centres as Lancashire, to try Chancery and Admiralty cases, he did not see why they should not extend the jurisdiction to other classes of cases. If it was desirable to try Chancery and Admiralty cases at Manchester and Liverpool, there was no reason why Probate and Divorce cases might not also be tried, and the expense of sending witnesses to London saved; nor did he see why the number of centres should not be increased, and, for example, jurisdiction given to try cases at Bristol, Plymouth, and York. It seemed to him that a considerable amount of economy might be produced by increasing the number of centres they now had.

MR. GREGORY said, that in regard to the question raised by the hon. Member for Salford (Mr. Arthur Arnold), he was in favour of trying cases on the spot, and of allowing the Judges to sit until all the cases were disposed of, making provision that, as far as possible, they should be tried locally; but, although that applied to Chancery as well as Common Law cases, there was very considerable doubt whether Admiralty cases should not be exempted from the general rule of trying cases locally. Admiralty cases required a special jurisdiction. There were very few Judges who were qualified to try Admiralty cases, and there were only a limited number of the members of the Bar who were qualified to conduct them. They required a special training, and a special knowledge. Therefore, he thought the Admiralty jurisdiction would form an exemption to the general rule, although he admitted that facilities should be given for trying Chancery cases locally. He had not risen, however, to make a comment upon that question, but upon the more general one which was involved in the present Vote. The Vote itself was one of very considerable magnitude and of great importance; and what he wished to call the attention of the Committee to was the very large contributions to the Vote which were received from the suitors. He thought the Committee were hardly aware of how much of the expense fell upon the suitors. It would be found that the total Vote amounted to £492,000; and if hon. Members would look at the foot-note they would find that no less a sum than £409,000 was contributed by suitors towards that expenditure; so that, practically, the suitors provided nearly the whole of the expenditure they were now dealing with. He confessed that he was one of those who very much agreed with the principle that the administration of justice was a matter of common right to which everyone was entitled; and it was hard enough for a man to come into Court to defend his rights, without being subjected to a heavy pecuniary fine. A suitor, in many instances, was not only fighting his own cause, but was very frequently engaged in getting a general principle of law laid down and in settling a case for the public advantage. He was afraid it was a little too late to alter the principle which guided the general administration of the country now, because for many years past the suitors had been dealt with in a different way; but, at all events, he had a right to ask, on behalf of the suitors, that they should not be subjected to any further burdens. He called attention to this question because, very recently, a very considerable imposition had been put upon the suitors in the shape of the increased fees they were required to pay. He did not wish to trouble the Committee with details of the figures. A Return had been laid upon the Table of the House, and from that Return it would be seen that it amounted to something like £30,000 or £40,000 a-year. It was provided, under the new Rules, that when any discovery was required, or any interrogatories made, the parties requiring the information should be bound to deposit £5 for costs. He had protested against the Rule on more than one occasion. No doubt, it was all very well to limit interrogatories or frivolous applications; but he thought that might be done if proper attention were paid to the nature of them, and he did not think that the imposition of a heavy fine upon the suitor was the proper way of limiting such applications. It was found that for every £5 deposited there was an average expenditure of £2 15s. for paying in the amount and obtaining a payment of it out of Court; so that every suitor who deposited £5 for a discovery or an interrogatory, had to pay £50 per cent of that amount for the information he required. He trusted that some alteration would be made, so that the practice might be got rid of altogether. He had reason to think that it was altogether unnecessary. With regard to the alteration of the fees generally by the Commission appointed to revise them, their principle with respect to these fees had been to place all of them upon what was called the higher scale. There were formerly two scales of fees, according to the amount involved—one in regard to claims under £1,000, and the other to claims above that amount. But recently, under the new Rules, all these fees had been levelled up, and all of them assessed upon the higher scale. That, however, was not all, because fees ad valorem were levied on sales under this Court; and any property sold, purchased, or mortgaged under an Order of the Court became subject to a new imposition of this nature. He hoped these matters would receive attention and correction, and he protested most earnestly against any additional fees being thrown upon the suitors. He thought they were already sufficiently heavily taxed for the administration of justice. No doubt, the Judges' salaries were thrown upon the Consolidated Fund, and the suitors were not called upon to pay for their services; but, as the question now stood, all the rest of the cost was thrown upon the suitors. It was an unduly heavy tax upon the administration of justice, which was a common interest, and ought to be borne in some measure by the community at large. He did not see why the accumulations of the fees contributed by suitors might not be made use of in cheapening the cost of the administration of justice, and he hoped to have some assurance from the Law Officers of the Crown that the matter would receive attention. He saw no reason why the accumulated fund should not be permitted to be used for the benefit of suitors in the Court, which would put an end to a considerable amount of that taxation which, at the present moment, was found to be extremely onerous.

MR. H. H. FOWLER said, he would not attempt to follow his hon. Friend the Member for Salford (Mr. Arthur Arnold) in discussing whether Jeremy Bentham was right or wrong in regard to imposing the cost of justice upon the country. A good deal had happened since Bentham wrote upon that question, and he did not think the Committee would be prepared to accept Bentham's views on many questions, and especially in reference to the administration of justice. He thought the latter part of his hon. Friend's speech answered the former part of it. He did not see, upon principle, why the general taxpayer should pay for the litigation into which other people entered. Why should a man who wanted a divorce get it for nothing, and throw the expense upon the public, who already contributed something towards the general expense of keeping up the administration provided by the Divorce Court? A very large sum was charged upon the Consolidated Fund in the shape of salaries, which did not fall upon the suitors at all. Although that sum did not appear in the present Vote, there was a Memorandum which showed what it was; so that it was evident the fees did not balance themselves as accurately as the hon. Member for East Sussex (Mr. Gregory) thought; and he (Mr. H. H. Fowler) was not prepared to urge upon his hon. Friend the Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Courtney) the propriety of decreasing the fees. He had great confidence, however, that the hon. Gentleman would not decrease them; and he was sure that if he attempted to impose the burden upon the taxpayers he would meet with a strong, vigorous, and successful opposition. Much of the business of the Courts was administrative, and not contentious, and it was absurd to contend that the persons interested should not bear the burden. He wished to ask for information upon a point which had been referred to by the hon. Baronet the Member for Midhurst (Sir Henry Holland)—namely, the staff of the Central Court. He had a letter in his pocket which he would not trouble the Committee by reading; but if the statements contained in it were true, it was quite clear that a vigorous investigation was required into the whole of the administration of the Central Court. He had understood his hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor General to promise last year that such an investigation should take place. He did not know whether the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury had had his attention called to the Return which appeared in The Times almost week by week in reference to bills of sale. Two years before the Act of 1882 they reached about 60,000 a-year. That Act was passed under the recommendations of a Committee over which the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General presided, and last year the number was reduced from 60,000 to 11,000; but he did not see that there had been any reduction in the cost of the Bills of Sale Office. On the contrary, he found it was costing just as much now there were only 11,000 bills of sale registered, as it did when there were 60,000 to register. He would also ask what control there existed over what might be called the inner life of the Courts of Justice? If hon. Members turned to Page 212 of the Estimates, they would find that there was an extraordinary staff of ushers, messengers, porters, &c.; altogether, about 200 persons were engaged in the Courts of Justice, costing the country nearly £20,000 a-year. He believed there were about 19 or 20 Courts. No doubt the building was a very large one; but he found that there were 10 ushers and messengers attached to the Central Office; 21 to the Chancery Division; 21 to the Queen's Bench Division; 29 to the Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty Office; seven to the Bankruptcy Department; while the sub-divisions had also a large draft of their own. Who was responsible for the employment of so many persons about the Courts? Who saw that they discharged their supposed duties? And who controlled the time they devoted to them? He thought the whole of the Central Courts ought to be placed under the control of some Department of the Government—the First Commissioner of Works, or some other person, who should be responsible for the work done and for the salaries paid. It was also desirable that something more should be known as to the intentions of the Government in regard to the working of the Judicature Act, which had now been in force for something like 10 years, and for the carrying out of which £500,000 had been voted. He was expressing almost the unanimous opinion of the Legal Profession, when he said that the administration of justice was never in a more unsatisfactory state than it was at present. In fact, they were in a perfect state of general chaos. What was wanted was economical justice, and quick justice; but they got neither. Matters were getting daily worse and worse; they were continually trying fresh experiments, but they did not go to the matter root and branch. They were always trying stop-gap Acts of Parliament—trying to put new wine into old bottles, with the result that the bottles burst and the wine was wasted. That had been the course pursued during the last 10 years. There was no man more capable or more competent than his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General to deal with the matter, and if he would deal with it in the same manner as he had dealt with corrupt practices, he would find that the House of Commons were prepared to support him. He was quite aware of the opposition that would be raised; but their forefathers had surmounted the opposition of Lord Eldon and those who agreed with him in those days, and he thought the hon. and learned Gentleman would receive general support now. The business of Law Reform at the present moment was increasing the cost of law and delaying the administration of justice.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) thanked the hon. Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. H. H. Fowler) for the complimentary way in which he had spoken of him; but he could not quite admit that the present state of things in respect of legal procedure was worse than it had ever been.

MR. H. H. FOWLER said, his remarks applied principally to the Chancery Division.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, they were apt to conclude that things never could have been so bad as they found them. They were apt to forget evils which had been got rid of; and he imagined that if they could go back to the state of things which existed under Lord Eldon's rule in the Chancery Courts, and in regard to the administration of justice generally, it would be found that a much greater cause of complaint existed than could be found now. He did not for one moment suggest that the present system was by any means perfect, and that there were not considerable causes of complaint; but his hon. Friend would agree with him that changes made for the sake of change were in themselves to be avoided. If they unsettled procedure, or unsettled existing regulations, out of consideration for the suitors and the expenses which had to be borne by them, they might bring about evils greater than those which they remedied. They had lately introduced new Rules, the operation of which had not yet been tested, and it would be somewhat premature, therefore, to hold out a promise of any further change at present. No one knew the difficulty of effecting changes in their legal procedure unless they had practically undertaken them. Unless they could get a concurrence of opinion among those who were intrusted with the responsibility of administering justice, the introduction of small changes would not only be dangerous in itself, but were very apt to be overborne. He did not think that any great change could now be introduced in the direction of legal reform with any beneficial result. As far as he could ascertain, the Lord Chancellor and the Judges were doing their best to increase the public satisfaction with the administration of the law. As for the minor officials about the new Law Courts, there was not one person too many for the work that had to be done. Any person who was in the habit of constantly attending the Courts would know that there was not one person employed there more than was absolutely required. The interests of the public required protection. There was an immense number of rooms in the Courts containing very valuable property and valuable papers, which it was impossible to leave unguarded. The public and the juries needed protection and direction. Formerly, they had great assistance from the police. The police in Westminster Hall acted in aid of the ushers of the Court, and gave most valuable assistance. They took charge of the passages leading to the Courts, and directed persons who were required to be in attendance upon the Courts. All that was now done away with, and all the work was thrown upon the official staff. Therefore the number, large as it appeared to be upon the Paper, was impossible to be reduced.

MR. WARTON said, he wished to call the attention of the hon. and learned Attorney General to a matter to which he (Mr. Warton) had already directed attention, but unfortunately without success. He alluded to the want of economy in regard to Clerks of Assize. At Page 209 of the Estimates, he found that there was a clerk appointed to the South-Eastern Circuit at £950 a-year. They knew perfectly well that what was called the South-Eastern Circuit was a combination of four out of five counties in the Home Circuit and part of the Norfolk Circuit. It was quite natural that so long as the old clerk of the Norfolk Circuit lived, he should be continued to be paid his salary; but he thought there should be an undertaking that, in the event of the death or resignation of either one or the other of these gentlemen, one clerk would in future be sufficient for the whole Circuit. He found that one Associate did for the whole Circuit, and one Clerk of Indictments, and why should there be more than one Clerk of Assize? As a matter of fact, the counties were taken in a certain regular order following one after another. There was, consequently, no clashing of places, and the same gentleman could go from town to town throughout the whole Circuit. When the question was last raised the hon. and learned Attorney General seemed to think that this reckless expenditure should be continued for ever; but his hon. and learned Friend might have changed his opinion since, and he would therefore ask him whether, in the event of a vacancy arising, he would arrive at the conclusion that there was only a necessity for retaining the services of one officer? The other point he wished to refer to, was the secret bargain between the Judges and the Treasury. Whether it was a dignified matter to enter into a bargain at all, he would not venture to inquire; probably, the Judges knew what was best for them to do. It had not been formally stated to the House, but it had leaked out somehow or other, that the sum of £15 15s. a-day was to be paid to each Judge on account of his expenses on Circuit. As an ordinary rule, the Judges received £4,500 a-year, and, being allowed £500 for their Circuit expenses, they had in reality £5,000. Then putting the salary at £5,000 a-year, why, in addition, should they have £15 15s. a-day? The bargain might be a fair and honourable one both for the Judges and the Treasury to enter into; but when he came to Page 215 of the Estimates, he could not find any item that led him to suppose that any allowance of this kind was made. The Estimate appeared to have been passed without any consideration of the effect of the change. There seemed to be an addition in the aggregate of £350; and he should like to know if that item went in any way to make up this increase, or, if not, where the increase was explained? It was possible that the Estimate was drawn up before the arrangement was made, and, if that were so, they might probably be told that there would be a Supplementary Estimate. He certainly did not see in the Vote any sort of an Estimate for this £15 15s. a-day. Therefore, he should be grateful for an explanation.

MR. LABOUCHERE said, he had no doubt that all this legal work could be done for about one-half of the present charge, not because the Judges objected to any reform, but because there were a great many lawyers in the House, and so long as the House contained so large a number of legal Gentlemen they would naturally get up to defend almost any abuse which gave a salary to a lawyer. He was agreeably surprised to find his hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. H. H. Fowler) suggest that there should be an inquiry. He could assure his hon. Friend that he was quite a rara avis among the legal Gentlemen of the House, who naturally looked after "Number One." He wanted to know something about Masters in Lunacy and the Visitors in Lunacy. He believed that last year there was a sum of £80,021 spent on the Masters in Lunacy; and, besides that, two sums of £10,275 and £5,895 for the Commissioners of Lunacy. There was a strong feeling in the country that something ought to be done in regard to the law affecting supposed lunatics. He did not know if the Visitors in Lunacy visited private asylums; but recent events showed that persons could be taken up upon what he might term "bogus" certificates, put in asylums, and kept there without being visited by any independent official. He did not complain that the Vote was too large; he almost thought it was too small, considering the large number of lunatics there were about. He thought that, if necessary, some kind of legislation should take place. He should also like to have some information with reference to the Petty Bag Office. The salaries and expenses of that Office amounted to £1,400, and, recently, when he put a Question to his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General, he was informed that the hon. and learned Gentleman knew nothing about it. Perhaps the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General would be able to enlighten the Committee on the subject? It was perfectly true that a year or two ago some moderate services were performed by these officials; but he understood that they were not performed now, as they had been abolished by the changes introduced into the law. Nevertheless, the salaries were still being paid. He also desired to know why the item of £225 for the Preacher of the Rolls Chapel was allowed to appear on the Estimates? What did this Preacher do? He had never heard of the Rolls Chapel, and he had never heard of a Preacher until he found that the country was called upon to pay £225 a-year for him. There was an Established Church in this country, possessing very large funds, and he did not see that it was for the benefit or good of anyone that they should vote money in order that this Preacher should preach in the Rolls Chapel, probably to no congregations.

MR. TOMLINSON said, he wished to make a few observations in reference to the question of fees. The charge for the administration of justice amounted to £490,852; whereas £409,000 were received from fees, in addition to other items, which brought the total sum up to £464,000. The charge upon the Consolidated Fund included the whole cost of the Judges for criminal as well as civil business; and the Vote now under consideration included a sum of £41,000 from the District and Probate Registries. He thought he was correct in saying that those District and Probate Registries were kept chiefly engaged on work connected with the proving of wills. He did not think they undertook any contentious matters, or any work that corresponded with the usual work of the Registrars of the Courts of Justice. Therefore, that sum of £41,000, together with half the judicial charge on the Consolidated Fund, as representing the criminal portion of the duties of the Judges, ought to be deducted; and he found that there would still be a profit upon the administration of justice, which, he thought, was a state of things which ought not to exist. Certainly, if the country allowed its administrative work in connection with justice to be paid for by fees, it was not desirable that they should make a profit out of it. The form in which the Estimates were produced afforded them no opportunity of knowing what portion of the fees belonged to the different branches of the administration of justice; but he noticed that the Chancery fees came to £380,000, so that a very large portion of the contributions towards the cost came from the Chancery Division. He was strongly impressed by the fact that the country derived a considerable profit out of the business of the Chancery Division. This was not a state of things that ought to be allowed, and, at all events, they ought to have some mean-of ascertaining whether it was so or not. If it were really the fact, regulations ought to be carried out to diminish the fees in that branch of legal procedure. It certainly could not be fair to charge the Chancery suitors with any portion of the cost of Common Law business. Another serious grievance on the part of the Chancery suitors was the great delay which arose in the conduct of business. He believed the main cause was the excessive amount of work in the Chief Clerk's office, and he would suggest that, where necessary, additional Chief Clerks should be appointed. He believed that additions might be made without any actual cost to the country. The fees from the additional amount of business transacted would pay for the extra cost. With reference to the proposal to allow Chancery cases to be heard locally in the county of Lancashire, he thought it would be regarded as a satisfactory one as far as it went. He would, however, reiterate what he had said before on the Bill of the hon. Member for Liverpool (Mr. Whitley), that the only satisfactory way of dealing with the Chancery business of Lancashire would be to incorporate in some way the Chancery Court of the County Palatine with the High Court of Justice. The County Palatine Court had, at present, its local Registries, and a perfect establishment for administration. Its only defect was, that it was limited by localities. If that limit were abolished, and if the cases could be dealt with in that Court, either in London or in the locality, he believed a great advantage would arise.

Mr. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) seemed to think that lawyers in that House were always in favour of increasing legal charges. He had said that they did that in the interest of "Number One," and then the hon. Gentleman went on to propose that there should be an increase in the cost of the administration of the Lunacy Law. He (Mr. Arthur O'Connor) did not know whether the hon. Member, in regard to that, was actuated by the same sort of motive. With regard to several subjects which had already been brought before the Committee, he believed they furnished good and substantial grounds for carefully discussing the Vote from beginning to end. He remembered three years ago, when he was able to obtain a detailed examination of the Vote, that after a long struggle, he succeeded in inducing the Government to reduce the Vote, because it was discovered that they had actually charged for some office that did not exist. They had charged, for instance, for four Official Referees, when only three were in existence. He believed there four Official Referees in existence now; but whether the hundreds of officers who were charged for in the present Vote were really in existence, he very much doubted. Before the Judicature Act was passed, and before the fusion of the Court of Common Pleas, the Court of Queen's Bench, and the Court of Exchequer, there was a Master in each Division respectively in charge of the discipline of the Office; but since the fusion into one Central Court, it was very hard, indeed, to find out who was responsible for the discipline and for the official staff. The official staff was now enjoying an independent and easy life, which was very remarkable. He was credibly informed that the number of officials who were present in the Court at the present day were very much below the establishment. A large number were constantly on leave, thus reducing the staff to such an attenuated form, that those who had occasion to go to the different offices, found it difficult to get their business transacted. He also thought that the distribution of officials in the different offices since the fusion might, with advantage, be revised. Some observations had been made in reference to the Writ Appearance and Judgment Department; but although the charge in the Vote for the officials in that Department was high in proportion to their number, he did not think the number of officials was too great. In fact, he fancied that that particular Department was undermanned and short-handed. They were not paid enough for the work they had to do; but in regard to the other Departments, he certainly thought the staff ought to be overhauled and reduced. He could not see what the Chief Remembrancer's Department wanted with two first and two second class clerks. He did not see what work there was for so many officials, and he thought the Office might be advantageously inquired into and re-cast. Last year he had directed the attention of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General to the Taxing Officers. Every year there was a large number of cases which might be closed, but which were kept open for months, because the taxing of the costs could not be proceeded with, owing to the fact that the Taxing Officers were away during the Vacation. He thought it was not too much to ask, in the interests of the great body of suitors, that there should be some continuation of sittings in the Taxing Office, so that costs might be taxed without the suits being kept open for months after the close of the sittings. He could not help feeling, in regard to the arrears in the Courts, that more Judges ought to be appointed. If the Government were not inclined to increase the number of Judges, he would venture to suggest a very easy and cheap expedient that would relieve the difficulty, without increasing the expense. In England, there were not enough Judges; whereas, in Ireland, there were too many. If they would increase the English Judges by three, four, or five, the Irish people would make no complaint whatever if they availed themselves of the existing staff in that country.

MR. MACFARLANE said, that some three years ago he had called the attention of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General to the question of the Taxing Masters in Chancery, and the delay which took place in the taxation of costs. The hon. and learned Gentleman admitted the grievance, and promised that the matter should be inquired into. He supposed the matter had been looked into; but no change had been made. He had had cases sent to him in which sometimes the taxing of the costs took up a longer period of time than the original suit. The Taxing Master appointed an hour, say, at the beginning of May, and half of the hour was wasted while the parties awaited the arrival of the Taxing Master. Then, after six weeks or two months, he appointed another hour; and so matters went on with the result that the life was worried out of the poor suitor before he succeeded in having the case settled. This was a question in which the lawyers themselves had no direct interest. He did not think they cared anything about it, and therefore he did not think they would oppose a reform in this particular branch. He was sure that if the hon.

and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General could see his way to facilitating the taxing of costs, he would do a great deal to benefit the wretched suitors who were kept in suspense under the present system. He saw in the Vote an item of £20,000 for the fees of Taxing Masters, and he was afraid that either their attendance was insufficient, or that they were too few in number. If they required more men to do the work effectively, he did not think it was good economy to grudge the money. He did not understand that that was really the case; but if, on the contrary, it was the system that was in fault, the hon. and learned Solicitor General would do good service by looking into the matter.

MR. WAUGH said, he had to complain of the cost of the Bankruptcy Division. Last year they voted for that purpose £34,537, and this year the Vote amounted to £94,712, being an increase of more than £60,000. They would shortly be required to vote a further sum of £40,000, making the total increase £100,000, together with £20,000 for Non-Effective Services, owing to the changes which had formerly and lately been carried out in the Court of Bankruptcy. He thought that was a most extraordinary charge, considering that the Court of Bankruptcy in Ireland only cost £10,000, the Supreme Court in Ireland £90,000, and that the charge for Law and Justice in Scotland was £62,000, making altogether £162,000; whereas, in England, the Court of Bankruptcy cost nearly as much. It certainly appeared to be extraordinary that in Ireland and Scotland the Court of Bankruptcy and the administration of Justice together, could be maintained for a sum little more than the cost of the Bankruptcy Court in this country.

MR. GREGORY said, that the Taxing Masters were a very highly qualified and hard-worked class. They did the work not only in their offices, but a good deal of it at home, in order to facilitate the interests of the public. If there was more delay than was desired, it was not the fault of the Masters, nor was it due to any want of exertion on their part. At certain periods of the year there was very great pressure upon them, but they were most anxious to facilitate the work.

MR. COURTNEY stated that the next vacancy in the Office of the Petty Bag would not be filled up. He did not say that the Office would be abolished, but there would be a re-arrangement of the duties. The hon. and learned Member for Bridport (Mr. Warton) had called attention to what he called the "secret bargains" between the Judges and the Exchequer with respect to their expenses while on Circuit. He thought the hon. and learned Member must have overlooked a Memorandum which was laid on the Table some months ago, giving full particulars of this arrangement. The sum, however, was not £15 15s. a-day, but very much less. As to the Masters in Lunacy, the remarks of the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) ought to have been addressed to the Lunacy Commissioners. He was astonished at the ignorance of the hon. Member in regard to the Preacher of the Rolls Chapel. One of the greatest of English Divines had been Preacher at the Rolls Chapel. It was there that Bishop Butler preached his great sermon on Human Nature. He might say for himself that he had very frequently attended that Chapel and listened to this Preacher, when Sir John Romilly was Master of the Rolls. The hon. Members for Carlow (Mr. Macfarlane) and Queen's County (Mr. Arthur O'Connor) had spoken of the action of the Taxing Masters, to which the hon. Member for East Sussex (Mr. Gregory) had given a reply. He could only add that some improvement in the working of that Office might be looked forward to. The functions of the Queen's Remembrancer were not so light as were imagined, but a considerable amount of work occupying a considerable amount of time was transacted in that Office.

MR. J. W. LOWTHER said, he had a few remarks to make on the items for the payment of the Marshals. He was aware that, under a Treasury Minute of the 26th of June this year, a new arrangement had been entered into with respect to those officers which, as far as he knew, was a satisfactory one. It was rather to the manner of payment than the amount of the charge that he took exception. He understood that the Judge who took his Marshal with him, made a Return to the Treasury, and that the Treasury on receipt of it gave him a warrant. Now, he believed it was notorious that in the case of one Judge on the Bench, it was his habit to give the appointment of Marshal to his son or some relative, and to take some other person with him on Circuit to do the work. That, in his opinion, was a state of things which ought not to be allowed to continue, and he thought that the Treasury ought to make it obligatory upon the Marshals to state that the payment made was to the person who had done the work. If that rule were established, he believed that the practice to which he had alluded would cease.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir FARRER HERSCHELL) said, with reference to the inquiries of the hon. Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. H. H. Fowler) and the hon. Baronet the Member for Midhurst (Sir Henry Holland) as to the salaries of the clerks in the central office and the amount of work done there, he would recall to the recollection of those hon. Members what he had stated last year upon the subject, and on an occasion prior to that. A Committee had been appointed by the late Lord Chancellor, of which he (Sir Farrer Herschell) was a Member, to consider the question as to what would be done in respect of the central office under the Judicature Act. That Committee made such recommendations as appeared to them right upon the knowledge which they then possessed. But their view on the whole was, that it would be impossible to determine what would be the real number of clerks required in the central office, until experience had shown the amount of work and how the subject ought to be dealt with, which could only be arrived at when the whole establishment was at work. That being so, he would, in due course, call the attention of the Lord Chancellor to the question whether the time had not arrived for inquiry, in order to ascertain the extent of the duties performed in the central office. He pointed out to the Committee that where it was necessary to deal with a number of offices of this description, it was impossible, until the old officials ceased to exist, to get the arrangements into the shape desired—a condition of things which could only be reached at a more remote period. With regard to the observations of the hon. Gentleman the Member for East Sussex (Mr. Gregory), he begged to remind him that the matter to which he had referred was brought forward on the Courts of Judicature Bill, when he had stated that the question as to some of the fees should be considered, because he thought that a case had been made out for inquiry. The question was, whether the fees were not dealt with too much as a whole in certain matters; whether a more careful classification might not be made; whether fees, which in one class of cases might be reasonable, were not equally reasonable in another class of cases; and whether fees might not be separated, instead of being, as was now the case, classed together? He was prepared to admit that there might be some inequality existing in this matter, and he quite agreed with his hon. Friend that it would be possible, without diminishing the amount raised by taxation of the suitor, to make some readjustment by which a more equitable arrangement could be arrived at. With regard to the work of the Taxing Masters, he at once admitted that there was delay in the case of some of those officers, at all events. There had come within his own observation delays which ought not to have occurred. Very recently, a case had come under his observation in which an altogether inordinate time was consumed in the taxation of a bill of costs which the solicitor was most anxious to get taxed as soon as possible. He agreed that such delays should not take place, and he would urge the matter on the attention of the Lord Chancellor.

MR. TOMLINSON said, he should like the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General to answer one question. Were the Government going to take into consideration the block in the Chancery Division, with a view to remedying it, either by increasing the number of clerks to the Judges, or by other means?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir FARRER HERSCHELL) said, that the Government had taken one step—a considerable one—in the direction indicated by the hon. Member for Preston. They had relieved the Chancery Judges from going Circuit, and retained them exclusively for the duties of the Chancery Division. He believed that arrangement would be found to constitute a considerable addition to the power of the Court. The increase of the number of Chancery clerks was another matter, and it deserved consideration, because he thought that the block in Chambers was, perhaps, more pressing than in the Court itself.

MR. LABOUCHERE said, he must ask the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Courtney) why such considerable differences existed in the amount of salaries paid in respect of the various District Probate Registries? It appeared by the Estimate that, amongst others, the salary of the Registrar at Birmingham was £800; at Carlisle, £700; at Exeter, £1,000; at Lichfield, £800; at Northampton, £250; and at Wakefield, £1,200. The assignment of these salaries appeared to him to be made quite irrespective of the size of the places where the District Registries were situated, because, for some of the smaller districts, more money was paid than for the larger districts. For instance, Birmingham was a large district. [MR. COURTNEY: No.] Was he to understand that the Birmingham district was smaller than the Wakefield district? The arrangement appeared to be most extraordinary.

MR. COURTNEY said, that the amount of the salaries was according to the work to be done. Lichfield, for instance, was the centre of a considerable district in which there was a large amount of work.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, there was one point on which he desired to have some information from the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General. That hon. and learned Gentleman had mentioned what was undoubtedly a fact—namely, that a great deal of the existing block in the Chancery Division was due to the block in Chambers. The question he wished to ask was, why there were some Masters who never sat in Chambers?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir FARRER HERSCHELL) said, the reason was, probably, because they sat in Court. He did not know to whom the hon. Member for Queen's County (Mr. Arthur O'Connor) referred. He supposed that the work was better done under the arrangement referred to; but he could not give a more precise answer without knowing the Masters to whom the hon. Member alluded.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, that in order to make a set-off for the other expenditure, two of the clerks had been asked to give up the post of Marshal which they held, and that they declined to do so, although they offered to surrender their position as second class clerks. Was it arranged that the second class clerks were to be transferred to the central office; and, if so, would the consent of the Commissioners be obtained in some special manner to the arrangement if they did not pass the examination which would otherwise be required to be passed by the appointees?

MR. COURTNEY said, he could hardly be expected to enter into the question of what was proposed and what was not proposed to be done.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR: It is with regard to what is being done.

MR. COURTNEY said, the arrangement rested with the Judges.

Vote agreed to.

(3.) £9,078, to complete the sum for the Wreck Commission.

(4.) £376,726, to complete the sum for the County Courts.

MR. R. T. REID said, he had a very few words to say in connection with this Vote. He would be glad to know whether there was any Return or means by which the Committee could ascertain whether there was any truth in the statement that some of the County Court Judges, especially those in the crowded districts in the North of England, were accustomed to work seven, eight, or nine hours a-day; and whether it was true that the County Court Judges in the agricultural districts, especially in the West, had such an excellent time of it that they did not work more than 120 or 150 hours out of the year? There was a large number of County Court Judges; and, without saying one word in regard to the proper salaries which they enjoyed, or without wishing in any way to interfere with their position or number, he was bound to ask whether some table of the kind indicated could be obtained, in order that upon it might be based some more equal distribution of the work than existed at the present moment, and under which some of the Judges were undoubtedly very much harder worked than others? He hoped the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General would be able to give some information on this subject.

MR. WEST said, he had a few figures to lay before the Committee with regard to the number of days in the course of a year on which the County Court Judges, held their sittings. He wished to say, at the commencement of his remarks, that he could find nothing in the Returns about the hard work which the hon. and learned Gentleman who had just sat down (Mr. R. T. Reid) said was cast upon County Court Judges in some districts in the North, as compared with the comparatively light duties of other County Court Judges in the Western agricultural districts. He found that the County Court Judges in the country did not sit on the average three days a-week. Still, he agreed with his hon. and learned Friend in what he had said with regard to not diminishing the salaries of the County Court Judges, because, although their salaries had been increased within the last few years, he did not think them an undue remuneration for the work they had to perform. But there was a very serious matter in connection with this Vote, to which he desired to call the attention of Her Majesty's Government. There sat, in 1873, a Committee, which went into this question at considerable length, but which Committee, in consequence of the Dissolution of 1874, never reported. The question of the number of County Court Judges was considered, and, although he had no right to anticipate what the Report would have been, he could not help thinking that the Committee were of opinion that the number of the County Court Judges was much too great. Little or nothing had been done in the direction of reducing the number of the County Court Judges; the rate at which they improved in these matters was so exceedingly slow. He would give one or two illustrations with regard to this subject. In 1874, the Legal Department Committee sat to consider this very question among others. That Committee comprised Lord Bramwell and other persons of experience and distinction, and they made an unanimous Report to Parliament in favour of the reduction of the number of County Court Judges. But to show the energy and zeal of the Government, he would point out that they had reduced the number of the County Court Judges by one, since that Committee reported. Now, if these Judges were to be reduced in number from 60 to 30, at that rate the country would probably have to wait 300 years before that result was arrived at. After careful and exhaustive inquiry into the question, the Committee said—

"The number of Judges is limited by Statute (21 & 22 Vict. cap. 74) to 60, and there are at the present time 57, so that some absorption of circuits has taken place; but Mr. Nicol is of opinion that there is room for further consolidation. We find that, although the days of sitting of some Judges occupy nearly half the year, the annual average attendance of the whole number in the last ten years has not exceeded 135 days, so that it is not unreasonable to suppose that more work might fairly be required of them without unduly tasking their powers or risking that the business should be done too quickly or slurred over. We observe from the same Return that the attendance in Court and at Chambers of the Common Law Judges averages 200 working days in the year. . . . We are of opinion that the remuneration now prescribed by statute 28 & 29 Vict. cap. 89, for the Judges, viz., £1,500 a-year, is not excessive, although the extension of equitable jurisdiction to these Courts which was the reason for granting the increase of salary does not seem to have materially added to the duties of the Judges. Since then, however, they have had increased work given to them in Bankruptcy, and in a few instances in Admiralty suits; and it appears to us that even if future Judges are required to undertake enlarged circuits, the salary now received would be sufficient."

It was clear, from a comparison of the time occupied in former days with that at present given to the performance of their duties by the County Court Judges, that although a large addition—an addition of 25 per cent.—had been made to most of the salaries, the number of days which they gave to the public had considerably diminished. In the year 1863, the number of days for the whole of the Judges was 8,034, according to the last Return. Now, people said that the County Court Judges did not do sufficient work. He did not say that they were under or over paid; he gave no opinion upon that point; but he did say that since their salaries had been increased, the number of days on which they worked for the public had diminished. He did not mean to say that the diminution had occurred exactly contemporaneously; but the figures were as follows:—In 1867, the County Court Judges sat altogether 9,019 days; in 1871, only 8,041 days; in 1879, 8,263 days; in 1880, 8,268 days; in 1883, 8,034 days. Therefore, it could not be said that they sat fewer days in consequence of their having small salaries. The real cause was that they had comparatively little work to do. The total cost of the County Court system was £600,000 a-year—a very considerable item in the administration of the country—and he should like to know from Her Majesty's Government whether the recommendation of the Committee for the reduction of the number of the Judges would be acted upon, and whether they considered that that recommendation was satisfied by the fact that the number of the County Court Judges had been reduced by one?

Mr. H. H. FOWLER said, that the amount named by the hon. and learned Gentleman who had just sat down (Mr. West) represented the whole expense in connection with the County Courts. The Return which had been laid on the Table of the House in the course of the last month, showing the actual number of days which the County Court Judges sat in 1883, was, in his opinion, of that importance and gravity that he wished to direct the attention of the Government to it. In order to appreciate that Return, it was only necessary for hon. Members to adopt the most elementary principles of calculation. For instance, the Committee would be aware that there were 365 days in the year; if Sundays, holidays, some days at Christmas were deducted, there remained 305 working days during the year. Then came the question as to the number of days' holiday which a person discharging these important functions in the State required, and which would have to be taken out of the 305 working days. He ventured to think that 12 weeks was a handsome holiday for any public servant. He doubted if hon. and right hon. Gentlemen on the Treasury Bench had as long; he was quite sure the Prime Minister did not. However, he was prepared to allow 12 weeks, which, when deducted from the 305 working days, left 230 days available for the Public Service in the course of the year. His hon. and learned Friend who spoke last had told the Committee that the Judges in the Superior Courts sat on the average 200 days in the year, and he (Mr. H. H. Fowler) need not remind them that the number of days on which those Judges sat did not at all represent the time and labour which they devoted to their duties. They had to prepare their judgments, and consider a number of matters out of Court; and, therefore, he considered that 200 days was a very fair number for Judges of the Superior Courts to sit.

Several of the Superior Judges sat 197 days in the year; the Judges of the Court of Appeal sat 193 days. Now, what did the Return which he held in his hand show? It showed that there was only one County Court Judge who sat on 190 days in the year; that one sat on 186 days, one on 184 days, and one on 181 days. He found that there were Judges who sat on less than 100 days; one 99 days, and one on 93 days, the salaries being precisely the same in each case—namely, £1,500 a-year—irrespective of the number of days on which they sat. He found also that 10 County Court Judges sat for less than 120 days; 27 sat from 120 to 150 days; 10 for 160 to 170 days; and eight only sat on 180 days in the year. He put it to the Committee, in view of these figures, whether the time had not arrived for reconsidering the whole of the County Court system? Either they were bound to reduce the number of Judges, or to increase the amount of work they had to do. Personally, he was in favour of re-grouping the County Courts, so that they might do the same amount of work as the Judges of the Superior Courts, and do it to the satisfaction of the people. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General gave it as an excuse, the other day, that these County Court Judges had to travel some distance to their labours; but he (Mr. H. H. Fowler) had the impression that the distance which they had to travel had nothing to do with the matter. He could put his finger on a case of a Judge who sat 128 days in the year; he had to attend three Courts, all of which were within a distance of six or seven miles from his residence, and there were trains to the locality every quarter of an hour. The case of the Judge who sat 93 days was, he thought, in a locality not far from London. [An hon. MEMBER: No; it was a Lancashire case.] Yes; it was the Bacup, Bolton, Rochdale, &c., Judge. The places in which this Judge had to sit were close together, and were within easy reach of each other, so that it could not be said that a great deal of time was occupied in travelling. If they were to allow 25 per cent of the Judge's time for travelling all round, it seemed to him that it would be quite ample. He thought the time had quite come when they should consider this question as to grouping of places to be attended by the single Judge, or the increasing the duties of each individual. So far as he was concerned, he preferred increasing. Last year it appeared that 25 per cent of the civil cases tried in the Superior Courts were under £50. These were cases which the County Court Judges could very well dispose of; and if the House would only adopt the recommendation of Committee after Committee which had sat to consider the matter, and would give a County Court jurisdiction up to £100, instead of having to increase the number of Superior Judges, they would find it possible to make a decrease. He would ask the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury to look at Page 221 of the Estimates, where he would find an item, "Conveyance of Persons committed to Prison, £2,680." That item astonished him very much, as he had thought that if they had done anything at all in the matter of Bankruptcy in the Grand Committee last year, that which they had prided themselves upon having done was having abolished imprisonment for debt in small cases. They had inserted provisions in the Bill to enable persons who went through the Bankruptcy Court, owing less than £50, to make an application to the Court to get freed without difficulty. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade (Mr. Chamberlain) was in this matter very ably assisted by the hon. Member for Stoke (Mr. Broadhurst), and it was certainly the impression of that hon. Member, and that of the Committee, that they had put an end to this imprisonment for debt in County Court cases. He was, therefore, unable to understand that item of £2,680, which looked very much as though the old system was still in existence. He trusted they would get some assurance from the Government that the whole system of the administration of justice by the County Courts would be inquired into; that they would endeavour to find some method either of reducing the cost, or increasing the work, of the County Courts.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir FARRER HERSCHELL) said, he was quite sure the Committee would feel that those who had called attention to this matter had done a useful service. Every one, he thought, must agree that it had been shown that in particular County Court districts, experience had established the fact that those districts, as now arranged, did not afford sufficient employment to occupy the entire time of the Judges. His hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. H. H. Fowler) had made a suggestion with regard to the question of increased jurisdiction, and changes in the allocation of the districts of County Court Judges, and he (the Solicitor General) thought that, even if they were desirous of increasing that jurisdiction, the matter would really require careful consideration. They would find that there would still be particular districts where there would be very little work, while in others there would be a great deal. He admitted the question was one deserving very considerable consideration. It was obvious they had now obtained an experience as to the relations of the different districts, one to another, in regard to the amount of work to be done, which they had not before, and everyone would agree it was desirable, as far as possible, to distribute the work so that no Judge should cover a district in which there was really an insufficient amount of work properly to occupy the whole of his judicial time. This question of re-grouping districts must, he was sure, be felt to be one of considerable difficulty; because when they were dealing with an existing Judge, who had been accustomed to the district in which he was now working for a long period, they could not approach a change as easily as though they were working new ground. It was not easy to make a change, except when the time came for a change in the Judge. He might say, however, in regard to certain districts in the neighbourhood of the Metropolis, the Lord Chancellor was now considering the question of re-arranging the business. He could assure his hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton that the matter would not be lost sight of by the Lord Chancellor and the Government, and that the noble and learned Earl and his Colleagues would direct their attention, as far as possible, to re-arranging the districts, so as to distribute the business in a better and more economical manner. There was one matter that the hon. Member had not taken into consideration, and although it was very trifling, he desired just to call attention to it. With regard to some districts, no doubt, there was very little travelling to be done by the Judges; but in connection with other districts, that was not the case—it was necessary for the Judge to take long journeys from town to town. He did not say that this proposal was universally applicable; but, at any rate, in the case of some County Courts, a considerable amount might be added to the work of the Judges in consideration of the small amount of time they lost in travelling. No doubt, there were some districts where the work was not at all sufficient to occupy the time of the Judge.

MR. WARTON said, he thought it right to call attention to a point in the discussion upon which some correction was needed. The hon. Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. H. H. Fowler) always put cases before the Committee with clearness and force; but the hon. Member could not have taken into consideration the importance of this matter to which he (Mr. Warton) was about to refer. He (Mr. Warton) had had considerable experience of County Court Judges, and he thought it was hardly fair to look merely at the number of days on which they sat. The Judges of the Superior Courts came late to Court, and rushed away early; whereas County Court Judges came early to Court, and sat late—he had over and over again known them to sit until 7 or 8 o'clock in the evening. He (Mr. Warton) put it to the Committee whether the County Court Judge was not exercising a very wise discretion when he said he would rather have two or three days in one place, when all persons connected with the cases were ready, and all witnesses were in attendance, than sit for a much longer time going leisurely through the business. With regard to travelling, there were many cases, particularly in Wales, where there were long distances between the places in which the County Court was held, and which were visited by the Judge only once in two or three months. In these cases, as well as those cases where the places were close together, it would be desirable for the Judges to get through the work in a more business-like way, and with greater expedition than was the case at present. It would be far better to have a sitting over in two or three days than to have seven days occupied over it. If the County Court Judges had their wits about them, they would endeavour, if the opportunity were given to them, to sit as long as the Judges of the Superior Courts, but to sit late in the day. It was far better, both for themselves and the suitors, to get good long days, and to finish the list before them, rather than to spin it out to an inordinate length. The Judges of the Superior Courts, even the Lord Chief Justice, lounged into Court at half-past 10 or a quarter to 11 o'clock, and were anxious to get to a meeting of Judges, say, by a quarter to 4 o'clock; but, on the contrary, County Court Judges were in the habit of sitting to 7 or 8 o'clock in the evening. The latter practice was highly to be commended. Many judicial functionaries did not by any means perform a sufficient amount of duty, and it was somewhat remarkable to hear the expressions of opinion which were given, sometimes coming from very high sources, on these subjects. It was remarkable to observe that just recently a Bill had been passed to relieve from a certain portion of his functions a judicial functionary who only sat 160 days in the year. He did not consider that a sufficient amount of work for such a person to perform. On this point he was quite sure of what he said, and he should not speak with such confidence if he had not experience of many County Courts.

MR. MOLLOY asked whether the hon. and learned Solicitor General was able to state how many County Judges held the double position of County Court Judge and Recorder? The position of Recorder was one which in many cases carried with it no emolument, or very little emolument.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir FARRER HERSCHELL): There is nothing to prevent a County Court Judge from holding the position of Recorder.

MR. MOLLOY asked whether some arrangement could not be made by which a Judge, when he obtained his Judgeship, might be given to understand that it was necessary for him to resign the position of Recorder? As he had said, the emolument in many cases was not a matter worth much consideration. In some cases it was very small—in Sandwich, for instance, it was only some £10 or £15 a-year. The position of County Court Judge, to which a Recorder might be nominated, was a much higher one of the two, and yet in many cases the titular position of Recorder was retained in addition to the Judgeship. He knew amongst members of the Bar there was a strong feeling of objection to the present system; and it was generally felt when a Recorder had been raised to the dignity of a County Court Judge, he ought to abandon the other titular position, and that the Recorderships vacated in that way should be distributed amongst the members of the Bar, who, from their position, were entitled to some recognition of that kind. He had stated that the Recordership of Sandwich was only worth some £10 or £15 a-year; therefore, it could not be said that the title of Recorder was retained because of the addition it made to the salary of the County Court Judge. In some cases, the County Court Judges received salaries of £1,500 a-year; and, seeing the small number of days which they sat, he did not think it right that they should also retain the Recordership which might bring in some £200 or £250 a-year. Some explanation could be given of the shortness of the sittings of some of the County Court Judges by referring to the number of days occupied in their situations as Recorder. When the fees of the County Court Judges were first established, it was supposed that the whole time of the gentlemen employed in that capacity would be given up to the work, and it was certainly never anticipated that any of them would be in addition receiving the salary and discharging the functions of Recorder. On the broad ground, it seemed only fair that when a Recorder was appointed a County Court Judge he should resign the former titular position for the benefit of other members of the Bar. He (Mr. Molloy) had been requested to bring this matter forward by a large number of barristers, and he placed it before the Government hoping that the point would not escape their attention.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he agreed very much with what had fallen from the hon. Member who had just sat down (Mr. Molloy), and he would call the special attention of the Lord Chancellor to his suggestion in regard to the Recorderships held by County Court Judges. It might be made a condition on a man being appointed a County Court Judge that he should give up his office as Recorder.

Vote agreed to.

(5.) Motion made, and Question proposed, .

"That a sum, not exceeding £3,442, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1885, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Office of Land Registry."

MR. ARTHUR ARNOLD said, the history of the Land Registry Office was so well known that he need not detain the Committee more than a minute or two in making the Motion with regard to it which stood in his name. The Office was established, as the Committee were aware, not for limited districts, but for the whole of the country, and to carry out Earl Cairns' Land Transfer Act of 1875. The failure of that Act had been long seen and well understood, and, unfortunately, it was a progressive failure. The Act continued to fail more and more every year; and he (Mr. Arthur Arnold) wished particularly to impress on the Committee the fact that, in the year 1883, the failure of the Act seemed to have reached almost the lowest possible depth. Well, he was able to state that in that year the number of new estates registered in the Office of the Land Registry was, in the last six months of the year, two, whilst in the preceding six months it was four; so the total number of new estates registered in the course of the year 1883 was six. When he stated that the probable number of transfers of real property which took place in this country amounted to about 360,000 a-year, the Committee would easily understand that an Office which was registering new estates at the rate of six per annum, was not exactly fulfilling an important function in the State, and not giving them the slightest hope that at any conceivable period they would have a complete Registry of Titles. It would be seen, from the item in the Estimate, that the Office of the Land Registry at the present moment cost about £1,000 for each new estate registered. That was, probably, the greatest scandal in the whole of the Civil Service Estimates; and when he considered the smooth words used not long ago by the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who was a master of smooth words, in informing the House that he and the Secretary to the Treasury had made careful investigation of the whole of the Civil Service Estimates, and that they—probably two of the very ablest administrative servants of the Crown connected with the Treasury—had been unable to find a single item on which they could recommend a reduction of the Public Expenditure—when they considered these smooth words of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, all they could say was, that it was very much to be regretted that the right hon. Gentleman and his Colleague had not been more successful in their search. He (Mr. Arthur Arnold) certainly thought they might have recommended such a reduction as he was about to ask the Committee to consider this evening. But, before he advocated that reduction, he would allude to the fact that, during the present Session, the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Courtney), in connection with the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General, had introduced a Bill proposing to remove the Middlesex Land Registry into the Land Registry Office. Now, the Secretary to the Treasury had been distinctly challenged upon that point. He had been asked by the hon. and learned Member for Hastings (Mr. Ince) and himself (Mr. Arthur Arnold) whether the Bill proposed to effect any economy whatever in regard to Public Expenditure? The hon. Member, unless he (Mr. Arthur Arnold) was much mistaken, was silent when that challenge was made; but, at all events, he did not give a hope that the passing of the Bill would save the Public Expenditure one single farthing; and, under these circumstances, holding the strong opinion that a Registry of Titles was what they wanted, and not a Registry of Deeds, he had opposed the shovelling of the Middlesex Land Registry into that Office. It appeared the Treasury would have given the countenance of the Government to that transfer, without any proposed improvement of the system of registry; it was simply, no doubt, an attempt to avoid the scandal of bringing forward this Vote year after year. He (Mr. Arthur Arnold) was about to suggest another and more equitable method of reducing this most scandalous Vote. It was not uncommon for civil servants in this country, when there was an excess of work in their Departments, to come to the Government, or to the Members who represented them in Parliament, and ask for an increase of pay. That being so, it appeared to him (Mr. Arthur Arnold) to be only fair and just, that when in their Department there was absolutely nothing to do, or next door to nothing to do, the civil servants should submit to a reduction in their salaries. He thought it ought to have been plain to those two Officers of the Treasury—namely, the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Secretary to the Treasury—when they entered into that very careful investigation of the Civil Service Estimates, to which the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had referred, that they could save at least £2,000 a-year in connection with this Vote by reducing the salaries. Why should the Chief Registrar of this absolutely abortive and wasteful Office receive £2,500 a-year? No doubt, the gentleman who held the office was not to blame. It must be admitted that it was not that gentleman's fault that the office was practically a sinecure; but he (Mr. Arthur Arnold) certainly did contend that, inasmuch as that gentleman was very little worked—in fact, that he had almost nothing to do—he should submit to a reduction of his salary. He thought the Government would be justified, on the same ground on which they sometimes granted an increase of pay to civil servants, in ordering a reduction in this case. A reduction might also be made in the case of nearly all the servants in this Office. He had nothing personally to complain of with regard to these gentlemen, or the way in which they performed their duties; but he certainly thought it would be right and just to say that their salaries should be reduced, considering that their positions had become sinecures. There were seven gentlemen connected with the Office, the total salaries of whom amounted to £5,430. It would be perfectly right and just—nay, more, it seemed to him it would be the duty of the Treasury—to enforce such a revision as he had stated. He should have been very glad if the Government had displayed a greater disposition, during the life of the present Parliament, to promote measures of Land Law Reform, and especially to promote measures making the system of registration of titles effective throughout the country. He complained, and he was entitled to do so, that this had not been done. He believed that measures had been promoted in this Parliament of far less value to the public than such a measure would have been. He admitted there had not been very much time wasted by the Government with regard to legislation; but, looking at the importance of this subject, he should have thought preference would have been given to it. However, in moving the reduction of the Vote by the sum of £2,000, he desired not only to call attention to the urgency of reform as to this matter of the registration of titles, than which he could not conceive a reform more calculated to benefit the public at large, but he also desired most emphatically to express his own opinion that it was the duty of the Government to, at all events, reduce the salaries of the officials in this Office. It could not be contended that a man should continue to receive £2,500 a-year, another £1,500, and others £400, £350, £250, and so on, in an Office in the condition of the Land Registry Office; therefore, on the grounds he had stated, he begged to move that the Vote be reduced by the sum of £2,000.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

—(Mr. Arthur Arnold.)

MR. W. FOWLER said, he felt very much for the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Courtney) and other hon. and right hon. Gentlemen opposite on this question, seeing that they had to support a Vote which was practically unsupported elsewhere. The Committee generally must feel very much for gentlemen who had given up, in order to accept these posts, good practices—who had accepted their situations on the faith that they would continue to receive their salaries. It was extremely difficult in a matter of this kind to vote a reduction, and he (Mr. W. Fowler) most readily admitted it. But year after year they had heard the same story that nothing was doing in this Office, and he did not know what his hon. Friends had said in support of the Vote, or could say, except that which he had just pointed out—namely, that they could not, without compensation, take away an office from a man who had given up a large practice and very good prospects, to fill it. But, for his own part, he would rather give a man handsome compensation than require him to remain in a place of this kind. It was a great pity for gentlemen like these to have nothing to do, and to be obliged to go day after day to the office. [An hon. MEMBER: The Chief Registrar never goes.] He was not aware of that; but he should doubt it very much. At any rate, he would suggest to the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury that some of the subordinate officers should have some other work given to them to do, seeing there was no work for them to discharge in connection with their own department. The clerks, for instance, might have other employment in the State so as to enable them to earn their salaries, so that it would not be necessary to dismiss them altogether from the Civil Service. Something of the kind might be done. The question was certainly a very curious one. His hon. Friend (Mr. Arthur Arnold) had pointed out that it had been considered by Committee after Committee and Commission after Commission, and yet they were no nearer a satisfactory conclusion than they ever were. They had gone through the process of appointing a highly-paid gentleman to do nothing, and that simply because, it seemed to him (Mr. W. Fowler), they had missed altogether the true principles on which they ought to have acted. He thought they would never have a Registry of Deeds worth having until registration was compulsory, not directly but indirectly compulsory. If after a certain date no transactions affecting land were valid unless the land was registered it would be found that a large amount of land would be registered. They must import something in the way of indirect compulsion if they expected people to go on the register. Why should a man go on the register. He knew a gentleman who had an excellent title, and yet it cost him a year's rent to get his land registered, and very sorry indeed he was that he registered, because he had to pay a very considerable sum for what really amounted to nothing; his friend was no better off now than he was when he was off the register. If a man did not want to do anything with his land, he could not understand why registration should be necessary. If they made it the law that a landlord could not sell his land or mortgage it unless it were registered, they would soon find him on the register. He (Mr. W. Fowler) knew there were people who denied the value of registration and said they were just as well off without it; but he thought that if there was a registration of titles and not of deeds, and the provision he had mentioned was the law, they would soon find that the expense of inquiring into titles would be very greatly diminished. His hon. Friend the Member for East Sussex (Mr. Gregory) approved of a registration of deeds, rather than of titles. Now, when he (Mr. W. Fowler) was in America, he inquired as to the system adopted there. He found that even in America, where transactions in land were very numerous, but not, he supposed, in some parts as numerous as in a great city like London, the experience was that registration of deeds led to great complication as to indexes and maps; indeed, private Companies now registered titles. A great business was carried on in Baltimore in the registration of titles by private Companies, because the public system was so imperfect. He, however, thought that if there was in this country a proper registration of titles, the difficulty experienced in America might be avoided. His impression was that they ought not to ask a man to register an indefeasible title. Some people had an idea that putting land on the register would not simplify matters; because, in their opinion, complications began to arise directly they got on the register. But the Committee had not now to decide all these details. The question before them was—What should they do with this Vote; should they pay this money or not? He should certainly listen with great curiosity to hear what his hon. Friend the Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Courtney) had to say in defence of the Vote. He should not commit himself to any course of action until he had heard what his hon. Friend had to say; but he protested against them continuing, year after year, the sham and farce of voting £5,400 to men who absolutely did nothing at all. He thought his hon. Friends on the Treasury Bench were ingenious enough to invent some way of getting out of the difficulty. He should be glad if some of this money could be used in establishing a real system of registration if they were to have one at all. The present system had proved to be an utter absurdity. If they did register, let the register be something worth having. What they had got now was not worth having, and he did not think the register ever would be worth having if they stuck to the idea of only registering indefeasible titles. He could not imagine why any man should be so stupid as to go on the register, unless he was going to divide his land into small lots. He earnestly hoped his hon. Friend (Mr. Courtney) would be able to tell them something which would get them out of the present difficulty, and prevent them going through the process of again voting this large sum of money for nothing at all.

SIR HENRY HOLLAND said, he had hoped that the hon. Member for Cambridge (Mr. W. Fowler) was going to remain faithful to the opposition to this Vote which had been expressed by hon. Members who now sat on the Government side of the House; but his hopes were somewhat dashed by the concluding observation of the hon. Member, that he trusted the Government would give some satisfactory explanation which would enable him to vote against the proposed reduction. That was the course taken by many other hon. Members after they had crossed from one side of the House to the other, as he should presently show. He would not now attempt to discuss the important question of the registration of deeds or titles. That had been argued at great length in that House for years, and had been reported upon by Committees and Commissions, and would not now be properly discussed in the few observations with which he would trouble the Committee. He would, however, express his entire concurrence in one part of the hon. Member's speech, in which he admitted that if the Office was abolished or reduced, compensation must be awarded to the officers who had done their duty faithfully, and given effect to such powers as were vested in them. This was necessary in the interests of the Public Service, for good men could not be got to leave their professions, unless compensation were to be awarded to them if the office which they were induced to enter was abolished. The only alternative would be to offer them very largely increased salaries, which the Committee would hardly be prepared to grant. But this alternative would fail, in his opinion, to secure good and able men. He would prefer to face the compensation question rather than keep an useless Office on the Votes. Certainly, the history of this Office was peculiar. In 1879 an attempt was made to reduce the salaries, and he had then argued that it would be unfair, without notice, as it were, to take such a step, though he would not continue to vote for it unless improved. But the present Secretary of State for the Home Department, then in Opposition, would not hear of such an argument. He wanted to know what the House was sitting in Committee for, if salaries could not be altered? He said the duty of the Committee would be a farce if this argument were to apply; and his name appeared in the Division List for the reduction. The right hon. Gentleman the present Chancellor of the Exchequer expressed much the same view. The majority was only obtained that year in the belief and on the understanding that more work would be found for the Office, if it was to be continued. But then came the change of Government, and with it an apparent change of opinion and votes. It was true that the present Chancellor of the Exchequer still held that the constitution and working of the Office was unsatisfactory, and the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General agreed; but they voted for the salaries. In 1881 no Division took place. In 1882 again the Office was attacked, and the hon. and learned Attorney General stated that it was proposed to add to the work by adding the work of the Middlesex Registry Office to it. In 1883 the hon. and learned Attorney General said this attempt had failed; and this year another attempt had been made to take the same step. But this plan, even if sufficient, had not met with the approval of the House; and, as far as he (Sir Henry Holland) knew, no other attempt had been made to increase in any other way the duties of the Office. And now the Committee were asked again to vote in support of this Office, which had been proved to be practically useless. It could hardly be contended that, at all events, some considerable reduction might not be made in it, and he should support the proposed reduction as a protest against this continued waste of money.

MR. COURTNEY said, his hon. Friend the Member for Cambridge (Mr. W. Fowler) had remarked that this Vote was insupportable, and then immediately proceeded to give an argument in support of it. He (Mr. Courtney) had to point out that the gentleman who took this Office had enjoyed a large practice at the Bar previous to his acceptance of the post. It was, therefore, rather unreasonable to expect that a reduction of salary should be made in the case of an official who had sacrificed a large practice to take a post of this kind on the faith of Parliament, even granting that the amount of work at present was not sufficient for the Staff. It was said, however, that they should abolish the Office altogether and pension the office-holders; but if they were to do that, they would practically make up their minds to do without land registry altogether. They could not keep those officials at the Office and reduce their salaries, on the faith of which they were induced to give up their practice; and if it was intended to develop this Office, it would be very rash and very false economy to retire them.

MR. HASTINGS said, there could be no doubt that the present position of the Office was very little short of a public scandal. As a matter of fact, they were asked to vote £5,000 a-year for an Office which really did no work at all. Personally, he was of opinion it would be better to develop the Office, if possible; and what he complained of was that things should go on, year after year, in the same make-shift fashion. There was a great work to be done in registration, and this Office ought to be put to do it. Not many weeks ago he was one of a deputation who submitted to the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General (Sir Henry James) a Memorandum from the Law Amendment Society dealing with the subject; and he (Mr. Hastings) thought that anyone who would take the trouble to read that Memorandum would see that there was a great work to be done in connection with land registration. There had been for many years a system of land registration in force in the whole of our Australian Colonies; and he believed that, at the present moment, there was an effort being made to extend the system to Canada. The system had been extended to other parts, and wherever it had been put in force it had proved a great success. What he and others asked was that the Government should turn their attention to the subject, and that if they found that the system had not succeeded, or was not applicable to this country, they should, at least, tell Parliament why they came to that conclusion. They had a right to know why, when there was a Land Registry Office which cost £5,000 a-year, no effort was made to extend to England the system of land registration which had conferred such great benefit on many parts of Her Majesty's Dominions. He had not the least doubt that a similar land registration was perfectly feasible in this country, all the more feasible now that a Cadastral Survey was being carried out in the Kingdom. The whole of the difficulties in the way of registration vanished as soon as that Survey was made. The question of Land Law Reform was really dependent upon thoroughly good land registration. He trusted that Her Majesty's Government would show, in some future Session of Parliament, that they were alive to the question, and that they would endeavour, either by the adoption of the Torrens' system now in force in Australia, or some other system, to give the people of this country the benefit of land registration.

MR. GREGORY said, he did not propose to enter into a discussion of the whole system of land registration; but as he had been referred to by the hon. Member for Cambridge (Mr. W. Fowler) he felt bound to offer a few remarks. He might say, at once, that he was in favour of a registration of deeds, and that he believed the failure of this Office to be due to the fact that it was an Office for the registration of titles, and not of deeds. What the Government could do was to convert the Office into one for the registration of deeds, and of that he was entirely in favour. The Government had introduced a Bill for that purpose, and the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Launceston (Sir Hardinge Giffard) had introduced a Bill of the same character, though carrying the object somewhat further. Both the Bills had been read a second time, and his suggestion, adopted by the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Courtney), was that they should be referred to a Select Committee. In the event of those Bills, or either of them, becoming law, the Office would be necessary. In his opinion, it would be absurd to abolish the Office now; besides they could not do so without full compensation to the present officials. It was requisite, in the public interest, that they should weigh very carefully such a step, because it was evident that no one would accept an Office on the contingency of its success or failure. It was quite true that the present Registrar had given up a very valuable practice to take the Office. Under the circumstances, the hon. Gentleman the Member for Salford (Mr. Arthur Arnold) would do well not to press his Motion.

MR. ARTHUR ARNOLD said, the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gregory) had fallen into a slight error. The hon. Gentleman stated that Her Majesty's Government proposed to convert the Office into an Office for the registration of deeds. That was not the case. Under the Bill of the Government, the Office would remain an Office for the registration of titles; but there would be a registration of deeds as well as of titles in the same Office. He feared that would result in great complication. His hon. Friend the Member for East Worcestershire (Mr. Hastings) had spoken of the development of the Office; but the Office could not be developed through the present Registrar. He desired to speak of the Registrar with great respect; but he was bound to say it was absolutely impossible to develop the Office, and make it a really effective registry of titles through the gentleman who now held the chief Office. The hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Courtney) had spoken of the opinion of Parliament on this subject. His hon. Friend had laid it down that Parliament would not sanction a Bill for the compulsory registration of titles. Considering that that was the only Parliament in which the hon. Gentleman had held Office, it would only have shown respect to the independence of private Members if he had not given utterance to so confident an opinion. The opinion of this Parliament had never been taken on the subject. A proper registration of titles to land was absolutely necessary before there could be any satisfactory settlement of Land Law Reform. He entertained one deep regret, and it was that that great lawyer, Earl Cairns, was not a Liberal statesman, because, in that event, he was persuaded the question of Land Law Reform would not have been so long delayed.

MR. BARRY said, that, although this Office was one of the greatest scandals in the Civil Service, it would be a distinct breach of faith if the Committee were to reduce the salaries of the officials. He regretted the Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Courtney) had no proposal to make which would put an end to the scandal. Was it not possible to give the gentlemen in the Land Registry Department some other appointment? There were a large number of appointments in the Civil Service. Surely, in the course of the year, opportunities would be found of placing the Land Registry officials in positions in which they would earn their salaries. It was very strange that the Government should say they were utterly helpless in this matter. He remembered the time when the sweets of Office destroyed the appetite for reform; but in this case it seemed an extremely simple matter to find some other work for the officials in question. If it happened that in one department of a large commercial concern there was a lack of work, and there was nothing whatever for the employés of that department to do, the common sense of the managers would prompt them to find work for the employés in some other department. He put it to the Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Courtney) why common sense should not operate in this case, and employment be found for the officials in some other branch of the Civil Service.

MR. COURTNEY said, the Middlesex Land Registry Bill was before the House, and under that Bill a great deal more work would be thrown upon the Office.

MR. BARRY asked if it was likely any change would be made in the immediate future?

MR. COURTNEY said, the Middlesex Land Registry Bill had been referred to a Select Committee, and the whole object of that Bill was to put the Office on a different footing, and give it additional work.

MR. HASTINGS said, that the business of the Middlesex Land Registry was altogether a great mistake, being a registration of deeds and not of titles; and he entertained a strong objection to hand over the Land Registry to any such body.

MR. MOLLOY said, he hoped that his hon. Friend (Mr. Arthur Arnold) would divide. The second reading of the Bill referred to had not obtained the assent of the House in reality, although it had done so nominally; and it was perfectly certain the measure would neither pass this year, next year, nor the year after that. The hon. Gentleman the Financial Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Courtney) simply asked to continue this sum in the Votes, because it was intended to combine with the Middlesex Registry another useless Office. His own opinion was that it was objectionable, in getting rid of one scandal, to create another just as great. He would request his hon. Friend to continue his opposition to the Vote, notwithstanding the defence of it by the Financial Secretary to the Treasury, which was really not of the slightest value.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(6.) £18,690, for Revising Barristers, England.

(7.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

MR. H. H. FOWLER said, he intended to take the sense of the Committee upon this Vote, as a protest against the charge for the London Police Courts being thrown upon the Imperial Exchequer. The cost ought to be borne by the Local Authorities, as it was in Manchester, Liverpool, and other towns. If the London Government Bill had passed, the Metropolitan Government would have had to meet the charge out of the rates. He begged to move the rejection of the Vote.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he was not prepared to argue against the principle of the proposal of his hon. Friend (Mr. H. H. Fowler), because he quite agreed with it, and was of opinion that the charge should be defrayed out of the Metropolitan rates. But his hon. Friend was, above everything, a practical man; and he (Sir William Harcourt) would ask his hon. Friend what would happen if he succeeded in rejecting the Vote? There would then be no Police Courts in London, and no one to carry on the administration of justice. Under the circumstances, he hoped his hon. Friend would not press the Motion to a Division.

MR. ALDERMAN W. LAWRENCE said, that his hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. H. H. Fowler), in moving the rejection of the Vote, had done so because he considered that charges of this kind ought to be paid by the Metropolis, and that they should not come out of the Imperial Exchequer. The objection of his hon. Friend did not apply to the City of London, because the City paid for its own Police Courts. Those of the Metropolis outside the City had, however, always been paid for by the country; and if a charge of this nature were struck out of the Votes, it must not be forgotten that the Metropolis paid a considerable number of charges out of the local rates, such as the rates for the Royal Parks, Palaces, the Foreign Office, Home Office, Admiralty, War Office, Somerset House, the Barracks, the Tower of London, the Post Office, and other public buildings, which ought to fall upon the public generally. A large number of institutions of this kind were spread over the Metropolis; and if they were rated as other property was for drainage, sanitary precautions, and for the poor and general rates, the taxation of the inhabitants of London would be considerably relieved. At present, these public buildings escaped from contributing their fair share to local taxation, and the consequence was that the Metropolis had to pay a much larger sum than it ought to pay. He had very little doubt that the inhabitants of London paid in this way a much larger sum than they were relieved from in consequence of the cost of the Metropolitan Police Courts being defrayed by the Imperial Exchequer. Take the Fire Engine Establishments. A small and inadequate sum was contributed towards their maintenance by the large Government establishments, although a regular sum was charged upon every other description of property for their support, and the Government establishments enjoyed the full share of the protection which they afforded. The sum paid by the Government towards local taxation, on behalf of the Government establishments, was simply ridiculous compared with the value of the property and the services rendered; and the question raised by the hon. Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. H. H. Fowler) was, consequently, a very large and important one. He (Mr. Alderman Lawrence) maintained that, at the present moment, if the country paid its fair share of its local rates on account of the public establishments in London, they would have to bear a much larger burden than they now bore for the expense of the Metropolitan Police Courts, and, probably, one or two other small matters. It could not be said that his hon. Friend had brought forward any arguments for throwing the cost of these Courts upon the ratepayers of London; and he understood that his hon. Friend simply wished to take a division. But it was impossible to allow the matter to pass altogether without notice, because the charge made amounted to an allegation that the Metropolis was robbing the country. [An hon. MEMBER: Certainly.] He did not agree with the hon. Member; but, on the contrary, he contended that the Metropolis paid much more than its fair share of the cost of the public establishments. It contributed largely towards the expense of keeping up the Royal Palaces and Parks, the barracks, and other public buildings, and much more largely than there would be any necessity for, if these public establishments paid, as other establishments were obliged to do, towards the local taxation of the Metropolis.

Mr. H. H. FOWLER said, he did not propose to take up the time of the Committee with any lengthened remarks. The question was a very simple one, and was thoroughly understood. But after the peculiar position which had been taken up by his hon. Friend (Mr. Alderman W. Lawrence) in defence of the Metropolis, he desired to point out that the arrangements under which the Government establishments paid local rates did not apply to London alone, but to every borough in England. In Manchester, Leeds, Birmingham, and other towns, there were large public establishments, as well as in London, and the same arrangement was applied to all of them. He should be quite ready, whenever the day came, to strike a balance between the Imperial and local expenditure. He did not anticipate any great accession of Members to the Metropolis; but he had no doubt that whoever might be sent to the

... Mr. Alderman W. Lawrence

House of Commons to represent the Metropolitan constituencies would, as soon as they got there, endeavour to protect the pockets of the ratepayers of London at the expense of the rest of the country. At the same time, he was satisfied that, whenever the question was raised at the hustings of the Kingdom generally, there would be a strong expression of opinion that London should bear its own local burdens exclusively, and that the country should bear theirs. His right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department had said that he (Mr. H. H. Fowler) was a practical man. He was obliged to his right hon. Friend for the compliment, and it was simply upon that ground that he intended to take issue upon his Motion for the rejection of the Vote. No difficulty would arise, even if the Vote were rejected. The salaries of the Metropolitan Police Magistrates were not included in the Vote, but were provided by the Consolidated Fund. The expenses of the Courts were also provided for until next October. He, therefore, intended to take a division as a protest against the present state of things. If the Vote were rejected, he had no doubt that his right hon. Friend would at once bring in a Bill, which could be disposed of in a few days, imposing upon the Metropolitan Board of Works the charge that was necessary for keeping the Police Courts of London in order. He was not at all sanguine that he would be able to carry his Motion; but he should certainly take a division as a protest against the principle of London—he would not use the word “robbing,” suggested by his hon. Friend the Member for the City (Mr. Alderman Lawrence)—but confiscating the property of the country for the benefit of the wealthy ratepayers of London.

Question put.

(8.) £279,875, to complete the sum for the Metropolitan Police.

(9.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1885, for certain Expenses connected with the Police in Counties and Boroughs in England and Wales and with the Police in Scotland."

Mr. SEXTON said, he had given Notice some days ago, chiefly for the information of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department, that he intended to move the reduction of this Vote. He rose now, accordingly, to move that the Vote be reduced by the sum of £5,000; and he did so in order to call the attention of the Secretary of State and of the Committee to some circumstances connected with an Orange riot and fatal affray which occurred at Cleator Moor, near Whitehaven, in the County of Cumberland, on the 12th of the present month. He would state in a few words what happened. The town of Cleator Moor had a population of about 10,000. It was the centre of a mining district, and one-half of the population of the town and a large part of the surrounding population were comprised of persons of Irish nationality and of the Roman Catholic faith. For that reason the Orange leaders in the North of England had, until the present year, for some years abstained from holding any of their national meetings or festivities in the vicinity of Cleator Moor; but, unfortunately, this year the evil counsels of some of the local leaders resident in the town of Cleator Moor were allowed to prevail, and a desire to violate the peace of the town and to insult the Catholic inhabitants took the ascendancy, and had the effect of counteracting the prudent course which had hitherto been taken. It was resolved to hold a public meeting this year in the vicinity of Cleator Moor. There were, however, local reasons why the Orange leaders should have avoided holding a demonstration in this particular district; because the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department would remember that some years ago a person named Murphy, describing himself as a convert from the Roman Catholic Church, gave a series of public lectures, and issued a number of insulting handbills, the staple of his lectures consisting of foul and exasperating attacks upon the doctrines of the Roman Catholic Church. At last, in the town of Whitehaven, this person's harangues produced such an effect that a serious riot occurred, in which the unhappy man received such injuries that he subsequently died of them. This event produced an excited and dangerous state of feeling between persons of different creeds in this part of the North of England; and, therefore, it ought to have suggested itself to those who were responsible for the Orange demonstration on the 12th of the present month that if they desired to vindicate or advance Orange principles in the North of England, they ought to have selected a different place. On this part of the case he thought there would be no difference of opinion. He now came to consider the conduct of the local magistrates and police in reference to this meeting. The Orange Society was not a thing of yesterday. Its principles, its methods of proceeding, and its objects were well ascertained, and were familiarly known. They all knew that the Society had been founded for the purpose of commemorating certain events in Ireland, which had had the effect of placing the Roman Catholic people of that country for more than a century under the merciless heel of Protestant ascendancy, which led the way to those Penal Laws which formed the most disgraceful chapter in the history of English rule in Ireland, and which no man in these days attempted to justify or defend. To go no further back than the past year, the magistrates and the police in the North of England knew well what had been the course pursued by the Orange leaders in Ireland, and what fatal results had followed on different occasions when they had assembled the Orange Party together. They knew that the Orangemen had been told to keep powder in their revolvers, and not to fire them off in the gaiety of their hearts, nor to shoot unless they had somebody in front of their weapons. They knew that wherever the Orangemen had assembled in Ireland they had used deadly weapons; that they had used them on the occasion of the right hon. Gentleman's (Sir Stafford Northcote's) visit to Belfast and Dromore; on the occasion of Lord Rossmore's mock heroic demonstration in Derry, at Roslea, and at a public meeting only a few days ago at Newry. On all those occasions, the two distinguishing features which marked the attempts made by the Orangemen against the lives of those who differed from them in religious creed were, first of all, the ferocious deadliness of the attempt to take away human life; and, secondly, the cowardliness of those who made them. They planted themselves on the roofs of houses, or concealed themselves behind walls, or wherever they could find a safe ambush, and then made a deliberate attack, with deadly weapons, upon the lives of their opponents. They knew what had happened in the county of Tyrone. Only the other day, in order to prevent the holding of a peaceful and perfectly legal meeting, the Orangemen poured in from distant places carrying sacks full of revolvers. Their sole object was to prevent, by intimidation and acts of violence, the citizens from exercising their Constitutional rights; and as they persistently refused to obey the orders of those who were intrusted with the execution of the law, and the preservation of the peace, the Constabulary found themselves obliged to eject them from the scene by force of arms; and in the pursuit one misguided youth, brought in from a distance, met with his death at the hands of the police. This having been the prelude, and these being facts that were familiar in the minds of everyone in the country, he respectfully submitted that when the members of the same Orange Society, distinguished in Ireland by their violence and lust of blood, notified their intention of holding a public meeting on English soil, and of transferring these violent and fatal feuds to this country, it was the duty of the magistrates and of the police, who were paid under the present Vote, to take special steps to prevent a breach of the peace. That was his first contention—namely, that if the magistrates had no information, further than their knowledge, of the notorious purposes and methods of the Orange Society, as proved by recent events in Ireland, and emphasized by debates in that House, of their own motion they ought to have taken steps to prevent the loss of life or any violation of the law. But the magistrates of themselves did nothing. The next step in his argument was that the magistrates and the police were fruitlessly moved to take effective action. The Catholic priest of Cleator Moor, the Rev. Father Burchall, went before the bench of local magistrates and informed them of his desire to swear an information that he apprehended a breach of the peace; that an Orange meeting could not be held in the midst of an excited people without great danger; and that he had reliable information that the Orangemen were instructed to attend the meeting armed. Surely, the magistrates ought not to have needed such information, after the firing at Newry and the successful use of revolvers at Dro-more. But, far from accepting the statement of the Rev. Father Burchall, far from permitting him to lay the information he desired to make, the magistrates took no action whatever in regard to his statement; and he (Mr. Sexton) claimed that in treating with disregard and contempt the appeals of a gentleman who, by his position, by his local knowledge, by his interest in the people, and the high responsibilities of his sacred office, was entitled to peculiar consideration, were guilty of a gross dereliction of duty. The Rev. Father Burchall did not stop with the police and the magistrates. He wrote to the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department; and if it was necessary to fix the date of the fruitless appeal to the magistrates, it must have been at least a week before the unfortunate man, Tumelty, lost his life, because the letter to the Home Secretary was written on the 8th instant, at least a couple of days after the application to the magistrates. Having failed in his application to the magistrates on the 8th of July, Father Burchall posted a letter to the Secretary of State; but it was only several days after the fatal affray took place that the fact became known. As soon as it came to his (Mr. Sexton's) knowledge, he questioned the right hon. Gentleman, and it was not until he did so that the right hon. Gentleman made any acknowledgment of the fact that a letter had been addressed to him by Father Burchall. The right hon. Gentleman stated that it was received at the Home Office on the 9th—that was to say, that the Home Office had at least three full days, if they believed the information of the Catholic priest of Cleator Moor, for taking effective steps for the preservation of the public peace and the prevention of loss of life. He would ask the right hon. Gentleman who received that letter on the 9th; who opened it; who read it, and what became of it? Why was no action taken upon it? Was it opened by some subordinate clerk? Was it tossed aside by some careless official, or did it only come to the right hon. Gentleman's knowledge when Henry Tumelty was lying dead with an Orange bullet through his brain? The right hon. Gentleman said that it would have made no difference if the letter of Father Burchall had reached his hands in due course. [Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT assented.] The right hon. Gentleman nodded assent. Surely, if the letter had come to his knowledge on the 9th, it would have been within his competency, and would have been part of his duty, as one of Her Majesty's Principal Secretaries of State for Great Britain, to have suggested, at least, to the magistrates of Cleator Moor that it was their duty to obtain information, to ascertain if the fact was well founded, that the Orangemen proposed to attend the meeting armed; and, if so, that they were called upon to exert their powers as conservators of the public peace for the protection of life. He, therefore, held it to be a most calamitous circumstance, whatever the cause of it might have been, that the letter of Father Burchall, received on the 9th, in reference to a danger apprehended on the 12th, had become submerged in the Correspondence of the Home Office, and was only brought to light when the fatal event had occurred. The Home Office did not listen to Father Burchall. The right hon. Gentleman did not reply to him; the 12th of July arrived, and the Orangemen, to the number of 1,500, appeared on the scene, having been mostly conveyed by special train from various parts of the county. They were decorated with the regalia of the Order, and, accompanied by bands and banners, they marched to the place of meeting. Now, however trifling it might appear to be to Englishmen who were unacquainted with the internecine wars in Ireland, the mottoes upon these banners were of the most exasperating type; the Orangemen themselves were armed with swords and pikes, conspicuously displayed, while most of them carried hidden, but loaded, revolvers. They came with a deadly purpose in their hearts, and that murder was their intention from the outset could be made clear by their conduct from the earliest moment; because, on passing the Roman Catholic church, where religious services at the time were proceeding, instead of behaving themselves as men would behave who were desirous of avoiding all wanton acts of provocation, they uttered all manner of offensive cries, and played insulting Party tunes. The playing of Party tunes might seem to the right hon. Gentleman a trifle; but to Irish Catholics they brought to remembrance attacks upon their personal liberty, and of a long series of outrages upon an unoffending people. The Orangemen, as he had said, uttered exasperating cries, and, having proceeded to the place of meeting, delivered speeches of the usual character. The meeting being over, they left the field, and returned to the town towards the railway station, along a route about a mile in length. On several occasions when the Orange Societies in Ireland had issued placards, the Government had decided that they were not to be abridged in their rights, and police were collected in considerable numbers to protect them. At Dromore there had been a meeting of the same description as that at Cleator Moor, and there, also, a large number of Catholics opposed the aggressive tactics of the Orange Party. The whole of the circumstances were, to a large degree, analogous to those at Cleator Moor. The Executive assembled 800 Cavalry, 200 Infantry, and a force of police, all of whom were employed, not to separate opposing crowds, but to render a collision impossible. Did the right hon. Gentleman mean to tell the Committee that a body of men were likely to be able to march through the streets of a town carrying swords and spears without a probability of bloodshed? What the police at Cleator Moor ought to have done was to have instructed the Orangemen to take a different route to the station, and so have prevented a collision. This was how the fatal collision occurred, according to the report. The Orange Party were armed with pistols, swords, and spears; they were dressed in the Orange costume, carried flags and banners, and were accompanied by bands of music. One of the Orangemen thrust a flag in the faces of some of the crowd, whereupon the opposing crowd, consisting of about 6,000 people, rushed in on the Orange Party; several blows were struck, and the encounter resulted in the death of the boy Tumelty. The police only numbered 45, instead of 500 or 1,000, and they contented themselves with walking in the rear of the procession, allowing the collision to take place, the peace to be broken, and life to be taken; and now the right hon. Gentleman argued that the police should be acquitted, because, after the collision, and after life was taken, and after dangerous wounds had been inflicted upon several persons, they separated the parties. He maintained that the collision ought to have been absolutely prevented, as was frequently done in Ireland. The course taken by the Irish Executive for preventing collisions in Ireland was far more intelligent than that pursued by the English police. The general effects of the methods, and purposes, and acts of the Orange Society were sufficient to have caused the magistrates to have provided a special force of sufficient strength to prevent a collision. In the second place, the local magistrates, on the request of the Rev. Father Burchall, ought to have invited him to lay an information, and on his doing so, and swearing that the Orangemen would come armed, they ought to have considered whether it was their duty to prevent the meeting. In the third place, it appeared that some of the officials were guilty of the most grave and deplorable neglect of duty in allowing the solemn letter of the priest, who wrote with a view of preserving the public peace, and of preventing loss of life, to remain unnoticed for a week. Further, the police ought to have provided a sufficient force to prevent the two crowds coming together, and instead of allowing the excited Orangemen to go along the high road until they came into collision with the Catholics, they should have directed them to go by some other route, or else should have compelled the Roman Catholic crowd to keep back. With regard to the matter of arrests, it was clear that the Orangemen were the only Party armed, and that they alone gave deliberate provocation; the Catholics were victims of Orange ferocity; and yet the energy of the police was ironically illustrated by the fact that they arrested five or six of the Orange Party, but subsequently arrested, at 5 o'clock in the morning, six or seven of the Catholics, whom they took out of their beds. He threw upon the Government the responsibility of the violent death of this unfortunate youth Tumelty; and for the vindication of justice against those who caused his death, and inflicted wounds upon other persons, he begged to move the reduction of the Vote by £5,000.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I am obliged to speak upon this subject with more reserve than the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton); because, although he has stated, with great confidence, the facts of this case, which are now necessarily under the consideration of the Courts of Law, I cannot take the same licence that he has taken. With regard to the history of this matter, I shall not offer any plea in vindication of these wretched Party processions. I could give no encouragement to Party processions, especially to those which are embittered by the odium theologicum, which are the worst of all. All I have to do in the matter is to consider whether these processions are unlawful or not. When I first came to the Home Office I found a tradition well established in that Office—a very sensible tradition. I am bound to say that, in England, we have little trouble with Party processions, except those which the hon. Member has called Irish religious processions. They do not involve English antagonism of feeling; but in Liverpool and Glasgow, and some other towns, these Orange processions have given a great deal of trouble and caused riots; and I found that the Law Officers had laid down the doctrine that if an information were sworn that a procession was likely to lead to a breach of the peace, the magistrates should declare such procession to be unlawful. That was a good and sensible doctrine, I thought, and I wished it had turned out to be the law. But, unfortunately, the law does not always turn out to be as we could wish; and this doctrine—which served us very well in regard to Salvation Army disturbances, which have sometimes approached in severity Orange riots, for we had, with good effect, advised the magistrates that when they thought there would be a breach of the peace, they should put a stop to these meetings by proclamation — this doctrine the Courts of Law decided could not be sustained, and that magistrates had no power to proclaim such meetings. From that moment the situation became extremely difficult for local magistrates. When the magistrates anticipated a row, and had only a small force of police, they did not know what to do when there was a gathering of the Salvation Army and the Skeleton Army. I regret that state of things very much. With regard to these occurrences at Cleator Moor, I must say that I think the Orangemen were foolish to go to Cleator Moor; but the hon. Member seems to think that the magistrates ought to have declared their meeting unlawful; but, after the decision of the Courts of Law, the magistrates could not have undertaken to declare the meeting unlawful. The hon. Member says the meeting should have been declared unlawful, because the Orangemen were to carry arms; but I am not prepared to say that the mere possession of arms on the part of those going to a meeting constitute an unlawful meeting. With respect to the Rev. Father Burchall, what was it that he asked the magistrates to do? He asked them to prohibit the meeting, and he asked me to do so. Why did he ask this? Because he knew that his own flock would attack the Orangemen. He did not believe the Orangemen had brought these arms with the intention of using them; but he knew that the Catholic Party would be so offended that they would attack the Orangemen. That is an exactly similar case to the case of the Salvation and Skeleton Armies. In some cases the friends of the Salvation Army have said that they knew that if the Army held a meeting the Skeleton Army would attack them; but the magistrates have held that the Salvationists were not to be treated as aggressors, because the Skeleton Army were likely to attack them. That is exactly the case here. The Orangemen arrived on Cleator Moor. I have no doubt they were absurdly dressed, and may have carried absurd emblems; but if they had been left alone no harm would have been done. As to their having these arms with them, this is not a case like the Derry riots, in which Orangemen are armed to attack other people. If the Orangemen had been left alone, nothing would have happened, and nobody anticipated that anything would happen. The Catholics, however, were determined to attack the Orangemen. The hon. Member says that the magistrates despised the warning of the Rev. Father Burchall, and did nothing; but there he was altogether misinformed.

MR. SEXTON: He told the magistrates that he desired to swear an information.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: He wanted to swear an information that he was under the impression that the meeting would lead to a disturbance; but the magistrates told him that it was of no use to swear an information, because they could not prevent the meeting. The hon. Member is wrong in supposing that the magistrates did nothing. The magistrates thought the matter a very grave one, and gathered together 45 police constables. The hon. Member may not think that a large force. The ordinary force in that district would not have been more than half-a-dozen constables; but, on this occasion, they had the Chief Constable on the spot, and magistrates ready to read the Riot Act, if any disturbance occurred. Therefore, so far from their having neglected the warning of the Rev. Father Burchall, they expected that something serious might take place, and they collected a large force of police. I very much regret that the rev. gentleman's letter to me should have been treated in what must appear to him a discourteous manner. I do not like to throw the blame on other people, but would rather take it upon myself. What happened was, that the letter was put into the letter-box by my Private Secretary. When I get a number of letters, those which I do not answer myself are answered by my Secretary; and others, which I have not time to dispose of, are put into the box to be dealt with by him. By some error — and I should wish it to be supposed to be my own, rather than someone else's — it was imagined that I had seen this letter, and on the day after that it arrived I found it endorsed — "Seen by the Secretary of State." If I had thought that the neglect of that letter had produced any serious consequences, I should be the first to confess it; but it produced no such effect. I will say at once what I should have answered. I should have said that I was sorry that Mr. Burchall's application for the stoppage of the meeting could not be granted; because the law had declared that the magistrates could not prevent such a meeting, but that I would forward the letter to the magistrates, although I observed that he had already written to them, as well as to myself. I could not have instructed them as to what force to send, or as to what they were to do. So much, therefore, for my part in this matter. But I am prepared to maintain that the magistrates acted perfectly properly in the matter. They got together all the constabulary they could, and the force was one which was competent to deal with the case. The magistrates were there ready to read the Riot Act; but it was not necessary to do that, because, after the first collision, the police overpowered the mob. Therefore, the magistrates did collect a sufficient force to deal with the matter; and if it had not been for the unfortunate fact that the Orangemen were armed, nothing serious would have taken place. But I cannot allow this matter to be treated entirely from a one-sided point of view. The Orangemen may have been very foolish; but the Catholics were totally unjustified in attacking them with stones. They were four times the strength of the Orangemen. The hon. Member says that the Orangemen were the aggressors, and gave the provocation; but what provocation is proved? One man thrust a flag in the faces of some others. That is a thing which happens every day or so; but it would not justify 6,000 men in attacking another party. That is a thing which happens at every election, and for a mob of 6,000 men to throw stones at another party for such an act is a proceeding totally unjustifiable. To talk of thrusting a flag in the faces of several people as a serious provocation and as a justification of an attack of the kind which took place in this case is unreasonable. Therefore, I cannot say, much as the occurrence is to be deplored, especially the death of this boy, who took no part in the transaction, that the magistrates were to blame. What does the hon. Member say ought to be done in a case of this kind? He says the Government, or the magistrates, ought to have summoned a force of 800 or 1,000 men. But that is totally impossible. In Ireland, where there is a constant state of semi-civil warfare going on, there are plenty of police available; but in England we are not in the habit of having 1,000 men constantly ready to deal with a Salvation Army, or a Skeleton Army, or with processions of Catholics or Orangemen. ["Hear, hear!"] A small body of police is quite sufficient to deal with disturbances, and it cannot be held that whenever a row is expected 800 men are to be gathered together. This is really introducing into England from Ireland ideas with which we are not familiar. I cannot condemn the magistrates on this account. As far as I can see, they acted with prudence, and collected an adequate force, and very soon put an end to the difficulty, although an unfortunate shot produced a fatal result. No serious charge, therefore, I think, is to be brought against either the magistrates or the police. And now, what has taken place since? I wrote to the magistrates telling them that the proper thing to do was to get hold of the principal offenders without partiality, and that they have done. They have been active in arresting the ringleaders on both sides. The hon. Member says that only one Party was guilty, and that that was the Party which it appears was attacked. The Orangemen had attacked nobody. The whole row arose from the Catholics attacking the Orangemen. [Mr. SEXTON: No.] The hon. Member may say No; but, so far as the facts are stated in the Papers we have received, there was no attack with the exception of this waving of flags in somebody's face. We do not in England call waving a flag in a man's face an attack. If a man waves a flag in my face, I do not call it an attack, and I should not feel justified in throwing stones at him in consequence. If a man waves a flag in another man's face, and the other man throws a stone back, I should call the man who threw the stone the attacking party. So far as I can see, the magistrates have been perfectly impartial in endeavouring to seize all the leaders who were guilty of violence on this occasion. Whether one party was more in the wrong or used more violence than the other must be decided before the tribunal before which the case must come. But I do not see that the hon. Member has made out any case against the magistrates or the police.

Mr. PARNELL said, that however the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Sir William Harcourt) might suppose that he had made out his case, he had not made it out with regard to one point on which he chiefly relied—namely, that the magistrates had no legal power to proclaim the meeting in question. He thought the right hon. Gentleman unduly under-estimated the proceedings of the Orangemen on that day, and also the gravity of that movement, which appeared to have been transferred from Ireland—having been put down by the magistrates in that country—and to have come within the jurisdiction of the right hon. Gentleman himself. He (Mr. Parnell) was sorry to listen to the speech of the right hon. Gentleman, because he could not help thinking that it would be taken by Orangemen as an indirect incitement to continue these deplorable proceedings. That was not the first time in which the right hon. Gentleman had taken the side of the aggressor in attacks upon Roman Catholics by Orangemen in England. He (Mr. Parnell) recollected that, in 1882, an English village was cleared out of the whole of its Irish population under circumstances of great barbarity towards these unfortunate people. The right hon. Gentleman, on the occasion in question, in his remarks in that House, did as much as he could to excuse the doings of the malefactors, and to render the position of the Irish labouring population still more difficult with regard to earning their bread. Now, he protested against the tone of the right hon. Gentleman's speech, and he believed it would lead to further proceedings of the same character on the part of Orangemen. It must be borne in mind that these were not all Irishmen—they were chiefly Englishmen. The right hon. Gentleman was good enough to say that he would not regard the waving of a flag in his face as any provocation to him; but the mere waving of a flag was not what took place on the occasion in question. According to the Report of the Chief Constable of the district, which had been read out by the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department in the House a few nights ago, the disturbance commenced in this way—One of the Orangemen thrust a flag in the faces of some of the crowd. It was well known that flags were attached to poles, the ends of which projected several inches, if not a foot, beyond the drapery which composed the flags. He did not know whether the right hon. Gentleman had ever had a flag thrust in his face—that was to say, whether he had had a pike thrust in his face; but, if so, he (Mr. Parnell) was inclined to think that he would have been very much disposed to gain possession of the flag-staff, and retaliate in kind, and that he would not treat the occurrence with such levity as he had done that evening. But, entirely apart from the question as to who commenced the disturbance, although from the Report of the Chief Constable there could be no manner of doubt about that, the right hon. Gentleman had received full warning by letter from the Rev. Mr. Burchall, that the Orangemen intended to go to Cleator Moor to attend a meeting of the character of which the local magistrates had also full, due, and timely notice from the same source. He was inclined to ask hon. and learned Gentlemen present, with the greatest respect to the Secretary of State, whether a procession armed with revolvers, and known to be armed with revolvers and other weapons, was not an illegal procession; and whether it did not constitute an illegal assembly? The decision which was given by the Courts, and quoted by the right hon. Gentleman the other day, was with regard to an illegal assembly of an entirely different character, because it had reference to an assembly of persons not armed; but a number of men proceeding in a disciplined body with deadly weapons in their possession, and vowing their determination to use those weapons, as his hon. Friend (Mr. Sexton) had described, and going out of their way to meet persons upon whom they might use them—such persons could not be held to constitute a peaceable, orderly, or legal assembly, and as an illegal assembly there was surely some power in the Secretary of State to have prohibited it. And he wished to draw attention to another question. The right hon. Gentleman had been asked some days ago, before this occurrence took place, whether a constable could not arrest, search, and take proceedings against any persons whom he supposed to be carrying a revolver without a licence?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: The hon. Member is mistaken; I do not remember any such Question being put to me.

MR. PARNELL: If it was not asked of the right hon. Gentleman, it was asked of one of his Colleagues; and the reply was that the constable had the power to do that.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I think the answer must have been that, in case of suspicion of intent to do bodily harm, a constable would have power to arrest. That would be the more legal form of answer.

MR. PARNELL said, he did not think there was any qualification in the case in question. He should be within the remembrance of the Committee, who could correct him; and if his memory served him aright, he believed the Question put was with regard to the carrying of arms without a licence simply as a breach of the Excise Law, and that the answer was that any person could search or take proceedings against a person whom they suspected of carrying weapons contrary to the Excise Law. Well, then, the carrying of revolvers without licences involved a breach of the Excise Law. The magistrates were warned that this assembly of Orangemen were going to carry deadly weapons; and, moreover, on their march, they flourished some of these within sight of the police. He submitted that, under the law, even supposing that the right hon. Gentleman had made out his contention—that it was impossible, under the recent decision of the Courts in 1881, for the magistrates or the Home Office to stop these processions—he submitted that, under the law, it was possible for the police to have surrounded the procession, and for them to have arrested and disarmed the people, carrying these weapons as was done in Ireland under the ordinary law, when people were searched, and revolvers taken from them in sackfuls. That, he said, was the plain course which ought to have been followed; it was a course which would have prevented loss of life, and it was a course which could have been taken within the law. Surely, the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department did not mean to say that he regarded the prospect of processions and meetings of Orangemen in England with equanimity. Was that what the right hon. Gentleman intended to convey to the Committee? Because he would have to face the question what would be done on the other side. Did the Government suppose that the other side could not buy revolvers as well as Orangemen? Did they suppose that when the next procession which came into an Irish district in England, where a vast proportion of the population were Irish, that the latter would wait for the Orangemen to shoot them down? That seemed to be the idea which underlay the speech of the right hon. Gentleman. [Cries of "No, no!"] Well; but the right hon. Gentleman had offered those people, under the circumstances, no hope of protection; he declared that the law was powerless to assist them, which was equivalent to saying that they must protect themselves. Now, he had pointed out the way in which processions, either of Orangemen or of Irish Nationalists, if they took to the use of arms, which the latter had never done either in Ireland or in England, could legally have their arms taken from them. If those arms could not be legally taken from them in the way he had pointed out, he should be glad if the Secretary of State, with his superior legal knowledge, would point out the way in which it was possible to prevent persons attending these meetings and processions, when there was reason to believe they had deadly weapons in their possession. He pretended to no legal knowledge in this matter himself, and he had only given the reply of a responsible Minister to a Question recently put to him in that House. He asked the right hon. Gentleman whether it was not possible to direct the magistrates to take some steps such as he had indicated, the next time a procession of the kind went into their district, whether Irish Nationalists or Orangemen, when there was reason to suppose that they had deadly weapons in their possession, would be stopped; and whether those who carried such weapons in defiance of the Excise Law would be deprived of them? It seemed to him that both the magistrates and the right hon. Gentleman had the matter entirely within their own power, and that the right hon. Gentleman had no excuse, on the ground of the failure of the law, to supply him with the necessary means for this purpose. Well, he wished to go a little further, and he would say this—the Secretary of State seemed to think that there was an excuse for the resort to deadly weapons on the occasion in question, because, as he had alleged, an assault had been first committed by the National Party on the Orangemen, by the throwing of some stones. He (Mr. Parnell) had shown by the Report of the Chief Constable that the assault, legally and morally, first came from the ranks of the Orangemen. However, passing that by, he contended, notwithstanding the statement of the right hon. Gentleman, that no man was justified in resorting to the use of deadly weapons, unless he supposed that his own life was in danger.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: The hon. Member must have misapprehended me. I never intended to convey any such impression. Far from it; I am of opinion that such conduct is most improper, and most to be condemned. But I will say no more upon the subject, because the matter is under investigation.

MR. PARNELL said, he was bound to defer to the statement of the right hon. Gentleman. He accepted it fully, and to the utmost extent; but, certainly, the impression made by his statement the other day upon his mind was such as he had described. But he wished to reiterate that nobody was entitled, even under circumstances of great provocation, to resort to deadly weapons, except for the purpose of protecting his own life, and when he fully believed that he would lose his life if he did not do so. He believed that was the law; and he believed the result of these proceedings would be to show the Orangemen that they were not entitled to resort to the use of deadly weapons, even though children might hiss them, or even throw stones at them. He should be glad to hear from the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State, or some other Minister, a statement on this point. He would repeat that the reply of the Secretary of State had produced a most unfavourable impression on his mind. The right hon. Gentleman had his hands sufficiently full of Salvation Army riots, and other disorderly proceedings, without incurring additional riots of an Orange or Nationalist character. The right hon. Gentleman might depend upon it that if a little firmness were displayed the whole thing would be put down. Immediately the Irish Executive used the powers which they had for dealing with such business in Ireland the whole thing melted away like snow before the sun. He sincerely hoped that the right hon. Gentleman would not allow that wretched religious antagonism to come to a head in this country. He submitted that the Irish labourers and artisans living in England and Scotland, who were toiling fully earning their living, were entitled to some protection from the law. In the days when they first came over to England, driven by famine from their native country, they were treated as outcasts, and not entitled to the consideration given to their fellow-men. But that time had gone by, and he trusted the right hon. Gentleman would not allow the condition of things to be repeated under which these unfortunate men had dragged out their existence. Poverty-stricken they might be, many of them without education; but the Government should remember that the poverty and other evils which surrounded them in England were due to English misgovernment of Ireland in times past. He submitted that these people had a special claim on the Government for protection, and that the Government should see that its duty lay in affording them that protection by putting an end to the infamous attacks to which they had been subjected.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he desired to make a few remarks in answer to the moderate and reasonable speech of the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell). He entirely agreed with the hon. Member that the Irish population in this country deserved all the protection which could be given to them by Parliament and by the Government. England derived great advantage from their labour, which constituted a considerable portion of the national wealth, and they were entitled to quite as much protection and consideration from the Government as any other part of the population. He should deeply regret if, holding the scales as it were between the two Parties, any words of his could be considered as giving the smallest encouragement to that bitter feeling which he thought the Orangemen had displayed towards their opponents on the occasion in question. He repudiated the idea of such a thing, which he believed would be productive of considerable evil in England, as well as in Ireland. The hon. Member for the City of Cork had suggested several ways in which this matter could be dealt with. He asked whether the Secretary of State for the Home Department considered the present state of things satisfactory. His (Sir William Harcourt's) answer to that was, that he thought it most unsatisfactory, inasmuch as it placed the population and magistrates, in towns where there was not an overpowering body of police, in an almost helpless position on occasions such as these.

MR. SEXTON: Would not the Secretary of State for War send a regiment, if application were made by the magistrates?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, that was a last resort; not one to be used every day. The Secretary of State for War, had it been deemed necessary to do so, would have been able at once to place a military force at the disposal of the magistrates, there having been a force at Carlisle. But he did not think the present state of the law satisfactory, and he would very much like to establish what he believed would be a beneficial change in it—namely, that the magistrates should have power, upon well-founded apprehension of a breach of the peace, to prevent such breach of the peace. He had believed that power already existed; but the Judges had recently decided otherwise, and he was quite willing to introduce a Bill declaring that to be the law. He knew there might be a certain amount of jealousy, on the ground that this power might be used to prevent legitimate meetings; but he did not believe that result would follow. In his opinion, the magistrates, where the police force was not overpowering, and where the public peace was endangered, should have this power. Such was the remedy he proposed. But as to the remedy suggested by the hon. Member for the City of Cork, he did not think it would be efficient. In the first place, the Excise Law could do nothing as against the pikes; and, secondly, it could do nothing against persons who had an Excise licence, because any man could get a licence, and he should not wonder if these people had Excise licences at the time of the occurrence. Therefore, he did not think the proposal of the hon. Member would be effectual. He entirely agreed with the hon. Member that it was not because people were attacked that they were justified in using firearms. Such an act was most cowardly and monstrous. But he did not wish, seeing that the case was before the proper tribunals, to say more upon this subject than that he deeply deplored what had taken place, and that he hoped, from what had been said that evening, that he should be encouraged in introducing a measure to give power to the Local Authorities to prevent meetings when there was a well-founded apprehension of a breach of the peace.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS said, he agreed with much that had fallen from the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department. He had himself, in former times, been placed in a position of some difficulty, under circumstances similar to those which had been the subject of discussion that evening. They were not accustomed to see these disturbances in England as they were in Ireland; they were happily unknown here, and he need not say how deeply he regretted that anything in the nature of a demonstration on either side should have occurred which tended to produce a breach of the peace. The magistrates in this country were really in a very difficult position under such circumstances, because they very often had not at their disposal sufficient physical force to help them in case of disturbance. But the reason was obvious; because, as he had remarked, it was not the habit of the people in this country to have such meetings; they did not want them, and when they did occur it was on special occasions only. He had taken much pains to make himself acquainted with what had occurred at Cleator Moor, because he was naturally largely concerned and interested in an event which had taken place in a county adjacent to his own. Before concluding, he desired to pay a tribute to the judgment and excellent qualities of the Chief Constable in the district, than whom he believed there was no officer who more thoroughly knew, or more conscientiously acted up to, his duty. He was also bound to say that the observations of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department with reference to legislation on this subject were worthy of the fullest consideration; and he begged to assure him that any Bill which he might bring forward for strengthening the hands of magistrates in the direction indicated, should receive his conscientious attention, quite irrespective of Party views. No one could deplore more than he did the growing custom of carrying arms, and he should indeed be glad to see a stop put to it; for the danger connected with the practice in large towns, politically and otherwise, was extremely great. Finally, the remarks made upon this practice by the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell), were, in his opinion, worthy of the consideration of the House and of the country, and he trusted sincerely that they would be acted up to in their spirit.

MR. WILLIS said, he was sorry that the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department had not condemned, with all the authority of his position, the conduct of those persons in Cumberland which had brought this calamity on the district. It was true the right hon. Gentleman had condemned the spirit shown; but he (Mr. Willis) failed to hear any condemnation of the men who had weapons in their possession for the purpose of shooting down those who interfered with them. There was no justification for their carrying weapons for any such purpose; and, although it was well known that arms were at one time carried by English gentlemen, and although the Bill of Rights recognized the right of carrying arms, he did not believe that the law had ever sanctioned, or recognized, the right of a man to carry arms, with the intention of using them for the destruction of life in case another person interfered with him. This assembly, having been armed, was, in his opinion, an unlawful assembly from the first. When the Orangemen went out with the intention of using these weapons, in case they were assailed, they acted unlawfully; and, although he was opposed to anything that would interfere with the right of public meeting, properly so called, he was in favour of the magistrates putting down every meeting assembled under the circumstances described. He was sorry that the Secretary of State for the Home Department had not said that any person having a weapon in his possession, and being ready to use it if assaulted, was guilty of murder, if he happened to kill anyone. The right hon. Gentleman, he thought, dissented from that view. If he (Mr. Willis) accidentally had a revolver in his possession, and hastily used it, if he were assaulted, the killing of a man under these circumstances would only be manslaughter; but if, when he went out, he had put a weapon in his pocket with the intention of using it if he were assaulted, and while out he did use it, and unfortunately killed anyone, the crime would be that of murder. Nothing grieved him more than the growing indication they saw of the desire on the part of some members of the community to resort to force. He was glad to be able to say that he had never had a weapon in his hand in his life. Nothing would ever induce him to take one, and, as a consequence, his personal liberty and safety were secured. It was time to put down such scandalous proceedings as those under discussion; they were not to be compared for a moment with the proceedings of the Salvation Army; because, in that case, the people had gone out without weapons, and simply for the purpose of walking the streets, and it was only when violent and indefensible attempts of other processionists to interfere with them were made that riots were brought about. The men in the case under discussion had gone out with weapons in their possession, and with the determination to take advantage of any momentary exhibition of temper to provoke a breach of the peace and to use violence.

MR. SYNAN said, that the magistrates of the district in which the disturbance had occurred were informed, several days before the meeting, that if the Orange demonstration took place there would be danger to human life. A similar notice had been sent to the Home Office. What was it the duty of the magistrates to do on that occasion? Why, their duty plainly was this—either to act on the evidence they had received, or to call on their informants to make sworn informations. If they had acted on the evidence they had received, they could have obtained sufficient force to prevent any serious bodily injury being inflicted. The right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department seemed to take the view that the Salvation Army case was a precedent for this. That, however, he (Mr. Synan) could not agree with, because the Salvation Army meeting was a lawful meeting—it was a "lawful assembly," the people simply gathering together to sing hymns and recite prayers. He had never heard that a such an assembly was likely to injure human life, or that there was any danger of an exhibition of physical force in connection with it. What precedent was there in connection with such a meeting for another assembly of men armed with swords and spears and revolvers—what precedent could a Salvation Army gathering be for an assembly of 1,000 or 2,000 men armed in this manner on one particular day? Why, it had been established law for very many years that an assembly of that kind was an "unlawful assembly," and if the right hon. Gentleman had any doubt upon it he should have instructed someone to prosecute members of the assembly for the purpose of having the question decided, once for all, in a Court of Law. The right hon. Gentleman had said that the only authority to decide the matter was a Court of Law; but had he put it in such a course of training that a decision of a Court of Law would be taken upon it? The mere fact of the assault being brought before a magistrate, or before a Judge, would not decide the question of law as to whether the assembly was lawful or not; but if the right hon. Gentleman caused any member of the armed assembly to be arrested and taken before a Court of Law, the question would then be decided whether the armed gathering at Cleator Moor was an assembly similar to the Salvation Army, which collected in a village for the purpose of singing songs or reciting prayers. If an ordinary member of the Cleator Moor assembly were prosecuted, the Court of Law would then decide the matter, and, to his mind, hon. Members would find that the result would be a declaration that the Salvation Army case was no precedent for the other. His belief had been that the law of England, as established by all the authorities and all the books, was that an armed assembly which was likely to prove dangerous to any person or any body of men was an unlawful assembly, and that it ought to be put down by force, or that there should be such a force present as would prevent the assembly from using its arms against any innocent person. Was there such a force at present at Cleator Moor? Was a body of 45 policemen a sufficient force to prevent thousands of armed men from using their weapons against other men who rose up when they came into their village? The attack made by the villagers was no justification for the firing of arms. As his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Willis) had said, the firing of arms and the killing of any person, if the arms were carried without premeditation, would amount to manslaughter only; but if the arms were carried with premeditation, such shooting might amount to murder. He asked, therefore, why, under these circumstances, the magistrates had not brought together a sufficient force to prevent this large armed assembly from meeting? Why did not the magistrates take this course, having a full knowledge that the meeting was to take place, and that the men were to be armed? It seemed to him to be a very plain case, and he was astonished the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department, being a lawyer himself, should have any doubt at all about it. If the right hon. Gentleman had a doubt at all about it, he (Mr. Synan) would put it to him that it was his duty to settle the law and settle the doubt by prosecuting members of the meeting for being members of an "unlawful assembly." On a former occasion, the right hon. Gentleman had stated that he had caused some of the inhabitants of the village who threw stones to be arrested—he had insinuated that the guilty persons were the inhabitants of Cleator Moor. The right hon. Gentleman had said—"If I went out armed, and shot a man who threw a stone at me"—but he (Sir William Harcourt) would not form an "assembly," though he might be a host in himself. A man had a right to go armed for the protection of his own life. No one had a right to assault him, and if anyone did, and he used the weapon he happened to have about him for the purpose of protecting himself, he was adopting a course which he had a perfect right to adopt; but that was not the case with each individual member of an "unlawful assembly," which entered a town or a village of an unarmed people with the intention of using their arms against those unarmed people, if in the excitement of the moment they came out for the purpose of making a protest against the invasion of their streets. The two things were totally separate and distinct. If the assembly at Cleator Moor was an unlawful one, why were not the members of it prosecuted by the Government? He (Mr. Synan) maintained that the right hon. Gentleman had no foundation or basis for the law which he stated to the Committee, and which he quoted in defence of the action of the magistrates and his own action, or, rather, the inaction of the magistrates and his own inaction. Would the right hon. Gentleman say that he would now prosecute some of the members of this meeting as being members of an "unlawful assembly," in order to get the decision of a Court of Law on the subject? If he did that, he (Mr. Synan) would be satisfied, even at the eleventh hour, though, unfortunately, in this case an innocent life had been taken away. His hon. Friend the Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) was perfectly justified in bringing this case forward, and the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State could not take exception to it, as it had enabled him to place himself in a new light before the public—he had placed himself in the position of a denouncer of this Orange Party that entered the village of unarmed men. The right hon. Gentleman ought to be glad of this opportunity, and ought to welcome the chance of satisfying the Committee that he would carry it to a final issue, and have the question of law settled. If he did that, he (Mr. Synan), for one, should be perfectly satisfied.

MR. HEALY said, he could only attribute the lenient view the Government took of this assembly to the fact that they themselves had lately brought together a large mass of people in London for political purposes, and intended to do so again. He could not screen himself from the view that, if it had not suited the Government to have assembled just at this time some 500,000 of men in London, they would have heard a much stronger condemnation of the proceedings of the Orangemen at Cleator Moor than had been uttered by the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Sir William Harcourt). The right hon. Gentleman had told them now that the state of the law was such that the magistrates had no power to prevent a meeting. Well, that might or might not be so. Of course, hon. Members accepted the right hon. Gentleman's dictum on the point; but the assemblage having come together, and the Orangemen having met with spears, swords, and revolvers, and having used them with deadly effect, if the right hon. Gentleman had not been able to prevent them from assembling in the first place, he, at least, could deal with the members of the assembly or with their conduct afterwards. He (Mr. Healy) presumed that the law with regard to unlawful assemblies was not unknown to the right hon. Gentleman; and as this was entirely a matter affecting the English police, he (Mr. Healy) had taken the trouble to look up Mr. Howard Vincent's view in the English Police Code on the subject of unlawful assemblies. He quoted Mr. Howard Vincent for the reason of that gentleman being at the head of the English Police Force, and not as considering him any more authority than the writer of any other book on these matters, and this was what Mr. Howard Vincent said—

"An unlawful assembly is an assembly of three or four persons with intent to commit a crime, or to carry out any common purpose, lawful or unlawful, so as to afford reasonable grounds for apprehending a breach of the peace."

In this case the unlawful assembly had degenerated into a riot, and every single person connected with the assembly could now be indicted by the Government, if the Government had a mind to take that course. It was not merely a case of catching people in the act of shooting a man, but every man who was in the procession could be got at in the same way. The Secretary of State for the Home Department made very light of what the Chief Constable of the district spoke of as the fatal riot of Cleator Moor. No doubt, as the right hon. Gentleman had said, the disturbance commenced by the mere thrusting of a flag in a man's face. But that flag was carried on a pole, and he imagined that if a pole with a flag on it were thrust into the face of the right hon. Gentleman himself, his passive features would resent the annoyance, and he would be disposed to resist the attack with all the force at his disposal. The right hon. Gentleman had said that though the Orangemen used this violence, though they came down in large numbers by special trains from all parts of the country, brandishing their weapons and insulting the people—insulting the Catholics by smashing the panes of glass in their chapel—the people were to do nothing. The people did do nothing until this act of violence was offered. Hon. Members knew very well that where they had a powder magazine it only needed a spark to cause an explosion. Therefore, the right hon. Gentleman was wrong to make so little of an event which had led to a collision on the occasion in question. Let them suppose that, instead of being an assemblage of Orangemen, brought from a distance to march through a Catholic district, this had been a Fenian procession marching through the streets of London. Supposing the Fenians were to meet openly, as the Reformers met on Monday last on the Embankment; and supposing they carried swords and guns with them, and supposing that they marched on, waving flags and insulting the general population by whom they were surrounded, and supposing the excited crowd through which they proceeded was calm enough not to attack them, notwithstanding the insults they showered around, and notwithstanding the waving of their flags bearing devices insulting to the English people, if they thrust one of these flags in the face of an Englishman, how would the right hon. Gentleman have treated the riot, supposing that assault had been resented by the knocking down of a Fenian, and had led to that Fenian drawing a revolver and shooting one of the citizens? Why, he would have treated it in a very different manner. The speech of the right hon. Gentleman would arouse many evil passions in this country. The Irish Members had been accused of never having denounced violence and disorder. Well, the Irish Members, at least, had not the responsibility of Ministers of the Crown. They never had that responsibility, and they were never likely to have it; but here was a Minister of the Crown, who was practically, to a large extent, the conservator of peace in the country, getting up and speaking of a riot in which one man was killed, and scores had been wounded, without saying one single word against the practice of carrying arms. ["Oh, oh!" and "He did refer to it!"] Well, at any rate, the right hon. Gentleman had not mentioned it until it had been dragged out of him by the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell). In this initial speech the right hon. Gentleman had not one word to say about the carrying of arms; and it was not until the hon. Member for the City of Cork said—"If you do not defend these people, they will have to defend themselves," that the right hon. Gentleman, seeing to what conclusion his speech had led hon. Members, was obliged to utter some academic words against the practice of carrying arms. [Mr. GLADSTONE dissented.] But the right hon. Gentleman took great care to add—and he (Mr. Healy) would have the Prime Minister, who was shaking his head, to bear this in mind—"if they carry an Excise licence, I do not see how we could prevent them." In other words, dealing with an Orange demonstration—dealing with a body of men with hundreds of pounds at their command, and who, therefore, could easily obtain licences to carry arms—the right hon. Gentleman says—"The law may be against you, if you assemble with arms under ordinary circumstances; but, if your funds are large enough to procure licences, then you may go down and shoot Catholics, and no one will be able to punish you." The Catholics of Cleator Moor—a population of 6,000 people—had a foreign body brought from a distance amongst them, for the purpose of assembling and provoking them; and the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State, knowing that, and that there were only 45 police, brought, as the right hon. Gentleman had said, from far afield for the purpose of protecting the law, gave it to be understood that these were the only officers who could be got together to keep the peace between 1,200 armed men and 6,000 or 8,000 Catholics. If that were the case, it was surely a very regrettable state of things. How did they deal with these matters in Ireland? The right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State had made great capital, and had evoked the somewhat sneering cheers of his Friends by saying that in England they were not in the constant state of semi-civil war that they were in Ireland. The right hon. Gentleman had produced great laughter when he told them that in this country people were of a very calm and pacific habit of mind, and that it was only in Ireland that the people were of a wild and riotous disposition. But if in Ireland they were occasionally provoked to disorder, whose fault was it? Who kept up the Orange disorder in Ireland? Who, in 1848, distributed thousands upon thousands of arms to the Orangemen of Belfast? Of course, he did not intend to enter into that subject; but even Earl Spencer, a Member of the present Cabinet, some 10 years ago, when he was last in Office, and when there was some little difficulty in the country, took occasion to go to the North, where he was more welcome than he was at the present moment, to arouse the spirit of Orangism, and to incite Orangemen against the general body of Catholics. The Secretary of State, knowing that that was the state of things in Ireland, that the Orangemen had had the approval of the Government for centuries, that the Catholic population, not having Grand Juries to throw out bills against them for murder, usually got the worst of it, and that the law had been in favour of Orangemen, the hangman only being on the side of the Catholics, provoked the laughter of certain London Aldermen by congratulating the House on the smug contentment of England, which could afford to be content, not having been conquered itself, or, at least, having put up with its conquering. The right hon. Gentleman congratulated himself upon the fact that Englishmen could be oblivious to these demonstrations. He (Mr. Healy) believed that what would happen would be this—that the people of Cleator Moor, seeing that Orangemen could shoot with immunity, and could come down with force of arms without, so far as he could judge, any strong disapproval being manifested by the Secretary of State, would also bring arms, and, if they were again insulted in this way, would very probably feel inclined to use them; and if this did occur, the Government of Her Majesty the Queen, through the mouth of the right hon. Gentleman, would be distinctly responsible for that position of affairs. If the law in the Sittingbourne case had failed, how was it, he asked, that the Government in Ireland found no difficulty in preventing these assemblies? Before the Crimes Act was passed, the Government, as a matter of course, found no difficulty in putting a stop to any meeting that they found inconvenient. In Drogheda, for instance, two years ago, a meeting which had not been proclaimed was dispersed by Mr. Clifford Lloyd, who brought down by special train 200 policemen from Dundalk and a body of Cavalry. He brought his men down at the double, drew them across the streets, and levelled their bayonets at the breasts of the people, declaring, without reading a proclamation, that if they did not disperse, they would be shot down. If such a thing could be legally done in Ireland, where was the difficulty of dealing with the question in this country? If the Sittingbourne case tied the hands of the Government, why not prosecute the leaders of the assembly for riot? If the leaders knew that they would be indicted for holding an illegal assembly and for riot, he ventured to think they would soon give up the system of coming armed into a district where they knew that their presence would be provocative of disorder. But as to the statement made by the right hon. Gentleman, with regard to the necessity for a change in the law, he (Mr. Healy) could not follow him. To his (Mr. Healy's) mind, the law was sufficiently strong if it were only put into force. So far as the Irish people had been able to judge of it—and they had quite enough experience of it—the law was sufficiently strong. They could put down meetings without the Crimes Act, and they had their Constabulary, and they could give the order—"If you do not march, we will shoot you." He ventured to say that had the 45 constables at Cleator Moor displayed the same amount of vigour that the Royal Irish Constabulary would have displayed against the Nationalists, this murder would not have taken place. But the Government, who were so gingerly in dealing with these matters in England, found no difficulty in dealing with them in Ireland. If the Secretary of State for the Home Department were transplanted to Dublin Castle—[Sir WILLIAM HAROULT: No, no!—well, he joined with the right hon. Gentleman in protesting against such an event as that ever happening; but if the right hon. Gentleman, by any chance, should be transplanted, he would have no difficulty in learning how to deal with these assemblies. The right hon. Gentleman had told them that England not being in a state of semi-civil war, they did not want a large body of policemen. That might be so; but they always had large bodies of troops to rely on, and there could not be the slightest doubt that the use of a troop or two of the soldiery, or the mere sight of the soldiery, would have induced the Orangemen to disperse without the slightest delay. But he (Mr. Healy), in the present attitude of the Government, saw the snake of the Reform agitation lurking in the grass. It might be necessary for men in the Irish towns to demonstrate against the House of Lords. Englishmen might have to meet with pikes and swords, and some anti-Reformer might get a prod in the back, and it might not be convenient to indict his assailant for unlawful assembly. He would put it to the Government, in conclusion, whether, looking at the fact that this Orange organization in every phase only excited the disturbing element, it was not time that steps should be taken to put a stop to it? They should look at what was done in Ireland, America, and Newfoundland, where 30 or 40 men were indicted for murder and riot. He would put it to the Government, that when they found an organization like that of the Orangemen, only showing itself in one phase, and that phase being brutality and outrage, it was not time for them to take some prompt and vigorous action to put it down?

COLONEL COLTHURST said, he should like to approach the subject from another point of view, though without detracting from the merits of the observations of the hon. Member who spoke last (Mr. Healy)—he should like to take up the subject where the hon. Member for Limerick (Mr. Synan) had left it. The hon. Member had made an appeal to the law. If the law was in the uncertain state that the Secretary of State for the Home Department had declared it to be in, his hon. Friend (Mr. Synan) had pointed out how it could be ascertained—namely, by indicting some of the persons who took part in the assembly, which, according to the opinion of his hon. Friend, was an unlawful one. He had always been under the impression that it was in the power of magistrates or of the Government, at any rate in Ireland, to proclaim any meeting or procession, no matter how lawful the purpose might be, if there was reasonable apprehension of a breach of the peace. It seemed, however, that that was not the law, and he thought the Government ought to take such steps as were necessary to ascertain the exact state of the law.

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY said, he wished to ask for further information as to the condition of the law in this country; for the statement of the right hon. Gentleman (Sir William Harcourt) was most unsatisfactory, and the law seemed to be in a most barbarous condition. As he understood the right hon. Gentleman, a number of men might assemble and march out for a purpose not in itself unlawful and might go armed to the teeth, every man carrying some sort of weapon, and that so long as they paid the licence for carrying arms, they were entitled to go to any part of a city and make a demonstration against the citizens. Was that actually the law? Was it the law that a number of men—say, a number of anti-Reformers—might march to Chelsea, or promenade in Mid Lothian, armed with guns and swords, and sword-bayonets, and be protected in doing so? If that was the law, it was unworthy of any civilized country. Speaking not as a lawyer, nor professing to know much about the law, he could hardly believe that that was the law in any civilized country; but if it was the law, and if any number of men might publicly parade in what he would call battle array, armed to the teeth, whenever they pleased, then it was time that an improvement in the law should take place. If he (Mr. Justin M'Carthy) were Secretary of State for the Home Department, he would bring in a short Bill declaring that, in this country, as in every civilized country, it was not legal for men to march, in battle array, menacing, with weapons of all kinds, through the heart of a peaceable town. He did not know whether his hon. Friends would agree with him; but he hoped the Secretary of State for the Home Department would bring in a short Bill giving the magistrates further powers. The business of the law in a civilized country was to protect meetings which had nothing directly illegal in them. The Orangemen had a perfect right to hold their meetings and have their processions, and he thought the duty and business of the law was, at any cost, to protect all men in their right to meet and hold demonstrations. He must say he thought the right hon. Gentleman, in one part of his speech, had treated rather too lightly the manner in which this matter began. He spoke of someone thrusting a flag in the face of someone else, and asked if anyone would seriously resent such a trifle as that? The right hon. Gentleman had further said that the magistrates did not suppose there would be any chance of a serious disturbance; but he did not agree with the right hon. Gentleman that they knew so little of Orange riots as that came to. Those magistrates must have been very young, indeed, if they could not remember the Orange riots in Manchester and Liverpool. Some years ago this House was driven again and again into discussions upon the prevention of the annual outbreaks in Liverpool and Manchester. Why had not these magistrates foreseen that an armed procession of Orangemen through this place would lead to bad temper and the chance of some disturbance? The Secretary of State for the Home Department might bring in a measure to prevent armed demonstrations of this kind; and he should also see that a sufficient force of military or police was got together to secure to men the right of meeting, and to prevent their meetings being turned into armed demonstrations.

MR. HARRINGTON said, he wished to support the remarks of his hon. Friend (Mr. Justin M'Carthy) upon what he considered the unnecessary course pursued by the Secretary of State for the Home Department in regard to giving additional powers to magistrates for the suppression of public meetings. He did not think it was just to the people of England, who wished to enjoy, to the fullest extent, the right of public meeting, that because disturbances might occasionally take place between different bodies of Irishmen, therefore the right of public meeting in England should be curtailed. The people were entitled, to the fullest extent, to hold public meetings, and he thought his hon. Friend would agree with him that the Irish Members had no desire whatever to curtail that right. But he submitted that there was no necessity whatever for any curtailment of that right; and he thought the right hon. Gentleman would agree with him that the magistrates had not been quite so active as they might have been. It was quite possible that they might not have apprehended that consequences of such a serious character might arise from the demonstration, and it was also possible that the representation of a Catholic clergyman might have been looked upon by them as only a partizan declaration, and as intended to prevent what was a legitimate right of the Orangemen to hold a meeting. They had no desire, either in England or Ireland, to curtail the right of Orangemen to hold meetings; but what they did object to was that when they met they should assemble with arms. That was prima facie evidence, that if there was any hostility whatever shown, they were prepared to shoot down those who expressed any opinion opposed to theirs. In the next place, they contended that a meeting of that kind, with Party emblems, was calculated to excite bitter feeling and to endanger the peace; and, although they did not wish to interfere with or curtail their right of meeting, they held that it was the duty of the authorities wherever such meetings were held to have a sufficient force to prevent a collision between those who met and those who objected. He was very glad the right hon. Gentleman had had a second opportunity of speaking on this subject; because, undoubtedly, his second speech had, to a very large extent, done away with the unhappy impressions created by his first speech. He did not think the right hon. Gentleman had intended to convey that impression, and he was confirmed in that belief by the answer which the right hon. Gentleman had given to a Question immediately after the riots took place. In that answer the right hon. Gentleman had given an assurance—and he (Mr. Harrington) thought his hon. Friend might be satisfied with that assurance—that, in future, cases of this kind would be dealt with more vigorously than in this instance. He did not at all anticipate any danger arising from the purely Orange demonstrations in England; but what he regarded as the chief element of danger in this matter was, that where a body of Orangemen lived in England among people who sympathized with them as English people, it was possible that the demonstrations might be used for trade or Party purposes. If they were not more vigorously dealt with than they had been in the past, greater danger might arise in connection with them in future. He did not believe there was any necessity for an amendment of the law in the direction of giving further powers to the magistrates. As the law now was they could call in the military when necessary, and could summon to their assistance special constables; and, therefore, they had ample powers for dealing with these meetings.

Mr. PERCY WYNDHAM said, that though they had had knowledge of such demonstrations as this in Cumberland for the last 18 years past, they had never been of any great size, and had never attracted any particular attention, and they had never caused anything approaching to a disturbance. Therefore, he did not think the magistrates could naturally have expected that, on this occasion, anything would take place more than had usually occurred. But, as this question was being considered, he should like to raise the point as to whether something could be done to discourage the practice of carrying revolvers. What did anyone in this country, who was not a soldier or a policeman, want with a pistol? When the present Lord Sherbrooke was Chancellor of the Exchequer, he proposed that a high duty should be put upon pistols. It was not only Orangemen or Catholics who used revolvers, but it was the habit of all the mining population in the North to carry pistols, and what he would suggest was that a duty of one guinea should be put upon the carrying of a revolver.

Mr. DAWSON said, the question was whether there had been justice in the course pursued in this matter? If the matter were reversed, and the Catholics of Cleator Moor went into the Orange district, and a Protestant rector or clergyman wrote a letter to the magistrates, as a Catholic clergyman had done in this case, would that warning have been overlooked? Would the magistrates have taken no steps whatever to prevent a disturbance? Would they have allowed these people to gather together when they had the power to search them for arms carried without a licence? The Secretary of State for the Home Department was begging the question when he said these people probably had licences. No one knew whether they had or not; but they could have been prevented from carrying arms. He was strongly impressed by the idea that there was no fair play in dealing with Orangemen. Some time ago, he was in Omagh when some Orangemen used arms quite recklessly. It was, therefore, clear that there was one law for Orangemen and another for the Nationalists; and by this country, which had ever been distinguished for exercising justice between contending parties, favouritism was shown to the Orangemen. He quite agreed with the hon. Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy) that there was no desire on the part of Irish Members to interfere with the right of public meeting in England or in Ireland; but they wanted fair and even-handed justice, and that Orangemen should not be treated with favouritism. But the Secretary of State had not shown any evidence of a spirit of fair play in his own mind in his answer to the questions of the hon. Member for Limerick (Mr. Synan). Would he indict these people, and prevent their carrying arms as they had hitherto done? It would be very satisfactory if the right hon. Gentleman would give an assurance to that effect.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he was sorry if he had not answered the questions put to him precisely. He might indict the Orangemen for being members of an unlawful assembly and carrying arms; but in this country he could not indict people simply for carrying arms. The Government could not enter upon indictments without reasonable grounds for believing them to be well-founded. Unless they were well-founded, he could not enter upon them.

Mr. KENNY said, no hon. Member on that side would object to the right of meeting; but people ought not to be allowed to go about with offensive weapons to the terror of Her Majesty's subjects. He knew Cleator Moor, and he was the principal speaker at the last Catholic meeting held there. The majority of the people in that part of Cumberland were Irishmen and Catholics, and they came some distance from the town to meet him, with bands, but no arms. There was no violence and no bloodshed; but the origin of these demonstrations in Cumberland he believed lay in the fact that, something like 18 years ago, a certain notorious preacher named Murphy, who went about insulting Catholic gentlemen, and making absurd and mischievous charges against the monasteries and members of that religion, met with his death at the hands of a Whitehaven mob of Catholics. The population of Cleator Moor was mainly Catholic; but Whitehaven was almost exclusively Protestant. There were a number of small mining towns in that district, and for the last 17 years those towns had been exclusively selected as the scenes of these annual celebrations of the victory of the Battle of the Boyne; but, for the first time, Cleator Moor had been selected this year, because a small body of Orangemen, who belonged to an Orange Lodge there, threatened to secede from the Lodge unless Cleator Moor was selected. The Orangemen naturally expected that there would be considerable opposition if they went to Cleator Moor. The arrival of a great body of men from the different mining towns and villages had, no doubt, the effect of attracting a great crowd of Catholics. The Secretary of State for the Home Department had expressed some surprise that the thrusting of a flag in a person's face had stirred up a riot, and he also spoke of the odium theologicum; but he seemed to forget that it was easier to provoke a breach of the peace when the subject was religion. Without going into the question of the rights of the Home Office, he certainly thought that Department was to blame for not having directed special constables to be sworn in. It was an extraordinary thing that human life should have been sacrificed owing to the culpable neglect of the officials, and he was satisfied that if these complaints had come from a different source, the Home Office would not have been so remiss in its duty as it had been in this instance.

MR. SEXTON said, that, having listened attentively to the statement of the Secretary of State for the Home Department, he felt justified in hoping that the results of this debate would be salutary, not only with regard to the vindication of justice in this case, but to the preservation of the peace in similar cases. He therefore did not feel called upon to put the Committee to the trouble of a Division.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(10.) £285,109, to complete the sum for Convict Establishments in England and the Colonies.

(11.) £374,869, to complete the sum for Prisons, England.

MR. HARRINGTON said, he had intended to move a reduction of this Vote, because he had fruitlessly drawn attention to the scant pay of prison officials in Ireland, and he thought that if officials could be got cheaply to perform onerous duties in that country, there was no reason why cheap labour should not be got in England.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, that if there was any serious objection to this Vote, he would move to report Progress. He did not know whether the hon. Member (Mr. Harrington) meant to oppose the Vote; but, perhaps, it would meet his views to defer his discussion until they came to the Irish Prisons Vote.

MR. HARRINGTON said, it was impossible to move to increase the Irish Estimate; indeed, they had no means of drawing attention to the poor salaries paid to the Irish prison officials except by moving to reduce the Vote for the English prison officials.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS said, this question was one which had been specially referred to the Royal Commission, and therefore he thought it would be better to defer the discussion upon it until, at all events, they had received the Report of the Commissioners.

MR. HARRINGTON said, he should be glad to agree to the suggestion, if the right hon. Gentleman (Sir R. Assheton Cross) could hold out any hope that before the Irish Estimates came on for consideration, the Report of the Commissioners, together with the recommendations which they, no doubt, would make, would be laid before the House. If the right hon. Gentleman would undertake that his Report should be laid on the Table before the end of the Session, he (Mr. Harrington) would be glad to postpone his Motion.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS said, he would do all he could to publish the Report before the end of the Session. He really thought that to discuss the subject on the present Vote, with the Report of the Commissioners pending, would be a useless waste of time. He hoped the hon. Gentleman would postpone his Motion.

MR. HARRINGTON said, he had only been prompted to move in the matter now, because the question had been so very frequently raised, so many recommendations had been made, and so much reluctance to do justice in the matter had been shown by the Members of the Treasury Bench. Last year the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Courtney) based his argument on the fact that the officials of the Irish prisons could live more cheaply than similar officials in England; but that, to his (Mr. Harrington's) mind, was no valid argument at all.

MR. R. N. FOWLER (LORD MAYOR) said, he hoped the Government would now consent to report Progress. Hon. Members had been brought down, night after night, to consider the Municipal Elections (Corrupt and Illegal Practices) Bill. That was the fourth or fifth night that Members had been brought down for that purpose, so that he hoped Progress would now be reported, or that an assurance would be given that the Bill would not be proceeded with to-night.

MR. HARRINGTON said, he understood that the Government intended to move to report Progress. Failing such a disposition on their part, he would move to report Progress.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Harrington.)

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he hoped the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Harrington) would allow them to take this Vote, reserving any discussion he might wish to raise until the Irish Prisons Vote was brought on. Of course, if the hon. Member declined to do that, there was no course open to the Government but to consent to report Progress.

MR. HARRINGTON said, he would raise a discussion on the Irish Vote, and would, therefore, ask leave to withdraw his Motion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question again proposed.

MR. BARRY said, that for two or three years proposals were made with the object of making prison labour more remunerative than it was at present. At that time, an agitation was got up against the manufacture of cocoa-nut matting, and in consequence, he believed, the manufacture was discontinued in seven or eight prisons. Had any other manufactures been discontinued?

MR. HIBBERT said, that what the hon. Member (Mr. Barry) had stated had been carried out to a great extent. Mat-making was carried on to some extent in most prisons, though the manufacture had been limited on the ground that it was injuriously affecting the trade. He had, in his possession, a Return of the prison labour for the last five years, and it showed a considerable increase upon the amount received therefrom. In 1879, the total amount received for manufactures and work upon buildings was £41,000; but, in the year 1884, the amount had increased to £68,800. Though the number of prisoners in local prisons had decreased by something like 2,700, the increase in the sum received from prison labour was such as he had mentioned. In the ordinary service of the prison, the value of the work done was—In 1879, £74,000; in 1884, £78,000; so that the total value of prison labour was, in 1879, £115,000, and in 1884, £147,000. The Prison Commissioners were endeavouring to increase the number of trades in prisons, in order to do away with interference with one particular trade, such as mat-making.

MR. BARRY said, he was glad to hear there had been an increase in the amount received from prison labour, yet the amount received might be much larger.

MR. RANKIN asked, if there was any intention to further reduce the number of prisons?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, the number of prisons was being gradually reduced. The desirability of closing two other prisons was now under consideration. He was merely carrying out the policy laid down in the Prisons Act, of consolidating prisons so far as consolidation might be compatible with the convenience of the localities, which must be regarded in the matter.

Vote agreed to.

MUNICIPAL ELECTIONS (CORRUPT AND ILLEGAL PRACTICES) BILL.

(Mr. Attorney General, Secretary Sir William Harcourt, Sir Charles W. Dilke, Mr. Solicitor General.)

[BILL 252.] CONSIDERATION.

Further Proceeding on Consideration, as amended, resumed.

Bill, as amended, further considered.

Mr. Harrington

Mr. WARTON, in moving, as an Amendment, the insertion of the following Clause:—

(Interpretation of "The Corrupt and Illegal Practices Act, 1883.")

"In construing 'The Corrupt and Illegal Practices Act, 1883,' the words 'Solicitor to the Treasury' shall be deemed to be substituted for 'Director of Public Prosecutions,'" said, it would be in the recollection of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General (Sir Henry James) that, for many years past, he (Mr. Warton) had pressed upon him very strongly the utter impropriety of maintaining the office of Director of Public Prosecutions. A Committee had been appointed to consider the subject, and it had reported that, as far as possible, the office should be amalgamated with, or absorbed in, the office of Solicitor to the Treasury. A Bill had been brought in to carry out the recommendation of the Committee. That Bill ought to make its way through the House; but an obstinate Scotch Member, who wanted to force the Scotch system on the English people, had blocked the Bill. There was, therefore, little chance of the measure passing this Session; but with regard to prosecutions for electoral corruption, he (Mr. Warton) had endeavoured, by this Amendment, to give effect to the recommendation of the Committee. The Public Prosecutor had been found wanting. The Solicitor to the Treasury was a very good official, and that was an additional reason why the Amendment should be accepted.

New Clause (Interpretation of "The Corrupt and Illegal Practices Act, 1883,")—(Mr. Warton),—brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause be read a second time."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he was sorry he could not accept the Amendment, the effect of which would be to alter the whole of their work of last year by substituting Solicitor to the Treasury for Public Prosecutor. So long as the Public Prosecutor existed the duties they had placed on him by the original Act ought to be continued by this Act. If the gentleman in question ceased to be Director of Public Prosecutions, and his place was taken by the Solicitor to the Treasury, this clause was unnecessary, because they would transfer the duties from the one to the other. He did not think they ought to take away from the Public Prosecutor the duties he had under the original Act, still leaving him in existence for all other purposes. He (Sir Henry James) hoped the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Warton) would not press his Amendment.

Question put, and negatived.

Clause 2 (Definition and punishment of corrupt practice at municipal election).

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) moved, as an Amendment, in page 1, line 10, after "set forth in," insert "Part One of."

Amendment agreed to.

Words inserted accordingly.

Mr. WARTON moved, as an Amendment, in page 1, to insert, after "election," in line 14—

"Other than the offence of aiding, abetting, counselling, and procuring the commission of the offence of personation."

The object of this Amendment was to reduce, to a certain extent, the penalty for the offence of aiding and abetting personation, for the Amendment must be read with the next one which stood in his name, which was to add at the end of the clause—

"A person guilty of the offence of aiding, abetting, counselling, and procuring the commission of the offence of personation, shall be liable to the like punishment, and subject to the like incapacities, as a person guilty of bribery."

It would, no doubt, be in the recollection of the House that, at the time the Ballot Act was introduced, it was imagined that it would lead to a great amount of personation. As a matter of fact, bribery had been reduced and personation had not increased. At the time terrible penalties were provided for persons who were found impersonating; indeed, the penalties were made much heavier than those for bribery under influence, and so forth. It seemed to him that it was not right to inflict heavier penalties for personation than for bribery, especially now that the working of the Ballot Act had shown that personation was not carried on to any great extent.

Surely, it was unnecessary to have extraordinarily high penalties for one particular offence. Personally, he was afraid that the effect of high penalties would be to defeat the object of the Bill.

Amendment proposed,

In page 1, line 14, after "election," insert "other than the offence of aiding, abetting, counselling, and procuring the commission of the offence of personation."—(Mr. Warton.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, they discussed this matter very fully last year, when they were in Committee upon the Parliamentary Elections (Corrupt and Illegal Practices) Bill; and he believed his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Warton) made the same suggestion then that he made now. He (Sir Henry James) did not wish to make any difference between the law affecting Parliamentary elections and that affecting municipal elections. It seemed absurd to say they would pass one sentence for the offence of personation if committed at a Parliamentary election, and another sentence if the offence was committed at a municipal election. Inasmuch as they had taken one course in relation to Parliamentary elections, he wished to adhere to it in cases of municipal elections. The Amendment amounted to this—that if a person procured another person to personate 100 voters, he should receive a milder punishment than the person who really committed the personation. It seemed to him (Sir Henry James) that the originator of the act ought to receive the same punishment as the man who committed the act. He had not the slightest sympathy with a man who procured the act of personation, for it must be an intentional act. In his opinion, the procurer of the act was far more guilty than the person who became a victim to his persuasion. He hoped the House would reject the Amendment.

Question put, and negatived.

Clause 4 (Certain expenditure to be illegal practice).

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) moved, as an Amendment, in page 2, line 32, leave out from "ward" to end of sub-section (1), and insert—

Mr. Warton

"And if the number of electors in such borough or ward exceeds two thousand, one additional committee room for every two thousand electors and incomplete part of two thousand electors over and above the said two thousand."

Amendment agreed to.

Words substituted accordingly.

MR. WARTON moved, as an Amendment, in page 2, line 37, to leave out the word "either," and insert the words "within two months." Now, if the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General (Sir Henry James) was determined, whether with reason or without reason, to keep everything in this Bill exactly as it was in the Act of last year, he would resist this Amendment. But had not the experience of the Act of last year shown that in a great many cases people were getting frightened at the refusal made last year to fix any period of time during which an election lasted? He supposed hon. Gentlemen who intended to contest again the constituency for which they now sat might take it that the next Election had already begun. Certainly the right hon. Baronet the Member for Chelsea (Sir Charles W. Dilke) and his hon. and learned Colleague (Mr. Firth), who had asked him (Mr. Warton) to subscribe towards their election expenses, ought to consider that the election in which they intended to take a part had begun. The object of the Amendment was to insure something like certainty as to the time an election began. He hoped hon. Members would pay a little attention to what they were doing, and not let the Bill pass in a defective state. It was very necessary that people should know when an election began, and he now proposed what seemed to him a very moderate limit of time. This Amendment, and the one which stood next in his name—namely, to insert "or" after "before," would have the effect of making the clause read "payment," &c., "within two months before or during or after an election." Now, if hon. Members saw the force of what he said, they would, he was sure, support him. If the hon. and learned Attorney General wished it to be supposed that they were never to act wisely, but that everything they put in the Bill of last year was to be put in the Bill of this year, there was very little hope of the most rational Amendment being adopted. It was out of all reason that a sitting Member, for instance, should be liable to have all the terrible penalties of this Bill inflicted upon him, because he did not know when an election began.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 37, to leave out the word "either," and insert the words "within two months,"—(Mr. Warton,)—instead thereof.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, this Amendment brought him back to the recollection of this time last year. Twelve months ago they agreed it was impossible to define or limit the time an election lasted. If they did, the law was sure to be evaded. If they put in one month, or two months, or three months, and said, "You may do what you like outside the limit," they would have a great deal done that ought not to be done. The House came to the conclusion, after full discussion, that it would be very dangerous to fix a limit of time.

Question put, and agreed to.

MR. WARTON moved, as an Amendment, in page 2, line 40, to leave out "a party," and insert "privy." It seemed to him that this was an Amendment in the interest of purity of election. He knew the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General (Sir Henry James) supposed he (Mr. Warton) was standing up for corruption; but the hon. and learned Gentleman was quite mistaken. There might be other persons engaged in an improper payment besides the person who made the payment or the person who received it. A third party might suggest corruption; therefore, it would be better to substitute here the word "privy" for "a party." The alteration would cover the case of any person who concealed an act of corruption. He hoped that if hon. Gentlemen sitting on the Ministerial Benches were sincerely actuated by a desire to put down electoral corruption, they would not oppose an Amendment moved in the interest of purity of election, although it might happen to be proposed by a Member of the Opposition.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 40, leave out "a party," and insert "privy."—(Mr. Warton.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'a party' stand part of the Clause."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, that by this Amendment the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Warton) would increase, no doubt unwittingly, the stringency of the Bill, because he would make it an offence for anybody to be "privy" to an act of corruption. Anyone who received knowledge of corruption accidentally would be privy to the offence. If they made a person "a party" to an offence he must be guilty of some substantial act. A person who read of corruption in a newspaper would be privy to it. He (Sir Henry James) would prefer to be a little lenient in this instance, if the hon. and learned Gentleman would allow him.

Question put, and agreed to.

MR. WARTON said, he had an Amendment to move to the clause for the purpose of making the phraseology of the various clauses of the Bill consistent. He wished to call the attention of the House and the hon. and learned Attorney General to the fact that the expression which he was about to move in substitution of the words "contravention of this Act," in line 41, occurred in Clause 13, page 6, line 30 of the Bill. The expression which there occurred was "contrary to law," and he proposed to move the insertion of those words in place of the words now in the clause. If the hon. and learned Gentleman was so consistent with regard to certain words in the Parliamentary Elections Act of last year, he trusted he would be consistent in regard to this Bill, and not have one expression in one clause, and a different expression to convey the same idea in another clause of the Bill. He would give the hon. Gentleman his choice of the two phrases; but he hoped that one or the other of them would be adopted. For his own part, he thought "contrary to law" the better expression, and he should also prefer it, because, in the place he had indicated, it was used in connection with a very similar matter. Moreover, the words "contrary to law" were words of limitation, and words of limitation were generally good.

Amendment proposed, in page 3, line 41, to leave out the words "in contravention of this Act," and insert the words "contrary to law,"—(Mr. Warton,)—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words 'in contravention of this Act,' stand part of the Bill."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he was unable to agree to the Amendment of the hon. Member, because he thought it would not improve the wording of the clause. He considered "in contravention of this Act" the better wording.

Question put, and agreed to.

Mr. WARTON said, he proposed, as an Amendment, to move the insertion of the words "or otherwise," after the word "agent," in page 3, line 2. He thought these words should be inserted, because a person might be engaged to stick bills on a wall, and it did not follow that he was strictly an advertising agent. The clause ought to extend its provisions to persons who might carry on the business of exhibiting bills for payment, and he did not think such persons would be included in the words "advertising agent." He thought that the words "or otherwise" tended in the direction of purity of election, which the hon. and learned Attorney General seemed alternately to care for and to reject. He urged the Amendment on the favourable attention of the House, because it was quite possible to contentemplate the case of a man exhibiting an election bill, and yet not being what was known as an advertising agent.

Amendment proposed, in page 3, line 2, after the word "agent," to insert the words "or otherwise."—(Mr. Warton.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he could not adopt this Amendment. This matter had been fully discussed last year, when Clause 7 of the Parliamentary Elections (Corrupt and Illegal Practices) Bill was under the consideration of the House, and it was then decided that the words "advertising agent" should stand without the addition of the words "or otherwise." He thought it better to adopt the same wording with regard to the present Bill which it was decided to retain in the Act of last year. If they did not keep this distinction in favour of the advertising agent, by saying, "doing the ordinary business of advertising agent," every publican and every greengrocer, who sometimes exhibited a bill at election time, might claim to be paid for it. The intention was to make an exception in favour of the advertising agent only, and not in favour of those persons who sometimes exhibited bills.

Question put, and negatived.

Mr. WARTON said, he regarded the words "deemed to be," in page 3, line 4, of the Bill, as an absurd expression, and one which was only introduced for the sake of euphony. He would, therefore, move their omission from the clause.

Amendment proposed, in page 3, line 4, to leave out the words "deemed to be."—(Mr. Warton.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Bill."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he was reluctantly obliged to say "No" to the hon. and learned Member's proposal to strike out these words. It was better, perhaps, sometimes to be consistently wrong, than inconsistently right. However, that might be, he would point out that the Act of last year, with regard to Parliamentary elections, contained these very words, "shall be deemed to be illegal," a circumstance which it would seem had escaped the hon. and learned Member's acute attention when that measure was passing through the House. If they escaped the hon. and learned Member then, he thought they might have been allowed to escape him now for the sake of consistency.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 5 (Expense in excess of maximum to be illegal practice).

Mr. WARTON said, there was a great desire on the part of the hon. and learned Attorney General to retain in the Bill useless phrases, for no other reason, that he (Mr. Warton) could discover, than that they were in the Parliamentary Elections (Corrupt and Illegal Practices) Act of last year. He would ask the hon. and learned Gentleman whether he intended to maintain in the Bill the principle embodied in this clause? He believed the great majority of the House had never heard the reasons which induced the hon. and learned Gentleman to adopt the words of this clause. They were, of course, in ignorance of what had taken place in the Grand Committee, and no one seemed to know exactly what had been going on with regard to the Bill. Whatever reason there was for the clause in the Act of last year with regard to Parliamentary elections, he was satisfied that it would be very injudicious to fix the proposed maximum with regard to these minor elections in municipalities, and he should, therefore, move that the clause be struck out. The great absurdity which ran through this Bill was that it treated these little elections as if they were of the same importance as Parliamentary Elections. He trusted the hon. and learned Gentleman would be able to explain to the House why he had changed front so completely since the debate on the Motion for the second reading of the Bill—why he had changed his views in Committee.

Amendment proposed, in page 3, to leave out Clause 5.—(Mr. Warton.)

MR. WHITLEY said, he also should like some explanation from the hon. and learned Attorney General of the reasons which had induced him to take up a position with regard to the principle of this clause entirely different from that which he occupied when the Bill was introduced to the House. The view of the hon. and learned Gentleman at that time was certainly against the introduction of a maximum expenditure in the case of municipal elections. He (Mr. Whitley) was certainly in favour of the opinion then expressed by the hon. and learned Gentleman, and he was bound to express his surprise that the hon. and learned Gentleman did not now hold the same opinion with regard to this subject. It must be obvious to the House that this clause affected the various constituents in different ways. In the constituency which he had the honour to represent (Liverpool), for instance, there were no less than 23,000 electors who had the right of voting at municipal elections; and, therefore, the arrangements in connection with such elections for polling rooms, polling clerks, and their assistants, were necessarily very extensive.

The House would perceive that the maximum expenditure sought to be imposed by this clause would be absolutely insufficient for the purposes of municipal elections in Liverpool. The case would be entirely different with regard to towns in which there were, perhaps, 200 electors, and even a smaller number than that—but in Liverpool and other towns in Lancashire, he believed there was no municipality with a smaller electorate than 1,000. He could assure the hon. and learned Gentleman that it was impossible that this maximum could be maintained in the case of municipal elections in those places. It would be far better, in his opinion, to have no maximum at all, if it was to apply to all places without distinction. He maintained that the retention of the clause in its present form would constitute a great injustice in the case of large constituencies. It was a question of the magnitude of the electorate, and he was convinced that it would be utterly impracticable to carry out municipal elections in large towns within the limit of expenditure prescribed by the clause. He was sure that that was not the intention of the hon. and learned Gentleman, and he was equally satisfied that the Members of the Grand Committee had not fully considered the bearing which the proposed maximum would have upon important municipal elections. The question was a large and serious one, and he hoped the hon. and learned Gentleman would agree to the Motion of the hon. and learned Member for Bridport (Mr. Warton) to strike out the clause. If his hon. and learned Friend went to a Division, he should, for the reasons given, feel it his duty to vote with him.

MR. SAMUEL SMITH said, he believed it would be extremely difficult, if not actually impossible, to conduct municipal elections of any importance upon the very small scale of expenditure proposed in this clause. For his own part, he had considerable misgivings with regard to the fixing of a maximum scale in these cases. He was, of course, aware of the wisdom of surrounding municipal elections with all possible safeguards for purity; but he ventured to doubt whether the effect of the principle contained in the clause upon large municipal elections had received sufficient attention at the hands of the Grand Committee.

He should be glad to see the Bill passed without any scale at all.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he had endeavoured to obtain the best information upon this subject before he introduced the Bill to the House, and at the time when the Bill was introduced, he thought it would be, on the whole, better to strike out the maximum Schedule, and to insert a minor Schedule. He stated, in Committee, that objections had been expressed to that plan, but that he thought it was better to adopt it, and he was met by a considerable amount of criticism; the hon. and learned Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst) and others told him that he was entirely wrong in having taken that course. He adhered, however, to his former opinion, and a Division being taken, he found there was scarcely a working majority in favour of his view. Every Conservative Member voted against it—a circumstance which he hoped the hon. and learned Member for Bridport (Mr. Warton) would take to heart—and those who spoke on the question contended that there ought to be a maximum Schedule, while many opinions were expressed that he ought not to give way on the point. The proposal which he laid before the Grand Committee having been carried by a very narrow majority, he thought it best to meet the views of the minority half-way. Having got rid of the election agent, he hoped the fears of the hon. Member for Liverpool (Mr. Whitley) would not be realized. They had simplified the matter very much; but there still appeared to be a certain amount of doubt on the subject, and if the hon. and learned Member for Bridport (Mr. Warton) took a Division on his Motion, the actual opinion of the House would appear.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS said, he thought much credit was due to the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for the course he had taken in this matter throughout the whole proceedings. The hon. and learned Gentleman had, in the first instance, formed the opinion in his own mind that it was not wise to introduce a maximum scale. It was quite true that he (Sir R. Assheton Cross) had made some severe comments in the course of the debate on the second reading of the Bill as to the difference which existed between this Bill and the Act of last year with regard to corrupt and illegal practices at Parliamentary elections; but, no doubt, strong opinions were expressed in the Grand Committee, not by Conservative Members alone, but by a large number of Liberal Members, who had had experience of the working of the Act of last year, in favour of a maximum scale, and the result was that, when the Committee went to the Division on the question, there was but a narrow majority in favour of the proposal of the hon. and learned Attorney General, which led the hon. and learned Gentleman to reconsider the question, and to place the matter on a different footing. The hon. and learned Gentleman thought it wise to reconsider the decision at which he had arrived, and he (Sir R. Assheton Cross) believed that in the proposal he had made, he carried with him, if not an absolutely unanimous, yet a very general concurrence of opinion on the part of hon. Members. The hon. and learned Gentleman consented to introduce a maximum scale of expenditure into the Bill, a perfectly proper provision, so far as the election agent was concerned, and to that extent he entirely agreed with the hon. and learned Attorney General. But when he came to consider the maximum scale that had been introduced into the Bill, that appeared to him an entirely different matter, and he quite agreed with his hon. Friend near him the Member for Liverpool (Mr. Whitley), and the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Samuel Smith), that the proposed maximum scale ought to be decidedly enlarged. [He was perfectly satisfied that no municipal election could be carried on within the limits of such a scale. The matter was of such importance that he was in some doubt as to whether its discussion ought not to be deferred to a later period. They were, of course, all agreed that bribery and corruption ought not to take place at these or any other elections; but there was nothing of the kind involved here. The amount had been placed at a figure altogether too low, and he was of precisely the same opinion as his hon. Friend (Mr. Whitley), that it was insufficient to pay for the persons who could be legally employed under the Bill for the purposes of municipal elections.]

Question put, and agreed to.

Amendment proposed, in page 3, line 6, to leave out the words "subject to such exception as may be allowed in pursuance of this Act."—(Mr. Warton.)

Question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Bill," put, and agreed to.

MR. H. S. NORTHCOTE said, it was evident that if the matter was to be dealt with in the way that the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General wished the scale of expenditure fixed by the Bill as it stood at present was insufficient. He proposed, therefore, to move that the maximum of £20 should be increased to £25. It was obvious that if municipal contests were to be conducted on non-political lines, the electors ought to have the fullest information of the views of the local representatives before them. Although it was impossible to say that an expenditure of £25 could have any great effect in corrupting the boroughs, yet its expenditure on printing, &c., might have a great effect in affording the electors of the borough full information with regard to the questions at issue. He should like to suggest to the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General a possible compromise. He did not know whether the hon. and learned Gentleman would be able to see his way to accept it; but it had been suggested to him (Mr. Northcote) by a municipal agent, who had devoted great attention to the matter. This municipal agent proposed that in wards of under 500 voters, £15 should be allowed; in wards between 500 and 1,000 voters, £25; and in wards over 1,500, £30, with a scale of 4*d.* for each voter over the initial number.

Amendment proposed, in page 3, line 13, to leave out the words "twenty pounds," and insert the words "twenty-five pounds,"—(Mr. H. S. Northcote.)—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words 'twenty pounds' stand part of the Bill."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir Henry James) said, the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Northcote) had stated the case very fairly, and he quite felt that there was a great deal in what he had said. This was really a practical matter, and he hoped that every Member would vote exactly as he thought right. The question was, whether £25 should be the initial expenditure, and 3*d.* or 4*d.* per head the subsequent amount? As far as he (the Attorney General) could judge, whether they adopted the £25, or maintained the £20 limit, or whether they had 4*d.* instead of the 3*d.* for subsequent expenditure, either sum would take elections out of the area of corrupt practices. He would state to the House briefly why he should prefer to adhere to the £20 limit and the smaller sum per head. In the first place, they had discussed this matter in the Grand Committee, and if there was any question which it was desirable that such Committee should determine, it was this. It was eminently a question to be intrusted to such a body. The question was one very materially depending upon the information obtained by those interested in the matter. Information had been obtained by many Members of the Grand Committee from the districts they represented, and the majority of the Committee had been in favour of maintaining the maximum at £20 instead of £25. The majority of the constituencies had thought that £20 would be quite sufficient to pay all legitimate expenses. He agreed with the hon. Member for Liverpool (Mr. Whitley) that they would not be able to carry on municipal elections for this sum if those elections were to be conducted in the future as they had been in the past—that was to say, if they were to carry them on by giving all sorts of useful information to the electors as to the merits of particular candidates by addressing placards and advertisements to them. In that event, neither sum now proposed would be sufficient. He did not think it was necessary to give information of this kind to the electors. Whether a ward was a small one, or whether it was composed of 1,600 electors, he believed that every morning, when a ratepayer arose from his bed, he would get all the information he required about the candidates, if there was anything he did not know, in the local papers. The electors would know all they were wanted to know without putting the candidates to the necessity of advertising. If they had a committee room at all, it would do for 1,000 as well as for 500 electors, and in the same way a clerk would be able to manage a large number as conveniently as he could a small number. It was necessary that they should form an opinion upon this matter upon detailed information they received from the constituencies; and though he did not for a moment say that he would supersede the responsibility of individual Members in this matter, at the same time he must point out that they would not obtain any advantage by going into a lengthy or detailed debate on the question. The only expression of opinion necessary for him to give was a general one; and, as a matter of fact, he believed that if £25 was inserted in the place of £20, it would be just as useful in putting an end to corrupt practices.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS said, he was very glad the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General had done two things. In the first place, he was pleased to hear him say that any Member of the House could vote exactly as he thought fit, without any pressure, because he happened to sit on one side of the House instead of the other. He (Sir R. Assheton Cross) agreed that this was not a Party question. In the second place, he was glad to hear the hon. and learned Gentleman say that the acceptance of the higher sum instead of the lower would be equally efficacious in putting a stop to bribery and corruption. He (Sir R. Assheton Cross) had gone carefully into this question to find out whether the £20 would be sufficient, and the result of his inquiries was that in large boroughs like Liverpool it would be far from sufficient. He would ask the House, as there was no question of corruption in the matter, whether a man had a fair chance of giving his constituents to understand his qualifications and his reasons for desiring to be put upon the Municipality, when his initial expenses were limited to £20; or, at any rate, whether he would have as good an opportunity as he would if he were enabled to spend £25? He was not speaking of a man who could get up and make a speech at a meeting of his constituents, but of a man who, without the opportunity of attending meetings, desired to let his constituency know what he felt, and why he stood. The question was, could a man do this for the smaller sum? And his (Sir R. Assheton Cross's) opinion was that in such places as Liverpool and Manchester he could not do so. No man who wished to stand at the municipal elections at these places should be debarred; and he was sure that, if the smaller sum were adopted, many persons would be prevented from availing themselves of the advantages they wished to possess, and of the advantages they wished their constituents to have. He would appeal to the hon. Member for Liverpool on that (the Opposition) side of the House (Mr. Whitley) and to the hon. Member for Liverpool on the other side of the House (Mr. Samuel Smith), and to the hon. Member for Manchester, whether his view was not the correct one? The hon. Member for Manchester who sat on that (the Conservative) side of the House (Mr. Houldsworth) had spoken to him very strongly upon the matter.

MR. WHITLEY said, he wished to point out that the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General had not addressed himself to the real difficulty. He did not think the hon. and learned Gentleman at all realized what it was to contest a ward in a Municipality containing so many thousand electors as Liverpool. The hon. and learned Gentleman proposed to give them 18 polling places. They must have two polling places in each ward, and then they must have a polling clerk at each station; and he would, therefore, ask how was it possible to work such a constituency as this with the money proposed to be allowed? In the ward he (Mr. Whitley) represented, it was essential that there should be a large number of polling places, and it was impossible that they could get them for the amount proposed to be allowed in the Bill. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General had intimated that he had consulted various interests on this matter; and he (Mr. Whitley) would like to ask him if he had consulted anyone, no matter of what politics, or even those who had no political bias at all, in the large towns, without coming to the conclusion that it would be impossible to work an election in a place like Liverpool with this money? No doubt, it would be possible to do it in small boroughs; but supposing they had a constituency of 23,000 to send an address to, their money would be almost gone at once. He was talking of a constituency with an area of seven miles. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General could have no idea of the difficulty candidates in Liverpool would be placed in if his proposal were accepted; and he (Mr. Whitley) would ask hon. Members representing large constituencies whether, if they consulted their constituents, they would not find them all against the proposal of the Bill? He trusted the House would support the Amendment.

MR. WARTON said, that as the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General was kind enough to say that they might all vote as they liked, he would ask right hon. Gentlemen sitting on the Treasury Bench not to put forward the Government Whips as Tellers in the Division.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 95; Noes 42: Majority 53.—(Div. List, No. 181.)

MR. H. S. NORTHCOTE: I have another Amendment on the Paper; but after the Division we have just taken I do not propose to proceed with it. I refer to my proposal to leave out in line 15 the words "three pence," and insert "four pence."

Clause 6 (Voting by prohibited persons and publishing of false statements of withdrawal to be illegal).

Amendment proposed, in page 4, line 16, after the word "election," to leave out "for the purpose of promoting or procuring the election of another candidate."—(Mr. Warton.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Bill."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he had not caught the object of the hon. and learned Member (Mr. Warton) in moving this Amendment, and he certainly thought it would be better to adhere to the words in the Bill.

Question put, and agreed to.

Clause 7 (Punishment on conviction of illegal practice).

MR. WARTON said, the next Amendment, he trusted, would meet with the approbation of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General. He thought that the £20 he proposed would be quite a sufficient disability, without adding a greater incapacity; and he would therefore move to leave out "one hundred" and insert "twenty."

Amendment proposed, in page 4, line 24, to leave out the words "one hundred," and insert the word "twenty,"—(Mr. Warton.)—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words 'one hundred' stand part of the Bill."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he could not accept the Amendment, as £100 had been accepted after a long discussion. The clause said "not exceeding one hundred pounds;" therefore, it seemed to him that it would meet any very gross case.

MR. TOMLINSON said, he could not imagine anything more likely to discourage respectable men from becoming candidates than such a thing as this. If such a provision as that in question were retained, the effect would be to throw elections into the hands of an inferior class of men. That would be the effect of imposing too heavy a penalty for what might not be very distinctly an illegal act.

Question put, and agreed to.

Clause 10 (Employment of hackney carriages, or of carriages and horses kept for hire).

MR. WARTON said, the next Amendment he had on the Paper might appear to some hon. Members a very trifling one; but it really was not trifling, because, if they looked at the phraseology of the Bill, they would find in its nomenclature "illegal hiring and illegal practices." If the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General would look at the provision before the one he (Mr. Warton) wished to amend, he would see the words used in another sense. In the present clause the phrase "illegal hiring" was not used in its proper sense, because it was used both in the sense of hiring and letting for hire. He objected to this use of new phraseology—this introduction of a new phrase altogether. They would find the words "guilty of illegal hiring" in Clause 16, not only in the clause, but in the marginal note also. It was not "an illegal hiring." He wished to know whether the hon. and learned Attorney General would have "an illegal hiring" as he had in one part of the Bill, or "illegal hiring" as he had in others?

Amendment proposed, in page 5, line 25, leave out "an."—(Mr. Warton.)

Question proposed, "That the word proposed to be left out stand part of the Bill."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, the striking out of this word did not make the slightest difference in the Bill. As, however, it would bring about greater uniformity, he was much obliged to the hon. and learned Member for having pointed it out, and he had much pleasure in accepting the proposal.

Question put, and negatived.

Word struck out accordingly.

On the Motion of Mr. WARTON, further Amendment made in line 30, by striking out the word "an."

Clause 12 (Certain expenditure to be illegal payment).

MR. WARTON said, that in page 6, line 7, he wished to move an Amendment which affected rather an important matter of principle, with regard to which he was afraid that the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General would give him the same answer as he had done when they were discussing the Parliamentary Elections (Corrupt and Illegal Practices) Bill of last year. The object of the Amendment was to leave out that part of the clause which was against the use of cockades and ribbons, which, to his (Mr. Warton's) mind, were quite harmless things. These municipal elections were not of the same gravity as Parliamentary elections; and, therefore, even if it was desirable to put a stop to the use of these things at Parliamentary elections, which he did not believe it was, it was not necessary to put a stop to their employment in connection with these elections. It was not necessary to go into the same minutiae in this Bill as they had in the Parliamentary Elections (Corrupt and Illegal Practices) Bill.

Amendment proposed, in page 6, line 7, after the word "flag," to insert the word "or."—(Mr. Warton.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'or' be there inserted."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he must adhere to his banner. This provision was contained in the 12th clause of the Parliamentary Elections (Corrupt and Illegal Practices) Act of last year, and it was discussed at some length. If they allowed banners to be used in a municipal election and not in Parliamentary elections, he was afraid people would be prone to make mistakes.

Question put, and negatived.

Clause 13 (Certain employment to be illegal).

MR. WARTON said, he would not move the next two Amendments which stood in his name, as they were similar to those rejected on Clause 4; but he did hope to have the support of the hon. and learned Attorney General, now that he had to propose to leave out in page 6, line 36, "contrary to law," and insert "in contravention of this Act." Honestly and fairly he called the hon. and learned Gentleman's attention, when they were on Clause 4, to the inconsistency in the Bill, and he gave him his choice of the phrases "contrary to law," or in "contravention of this Act." It would be well that, as they were creating new crimes by this Bill, the expression "in contravention of this Act," which the hon. and learned Attorney General required in a previous clause, should be required now.

Amendment proposed, in page 6, line 36, to leave out "contrary to law," and insert "in contravention of this Act"—(Mr. Warton.)—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words 'contrary to law' stand part of the Clause."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he did not see much difference between the two phrases, and, therefore, he would agree to the Amendment.

Question put, and negatived.

Question proposed, "That the words 'in contravention of this Act' be there inserted" put, and agreed to.

MR. WARTON proposed the omission of the clause. The hon. and learned Attorney General spoke with great force in respect to this clause when he moved the second reading of the Bill. The hon. and learned Gentleman said it was very proper that they should prevent public-houses being engaged for election purposes; but perhaps the hon. and learned Gentleman would not consider it unkind in him (Mr. Warton) if he said that in his speech the hon. and learned Gentleman gave excellent reasons why the same provision should not be applied to municipal as to Parliamentary elections. They knew that in Parliamentary elections it was very easy to get committee rooms, because all sorts of peculiar places could be obtained; but in municipal elections it was not so easy to get rooms for the purposes of committees. It seemed to him (Mr. Warton) that there should be no stigma placed on a really respectable trade. The licensed victuallers only wished to do what was proper; but they were supervised by the police and restricted in every way. He proposed to omit the clause.

Amendment proposed to leave out Clause 16.—(Mr. Warton.)

Question, "That the words 'any premises' stand part of the Bill," put, and agreed to.

MR. H. S. NORTHCOTE proposed, as an Amendment, in page 7, line 17, after "association," to insert—

"Not being a bond fide club, society, or association, which shall have been in existence for the period of 12 months prior to the passing of this Act."

He said he need not detain the House for many moments in submitting this Amendment to its judgment. Although the hon. and learned Attorney General (Sir Henry James) was at one time not disinclined to accede to the principle of allowing bond fide clubs to be used for political election purposes, ultimately he failed to make a proposal which was satisfactory to the great majority of the House. The Amendment he (Mr. H. S. Northcote) submitted in Committee on this subject was rejected, on the ground that municipal elections should not be conducted on political lines. As a matter of fact, however, municipal contests, in a great majority of the boroughs of the United Kingdom, were fought on political grounds, and he did not see any immediate prospect of a cessation of the practice. If such contests were to be fought on political grounds, it was desirable that the legitimate political machinery should be used. It appeared to him that these bond fide political clubs were necessarily the places where a great part of the work attending municipal elections was done; and, therefore, their use as committee rooms should be formally legalized. He was afraid, if that was not the case, a great deal of indirect and underhand work must necessarily be done at the clubs. He was quite certain that if working men belonged to the clubs they would go in the evening and talk over the election, and it was impossible to avoid a certain amount of objectionable work being done in an informal way. If his Amendment were adopted, there would be an assimilation, as far as possible, of the mode of conducting Parliamentary and municipal elections. It was clear that the legalization of the use of political clubs would not make any difference in the conduct of municipal elections upon political grounds; because the men who became candidates for seats in Town Councils were, as a rule, not the working men who habitually used the club, and who became thoroughly saturated with political Party principles, but leading tradesmen, who might join clubs with the view of encouraging the Liberal or the Conservative cause, and who would stand for positions in the Town Council entirely independent of their membership of a club. Under these circumstances, and wishing that if municipal elections were to be fought on political grounds, they should be fought in a legitimate manner, he had ventured to submit this Amendment to the House. If he might make a verbal alteration in his Amendment it would be to substitute "permanent" for "bond fide." "Permanent" was a better word, and more completely expressed his meaning. His only object in saying "bond fide" was to guard against the employment of mere drinking shops, which were sometimes called clubs.

Amendment proposed,

In page 7, line 17, after the word "association," to insert the words "not being a permanent club, society, or association, which shall have been in existence for the period of 12 months prior to the passing of this Act."—(Mr. H. S. Northcote.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (SIR HENRY JAMES) said, he would suggest to the hon. Gentleman (Mr. H. S. Northcote) that he should withdraw his Amendment in favour of the one standing in the name of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lincolnshire (Mr. E. Stanhope), on which Amendment the question could be more appropriately raised. He (Sir Henry James) had only to trouble the House with a few sentences in expressing his views upon this subject. He had to ask the House even more strongly than before to take upon itself the entire responsibility of dealing with this proposal. As he was in the novel condition of finding himself differing with some of his Colleagues on the question, he wished to state briefly why he desired to see this Amendment rejected. Would the House see what they were discussing? It really was not the question of the convenience of a particular candidate; but a very broad question they were discussing. Many persons wished to take municipal elections out of the area of Party politics; they wished to get, as members of municipal bodies, men of moderate views, who would not run on political lines; but who would be willing and anxious to serve the localities without being tied to one side or the other. What was proposed was to give to the club managers to decide who should be elected. Let the House take into its view a practical condition of things. Suppose there were three candidates for one seat, a Tory, a Liberal, and an independent. The Tory and the Liberal would have the use of their respective clubs for committee rooms; but what would become of the independent candidate? Take the case where they had two Tories and no Liberal standing for one seat. The Tory who placed himself in the hands of the Tory managers had a great advantage over his opponent, because he obtained the support of the club, as well as of those who were of the same political opinion. By the use of a club they did not only save the expense of a committee room, but the whole weight of the club was given to the candidate the club espoused. If a political club took up the cudgels of one of its partizans and gave him the whole weight of the Party organization and the club management, what chance had any other candidate, even though he might hold the same political views? He (Sir Henry James) considered that if the House accepted this Amendment they would give great strength to those who desired to see Party politics control municipal elections; they would give to municipal contests greater political weight than, in the interest of the public, they ought to have. These were his own opinions, from which many with whom he generally agreed differed.

Mr. E. STANHOPE said, he would admit there was something in what the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General (Sir Henry James) had said; but he thought the hon. and learned Gentleman did not attach sufficient importance to the fact that many clubs had been established for the purpose of promoting electoral purity. ["Oh, oh!"] That was his opinion—indeed, he was quite certain it was a fact that, in a good many boroughs where previously corrupt practices had prevailed, pure elections had been the outcome of the establishment of political clubs. One reason why he had framed his Amendment in the form in which it appeared on the Paper was that many clubs had been formed in which intoxicating liquors could not be sold, and the clause now under consideration would prevent such clubs being used for political purposes. That, in his opinion, was unreasonable and unfair. If his hon. Friend (Mr. Northcote) would allow him to submit his Amendment to the House, he hoped it would meet with the approval of hon. Gentlemen.

Mr. H. S. NORTHCOTE asked leave to withdraw his Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. E. STANHOPE moved, as an Amendment, to add, at end of the clause—"Provided also, That nothing in this section shall apply to any permanent political club."

Amendment proposed,

In page 7, line 32, to insert at the end of the sub-section, the words "Provided also, That nothing in this section shall apply to any permanent political club."—(Mr. E. Stanhope.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

Mr. ARTHUR ARNOLD said, with regard to the remark made by the hon. and learned Attorney General (Sir Henry James), that if they did not allow political clubs to be used for election purposes, they would certainly not prevent municipal elections being more or less political. His hon. and learned Friend dwelt upon the fact that politics did enter into municipal contests. He said—"You give to the Liberal or Tory candidate all the club organization."

He (Mr. Arthur Arnold) replied to the hon. and learned Gentleman—"You cannot take it from him." In every large borough these clubs existed—in all the Lancashire boroughs they existed to a great degree, and it was impossible to deprive a Party candidate of the support a club could give him. The hon. and learned Attorney General asked what was to become of the independent candidate. Unless he was a man of great personal weight he would stand very badly at any time; if he was a man of great weight and standing he would probably succeed. Considering that every Member on the Grand Committee who represented a large borough constituency voted for this Amendment he hoped the proposal of the hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire (Mr. E. Stanhope) would be adopted by the House.

Mr. CAUSTON said, he hoped the Amendment would not be adopted. When the House was in Committee on the Parliamentary Elections (Corrupt and Illegal Practices) Bill of last year, he and his hon. Friend the Member for Bedford (Mr. Whitbread) spoke strongly against such a proposition as the present. If all the clubs which would be affected were bond fide political clubs, he should have no objection to the proposition; but what he contended was that in nearly all the boroughs of the Kingdom clubs had been started which were not bond fide Liberal or Conservative clubs. The rank and file of some clubs paid very small contributions, while the richer members of the Party to which the club was attached provided funds which enabled the poorer members to enjoy the luxuries of eating and drinking, but not at their own expense. That, in his opinion, was corruption in its worst form. It was quite unnecessary that clubs should be used for municipal election purposes. He hoped the House would support the hon. and learned Attorney General in his endeavour to put down what really amounted to a very corrupt practice.

Mr. R. ASSHETON CROSS said, it was quite clear the hon. Member for Colchester (Mr. Causton) knew nothing of the independence of feeling and action of the working men of Lancashire.

Mr. DILLWYN said, he entirely agreed with the view of the hon. and learned Attorney General. The more they eliminated political matters from municipal elections the better. He desired to see independent men taking an active part in the local concerns of a borough; and, in his opinion, the prohibition of the use of political clubs for election purposes would greatly contribute to such an end.

Mr. H. H. FOWLER said, his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General (Sir Henry James) had said he was very anxious to prevent the introduction of the political element into municipal conflicts. The hon. and learned Gentleman seemed to forget that that element already existed very largely in some of the principal boroughs of the Kingdom. He asserted that, as a matter of fact—and he challenged contradiction on the point—municipal elections in some of the largest boroughs were invariably fought on political lines—just as much on political lines as any Parliamentary election. He did not intend to argue whether it was right or wrong. It was a very taking argument in favour of the view of the hon. and learned Attorney General, that they should, if possible, get the best men to perform the work of our Municipalities. But it was contended that the best way of getting the best men was the introduction of the political element. The experience of many Gentlemen, who knew a great deal more about municipal life than he did, was that the best men of the different Parties came forward when they received the sympathy and influence of their Parties. But whether it be right or wrong, he did not think the House of Commons, in passing a Municipal Elections (Corrupt and Illegal Practices) Bill, was justified in endeavouring to introduce some new principle into municipal elections which did not exist already. They had to try to prevent bribery and corruption, and not to try to introduce any new principle into municipal elections. Last year, when considering the Parliamentary Elections (Corrupt and Illegal Practices) Bill, they came to the conclusion that they ought to allow candidates the advantage of the use of permanent political clubs for committee purposes. If it was right to use clubs in Parliamentary elections, it was equally right to use them in municipal elections. The observations of the hon. Member for Colchester (Mr. Causton) would apply with as much force to Parliamentary as to municipal elections. The Legislature did not adopt the view of his hon. Friend, but had allowed clubs to be used for political purposes. He (Mr. H. H. Fowler) could not see why the House should apply one rule to one class of elections and another rule to another class of elections. When a Liberal and Tory stood for any municipal constituency, it was useless to talk about an independent candidate. In boroughs where the Liberal and Tory elements were strong, elections would be fought on Party lines. He should certainly vote with the hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire (Mr. E. Stanhope); because what the hon. Gentleman proposed was a wise provision to introduce, and it would fairly carry out the legislation of last year.

Mr. MONK said, that, with all respect to the hon. Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. H. H. Fowler), he could not agree with him that municipal elections ought to be fought strictly on political grounds.

Mr. H. H. FOWLER said, he should be sorry to be misunderstood. He did not say municipal elections ought to be fought on political lines; but he said, as a matter of fact, they were fought on political grounds. He must not be quoted as having said that municipal elections ought to be so fought.

Mr. MONK said, he entirely agreed with the hon. Member for Wolverhampton that, in the majority of instances, municipal elections were fought on political grounds; but he thought the House should do all it could to discourage such elections being so fought. He took exception to what had fallen from the hon. Member for Salford (Mr. Arthur Arnold). That hon. Gentleman had said that in the Grand Committee, of which he was a distinguished Member, all the Members for the large municipal boroughs voted in favour of this Amendment. Now, there was a Division in the Committee; but there was a majority of three to one against the view of the hon. Member for Salford—there were 26 against the proposal, and nine for it, and by far the larger number of Members who sat for large municipal boroughs voted against the proposal. His hon. Friends the Member for Salford and the Member for Oldham were the principal Representatives of large boroughs who voted for the proposal, while the hon. Member for Bristol, the hon. Member for Dundee, the hon. and learned Member for Stockport, and others—by far the greater majority of Representatives of large constituencies—were opposed to it. He hoped the House would support the hon. and learned Attorney General (Sir Henry James) in rejecting this proposal.

Mr. AGNEW said, he should certainly vote for the Amendment of the hon. Gentleman; the Member for Mid Lincolnshire (Mr. E. Stanhope), because he was convinced that the agency of clubs had largely resulted in inducing the best men, be they Liberals or Conservatives, to become candidates at municipal elections. He was of opinion, too, that the clubs so largely established in the North of England had, in their operation, resulted in not only providing a better class of candidates for municipal elections, but in elections being conducted in a much more orderly manner than formerly.

Question put.

Clause 19 (Report exonerating candidate in certain cases of corrupt and illegal practice by agents).

Mr. WARTON, in moving, as an Amendment, to insert after "character," in page 8, line 27, "and could not reasonably have been supposed to have affected the result of the election," said, the hon. and learned Attorney General (Sir Henry James) would know, of course, whence the words he proposed to insert came. Parliament had already laid down the principle that, where corrupt practices extensively prevailed, it was reasonable to suppose they affected the result of the election. He (Mr. Warton) thought, however, that if the corrupt practices were of a trivial character they ought not to be held to invalidate the election. It was quite possible that in the case of a very closely-contested election—an election which turned, for instance, on one or two votes—the offences committed might be of a very trivial and unimportant nature. This Amendment he proposed in the interest of purity of election, and he confidently submitted these words to the approval of the hon. and learned Attorney General.

Amendment proposed,

In page 8, line 27, after the word "character," to insert the words "and could not reasonably have been supposed to have affected the result of the election."—(Mr. Warton.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he could not assent to the Amendment, because it was evident, if any offences affected the result of the election, they could not be trivial or unimportant.

Question put, and negatived.

Clause 20 (Power of High Court and Election Court to except innocent act from being illegal practice, &c.).

MR. WARTON, in moving, as an Amendment, to insert after "same," in page 9, line 12, "a corrupt practice or," said, this Amendment also he moved in the interest of purity. He wanted to have corrupt practices provided for, as well as illegal practices.

Amendment proposed, in page 9, line 12, after the word "same," to insert the words "a corrupt practice or."—(Mr. Warton.)

Question, "That those words be there inserted," put, and negatived.

Clause 31 (Sending in claims and making payments for election expenses).

MR. WARTON, in moving, as an Amendment, to leave out line 24 in page 9, said, it seemed to him perfectly absurd to retain this line in the clause. The same idea was expressed twice over in two consecutive lines—"Any person who makes a claim except where the payment is allowed." How could a payment be made in contravention of the section if it was allowed by the section?

Amendment proposed, in page 9, to leave out line 24.—(Mr. Warton.)

Question proposed, "That line 24 stand part of the Bill."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he must confess that the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Warton) had been rather ingenious in finding opportunities to move Amendments. Payment might be in contravention of the section, as the hon. and learned Gentleman would see in the next page, although, in contravention of the section, certain payment was to be allowed. This line was quite necessary.

Question put, and agreed to.

Amendment proposed, in page 10, line 13, to leave out the word "an."—(Mr. Warton.)

Question, "That the word 'an' stand part of the Bill," put, and agreed to.

Clause 24 (List in burgess roll of persons incapacitated for voting by corrupt or illegal practices).

MR. WARTON, in moving, as an Amendment, to leave out "other," in page 11, line 29, said, he wished to explain that this Amendment must be considered in conjunction with the others he had put down to the same clause. It appeared to him it would be far better not to have the phrase "or an election to any public office." It would also be shorter and simpler to say "continuing or amending this or that Act." The phrase employed in the clause was rather roundabout; and as they were dealing with corrupt practices and other crimes, it was needless to say "under any Act continuing or amending this or that Act."

Amendment proposed, in page 11, line 29, to leave out the word "other."—(Mr. Warton.)

Question, "That the word 'other' stand part of the Bill," put, and agreed to.

Amendment proposed,

In page 11, line 29, to leave out from the word "Act" to the word "office," in line 30, inclusive, in order to insert the words "continuing or amending this or that Act,"—(Mr. Warton.)

—instead thereof.

Question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Bill," put, and agreed to.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "and," in page 11, line 32, and insert the word "or,"—(Mr. Warton.) —instead thereof.

Question, "That the word 'and' stand part of the Bill," put, and negatived.

Question, "That the word 'or' be there inserted," put, and agreed to.

MR. WARTON proposed, as an Amendment, to insert after "Parliamentary," in page 11, line 41, "or municipal."

Amendment proposed, in page 11, line 41, after the word "Parliamentary," to insert the words "or municipal."—(Mr. Warton.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) opposed the Amendment because the words "or any public office" covered "municipal."

MR. WARTON said, he agreed with what the hon. and learned Attorney General had said; but it would be better and shorter to have "Parliamentary or municipal."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, the word "municipal" did not carry into effect what was wished. There were offices such as Boards of Guardians and Local Boards which did not come under "municipal," but which did come under "other public office."

Question put, and negatived.

Clause 25 (Time for presentation of petition alleging illegal practices).

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) moved, as an Amendment, to insert Clause 26 as sub-section (1) of Clause 25.

Amendment proposed,

In page 13, line 10, at beginning of Clause, to insert Clause 26 as Sub-Section (1).—(Mr. Attorney General.)

Question, "That the said Clause be there inserted as sub-section (1)," put, and agreed to.

MR. WARTON moved, as an Amendment, to leave out "an," in page 13, line 11.

Amendment proposed, in page 13, line 11, to leave out the word "an."—(Mr. Warton.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'an' stand part of the Bill."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he was sorry he could not give way to his hon. and learned Friend's "an" on this occasion.

Question put, and agreed to.

Clause 27 (Withdrawal of election petition).

MR. WARTON, in moving, as an Amendment, to leave out "on special grounds," in page 13, line 39, said, it seemed to him that these words were quite unnecessary. Why not say, "which seem just to the Court," as they had said before?

Amendment proposed, in page 13, line 39, leave out the words "on special grounds."—(Mr. Warton.)

Question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Bill," put, and agreed to.

MR. WARTON, in moving, as an Amendment, in page 14, line 1, to leave out all after "state," to end of sub-section, and insert—

"Fully the terms of any agreement or undertaking made or entered into respecting the withdrawal of the petition, to which agreement or undertaking the deponent may have been party or privy."

said, it appeared to him that the provision in sub-section (2) was extremely long and unnecessary, and he trusted the hon. and learned Attorney General would see his way to omit it.

Amendment proposed,

In page 14, line 1, to leave out all the words after the word "state" to the end of sub-section, and insert the words "fully the terms of any agreement or undertaking made or entered into respecting the withdrawal of the petition, to which agreement or undertaking the deponent may have been party or privy,"—(Mr. Warton.)

—instead thereof.

Question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Bill," put and agreed to.

MR. WARTON, in moving, as an Amendment, to leave out "(whether lawful or unlawful)" in page 14, line 18, said, he would ask what did the phrase mean? Did it mean that the person making the affidavit was to state whether, in his opinion, the grounds were lawful or unlawful, or did it mean all the grounds? If it meant all the grounds, it would not be necessary to say whether lawful or unlawful.

Amendment proposed, in page 14, line 18, to leave out the words "(whether lawful or unlawful)."—(Mr. Warton.)

Question, "That the words '(whether lawful or unlawful)' stand part of the Bill," put, and agreed to.

MR. WARTON said, he should not move any of the following 10 or 12 Amendments which stood in his name on the Paper.

Clause 30 (Power to election court to order payment by borough, or individual, of costs of election petition).

MR. INDERWICK said, he proposed, as an Amendment, to insert at the end of the clause—

“No witness on the trial of any municipal election petition presented after the passing of this Act shall be liable to be asked, or bound to answer, any question for the purpose of proving, or tending to prove, the commission of any corrupt practice at or in relation to any Parliamentary or municipal election prior to the passing of this Act.”

There were two modes of inquiring as to the existence of corrupt practices at a Parliamentary election—either Commissioners were appointed by the Crown to make an inquiry, or an Election Petition was presented against the return of a Member to the House. The 49th section of the Parliamentary Elections (Corrupt and Illegal Practices) Act was as follows :—

“Provided that in all cases where the Commissioners have been appointed to inquire into corrupt practices, the Commissioners shall not inquire into any corrupt practices with regard to any elections which have taken place before the passing of the Act ;”

and then the Act further provided—

“That no witnesses called before such Commissioners, and no witnesses called on any election petition after the passing of this Act, shall be allowed to be asked, or bound to answer, any question for the purpose of proving the commission of corrupt practices in relation to any election prior to the passing of this Act.”

Of course, the Amendment he proposed had no reference to a Commission, because a Commission was not issued for the purpose of inquiring into corrupt practices at municipal elections. But there were such things as election petitions in regard to municipal elections, as there were in regard to Parliamentary elections; and he proposed, therefore, to add words to assimilate this Act with the Act of last year in regard to the mode in which election inquiries should be conducted. The House would recollect that this matter was discussed at great length when the Parliamentary Elections (Corrupt and Illegal Practices) Bill was before the House. A clause, similar to the one he (Mr. Inderwick) now moved, was proposed by the hon.

Member for Glasgow (Mr. Anderson), and received the universal assent of the House. The hon. and learned Attorney General (Sir Henry James) gave his assent to the clause, and said, in his opinion, it would be a very valuable addition to the Bill; and added—

“With regard to these matters, bygones should be bygones; and when this Act passed, there should be no one who should be in fear of coming forward.”

Such was the feeling entertained by every Member of the House, and accordingly the clause received general assent. There was only one other observation he had to make. When the Act was passed last year, it was said it was very proper to pass an Act of Parliament which would prevent any Member's past misdeeds being inquired into. He was bound to say the House of Commons would stand in a somewhat invidious position if they failed to consider in the same tone and temper a question of this kind as affecting Municipalities and municipal electors of the country. He begged to move the Amendment which stood in his name.

Amendment proposed,

In page 18, line 13, at the end of the subsection, to insert the words—“No witness on the trial of any municipal election petition presented after the passing of this Act, shall be liable to be asked, or bound to answer, any question for the purpose of proving, or tending to prove, the commission of any corrupt practice at or in relation to any Parliamentary or municipal election prior to the passing of this Act.” (Mr. Inderwick.)

Question proposed, “That those words be there inserted.”

MR. EDWARD CLARKE said, that though he was partly responsible for the form of the clause adopted by the House last year, he could not support his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Inderwick) in the proposal he now made. The two cases were essentially different. It was felt that unless some such clause as this were inserted in the Parliamentary Elections (Corrupt and Illegal Practices) Bill, there were a good many boroughs in the country in which Petitions would not be presented from the fear that the evidence given concerning past elections might have the effect of bringing about a disfranchisement of the constituency. He (Mr. E. Clarke), and the majority of the House, thought it was desirable to remove that fear, and so enable boroughs to start entirely free from the check upon petitions which existed in the memory of past misdeeds. But that did not apply to municipal elections at all. There was no danger of the revelations made upon one petition leading to a Commission and the disfranchisement of the place. The only thing that this clause would do, if it were put in the Bill, would be to enable people who had been guilty of bribery in past times to go into the witness-box and present themselves on the trial of an election petition absolutely free from any danger of having their character attacked, or of having their evidence discredited by their past actions. He hoped the hon. and learned Attorney General (Sir Henry James) would not consent to introduce this clause, which would not produce the good results which they hoped and expected from the clause inserted in the Bill of last year, but which would result in putting the man unclean in municipal matters on exactly the same footing as the man who had been clean all his life.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (SIR HENRY JAMES) said, he could not vote for the clause. An inquiry into a Parliamentary election was very different to that into a municipal election. In the case of a Parliamentary election, Royal Commissioners were appointed whose duty it was to inquire into past elections. In the case of municipal elections, they had no such inquiries. They had only inquiries as to particular elections, and the result of this clause would be simply to prevent cross-examination as to a man's credit. As a matter of fact, the clause would give a good character as regarded corrupt practices to every witness who came into the box. A man might have been a briber all his life, and yet nothing could be asked him as to his credibility. That would be the only effect of the clause; and, therefore, he (Sir Henry James) hoped it would not be approved by the House.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON said, he could not agree with his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General (Sir Henry James) and the hon. and learned Member for Plymouth (Mr. E. Clarke) in their attempt to discriminate in this matter between Parliamentary and municipal elections. The object of this Bill and of the Parliamentary Elections (Corrupt and Illegal Practices) Bill was, as he understood it, to promote purity of election, and the only way in which that could be done was to encourage Petitions. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Plymouth had argued that they would discourage Parliamentary Petitions, but not municipal petitions, by not accepting this clause. It appeared to him (Mr. S. Buxton) that they would just as much discourage municipal election petitions as they would Parliamentary Election Petitions, for the borough was as corrupt in municipal matters as in Parliamentary. It would be just in those boroughs where corruption had taken place at past municipal elections that a petitioner would be afraid to petition, not through fear of disfranchisement, but through the fear that he himself, or his friends, would be exposed to the obloquy of having taken part in past acts of bribery. He (Mr. S. Buxton) could not agree with the hon. and learned Attorney General that that fear would be entirely done away with by the fact that the town would not be disfranchised. He agreed with his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Inderwick) that, in this matter, the law relating to municipal elections should be assimilated to that affecting Parliamentary elections; and, therefore, he very heartily supported the clause the hon. and learned Gentleman proposed.

Question put, and negatived.

Clause 36 (Application to City of London of Act and of Part IV. of 45 & 46 Vict. c. 50).

MR. R. N. FOWLER (LORD MAYOR) said, he proposed, as an Amendment, to leave out, in page 20, line 34, "in the case of an election by liverymen in Common Hall, and." The City of London had no wish to be exempted from the provisions of the Bill; but the elections with which this and the subsequent Amendments he had on the Paper had to deal were very different from any other municipal elections—they were, in fact, rather of the character of Parliamentary elections. The Liverymen formed a very large constituency, many of them residing considerable distances from the City. Under the circumstances, he did not see how it was possible the provisions of the Bill could apply to the elections by Liverymen. As regards the Lord Mayor's election, in any contest the merits of the candidates would be well known, more or less; but in the case of an election for the office of Chamberlain that would not be the case, and candidates might not be very much known. Politics, he was happy to say, did not enter much into City elections; but that made it all the more necessary to make oneself known to the electorate by circulars and advertisements, and any candidate must be put to very considerable expense. So that they had a claim to have a reasonable sum allowed for expenses that must necessarily be incurred under the circumstances. The sum he had named was quite as little as it was possible to conduct an election upon, and it was only two-thirds of what would be allowed in a Parliamentary election. In many respects, the election for Lord Mayor bore more analogy to a Parliamentary election than anything else, and, certainly, he did not see how it was possible to conduct an election on the small sum allowed in the Bill; and he, therefore, hoped his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General would see his way to allowing the Amendment. Contested elections to the offices of Lord Mayor and Sheriff were rare—still they occasionally arose; and he did not see how they could be properly conducted as the Bill stood.

Amendment proposed, in page 20, line 34, to leave out the words "in the case of an election by liverymen in Common Hall, and."—(Mr. R. N. Fowler.)

MR. ALDERMAN W. LAWRENCE said, he was sorry the discussion of this Amendment had been driven to such a late hour, for this was a very important clause in the Bill. At first, the City was not included in the Bill; but the civic authorities thought the City ought to be included, for they did not think their elections should be so expensive as they had been. The elections in Common Hall were different to any other elections in the country. In Common Hall, the Lord Mayor, Sheriffs, the Chamberlain, and two or three less important officers were elected; and, under the present system, if a poll was demanded, it was open for seven days, the Liverymen living at a distance to which there was no limit, though there was a limit of distance, if they voted as Liverymen for a Member of Parliament. Now, the object was not to encourage an extravagant expenditure—the object was to prevent an evil in the other direction. The office of Chamberlain was one of high position, power, and emolument; and it was the desire of many to occupy it. The citizens wished to have one of their number in that position of whom they could be proud; they wished to have a man who would uphold the honour and dignity of the City, and be a credit to his position. But it would be possible to adopt tactics by which a man might be put forward, with sufficient support to carry an election, before the great body of Liverymen could be informed on the facts and merits of the case; and what was wanted was the opportunity of allowing information to be distributed among the Liverymen. Considering the cost of sending 10,000 circulars, and the cost of advertising, the amount allowed in the Bill was quite insufficient. The Corporation asked that this should be altered, so as not to debar them from the means of getting the best man to fill an important position. Any idea that the money might be used for furthering corruption was absurd; the amount, in itself, gave no opportunity for it. He would not go into the question whether the system was the best; but it had existed for four or five centuries; and now, when altering a seven days' poll to one, it was the more necessary to have the claims of candidates made well known to the electors. Not the same difficulty would arise in the election of a Lord Mayor, as the Liverymen elected two, and the Aldermen made the selection. That was done last year, and was the subject of much criticism at the time; but he believed that it was now generally admitted that the selection by the Aldermen of Alderman Fowler for Lord Mayor was wise and discreet. It was a different thing in the election of Chamberlain; whoever was elected to fill that position must spend money previously, in some shape or form, to inform the Liverymen of his claims. He hoped his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General would grant the request of the City.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (SIR HENRY JAMES) said, his only desire was to act in a manner most acceptable to those most concerned. In the Grand Committee this question was left open.

for the decision of the House; for, as he said when the proposal was made, then they had not sufficient information. He felt the force of that which his right hon. Friend the Lord Mayor had said. These elections were quite distinct from those under ordinary circumstances, the Liverymen having the privilege of living out of the borough. At the same time, while willing to make the concession, he thought that £400 was a rather larger sum than was really necessary. He thought that £250 would be a sufficient and reasonable sum.

Question put, and negatived.

Amendment agreed to.

MR. R. N. FOWLER (LORD MAYOR) said, as regarded the third Amendment he had on the Paper, he would accept the proposal of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General, and substitute £250 for £400. First, however, he would move the Amendment in line 35.

Amendment proposed, in page 20, line 35, after "Alderman," insert "and Common Councilman."—(Mr. R. N. Fowler.)

Question, "That those words be there inserted," put, and agreed to.

Amendment proposed, in page 20, after line 37, insert the following subsection:—

"(1.) In the case of an election by liverymen in common hall a sum may be paid and expenses incurred, if a poll be not demanded, not exceeding forty pounds, and, if a poll be demanded, then not exceeding two hundred and fifty pounds, and in the event of a poll being demanded, such poll shall take place on the third day after the demand for a poll be made, unless such third day be a Sunday, in which case the poll shall take place on the fourth day, and the poll shall last for one day only, and commence at the hour of eight in the morning and close at six in the evening.—(Mr. R. N. Fowler.)

Question, "That those words be there inserted," put, and agreed to.

Clause 41 (Act not to extend to Scotland).

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (SIR HENRY JAMES) said, he would propose, as an Amendment, that the Bill should not extend to Ireland. The election of Guardians in Ireland was the only class of election, he believed, which required the application of this Bill, and such elections would be dealt with in another Bill.

The Attorney General

Amendment proposed, in page 23, line 11, after "Scotland," insert "or Ireland."—(Mr. Attorney General.)

Question, "That those words be there inserted," put, and agreed to.

On the Motion of MR. ATTORNEY GENERAL, Clause 42 (Application of Act to Ireland), struck out of the Bill.

SCHEDULES.

On the Motion of MR. ATTORNEY GENERAL, the following Amendments made.

Schedule 1, page 25, line 23, leave out from end of line to end of Schedule; Schedule 2, page 26, line 29, leave out from end of line to end of Schedule; Schedule 3, page 29, line 11, at end of Part I., insert—

Enactment defining the offences of bribery, treating, undue influence, and personation.

"The Municipal Corporations Act, 1883."

(45 and 46 Vic. c. 50, s. 77.)

(Definitions.)

"S. 77. 'Bribery,' 'treating,' 'undue influence,' and 'personation,' include respectively anything done before, at, after, or with respect to a municipal election, which, if done before, at, after, or with respect to a parliamentary election, would make the person doing the same liable to any penalty, punishment, or disqualification for bribery, treating, undue influence, or personation, as the case may be, under any Act for the time being in force with respect to parliamentary elections."

Bill read the third time, and passed.

ROYAL COURTS OF JUSTICE BILL.

(Mr. Courtney, Mr. Herbert Gladstone.)

[BILL 139.] COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House will, upon Monday next, resolve itself into the said Committee."—(Mr. Courtney.)

MR. WARTON, in moving, as an Amendment, to substitute "Monday 4th August" for "Monday next," said, he should like to know whether there was any real intention to proceed with the Bill, after the important decision of the House a few weeks since, when the Government were defeated? The effect of that was to leave the Bill a mere shell, a wreck. Did the Government mean to proceed with it in that state; or did they wish to seize an opportunity when the attendance of hon. Members was small to restore the Bill to its original shape? The latter would certainly not be a right thing to do.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the words "Monday next," in order to insert the words "Monday 4th August,"—(Mr. Warton),—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words 'Monday next' stand part of the Question."

MR. COURTNEY said, no; they did not intend to seek to restore the clause; but they were not without hope of getting the Bill through.

Question put, and agreed to.

Committee deferred till Monday next.

SUPERANNUATION BILL.—[BILL 146.]

(Mr. Herbert Gladstone, Mr. Courtney.)

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

MR. BOORD said, he did not want to oppose the Bill; but he wished to have it extended to certain classes of workmen engaged in the manufacturing departments of the War Office. He had explained this to hon. Gentlemen opposite, and he hoped to have some assurance that the matter had received consideration.

MR. HERBERT GLADSTONE said, this question had been raised before; and his hon. Friend the Surveyor General of Ordnance (Mr. Brand), on the part of the War Office, was ready to make further inquiries. At the same time, he did not think the inquiry would result in altering the opinion of the Treasury, which was adverse to the views of the hon. Member opposite. Further inquiry, however, would be made, and he would suggest that they should now go into Committee. He would then move to report Progress at once, and defer the Bill to Monday.

Bill considered in Committee.

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Monday next.

PUBLIC WORKS LOANS BILL.

(Mr. Courtney, Mr. Herbert Gladstone.)

[BILL 299.] COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

MR. MARJORIBANKS said, in moving the Motion he had given Notice of, he would briefly refer to the Har-bours and Passing Tolls Act of 1861, and the provisions therein. That Act was passed as the consequence and result of two inquiries that were held—one by the Select Committee of 1857-8, and one by the Royal Commission of 1859-60. Among the recommendations that resulted from these inquiries was one that loans to trading harbours should be granted at a low rate of interest. To give effect to this a Bill was introduced by the right hon. Gentleman the late Mr. Milner Gibson, the then President of the Board of Trade, and the present Prime Minister, then Chancellor of the Exchequer, which enacted that loans should be granted at 3½ per cent to trading harbours. The Bill passed, and the Act worked fairly well down to 1879, when a change was introduced by a Bill similar to the one now before the House—a "Public Works Loans Bill," which left it at the discretion of the Treasury to raise the rate of interest on advances under the Harbours and Passing Tolls Act, and any other Acts sanctioning loans at a special rate of interest, to whatever rate under 5 per cent the Treasury thought desirable. In consequence, a Treasury Minute was issued, which changed the 3½ per cent to a sliding scale of interest of 3½ per cent under 20 years; 3¾ per cent between 20 and 30 years; 4 per cent between 30 and 40 years; and 4½ per cent between 40 and 50 years. This had the effect of raising the rate of interest 1 per cent on all harbour loans; for, naturally, such loans were required for the longest term that could be granted, the works requiring a long time for completion and to fructify. The intention, in the passing of the Act of 1861, was very well expressed in evidence recently given before his Committee by Sir Thomas Farrer. He said—

"The policy of granting loans to harbours was adopted in place of making harbours of refuge at the expense of the public funds. You must not look at loans to trading harbours as if they stood quite alone, or were to be considered on the bare principle of political economy. The fact was the loans were not merely for the improvement of harbours, but were for staying off or preventing a larger expenditure on the construction of harbours of refuge."

He (Mr. Marjoribanks) said that the raising of the rate of interest was practically a breach of faith with Harbour Trusts of the Kingdom. The Select Committee, over which he had had the honour to preside, was so thoroughly convinced of that, that, when reporting last year to the House, they made a special recommendation with regard to the rate of interest charged on advances under the Harbours and Passing Tolls Act, 1861. He believed that immediate effect could be given to that recommendation; and from a private conversation which he had had with the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Childers), and also from an answer which the right hon. Gentleman had given him in that House, he gathered that he was by no means prepared to meet this recommendation of the Select Committee with entire hostility. He had, therefore, hoped and expected that some change would have been arranged for in this Bill; and he was bound to say that he felt somewhat surprised and disappointed when he found, on Tuesday morning, that no change whatever was proposed. Under those circumstances, having had to consider the best course to pursue, he had arrived at the conclusion that the proper course to be taken was to put a Notice on the Paper of a Motion for an Instruction to the Committee to give effect to the recommendations of the Select Committee on Harbour Accommodation. He would not trouble the House with a lengthened argument at that hour of the night; he would merely appeal to hon. Members to support him in the Division he intended to take upon the Motion standing in his name, and which he now begged to move.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That it be an Instruction to the Committee on Public Works Loans that they have power to give effect to the recommendations of the Select Committee on Harbour Accommodation in their Report of 1883, having reference to the reduction of the rate of interest charged on advances made under 'The Harbours and Passing Tolls Act, 1861.'"—(Mr. Marjoribanks.)

MR. COURTNEY: Sir, I am sorry to have to ask a question with reference to a point of Order. I ask, whether it is in Order to move an Instruction of this kind to the Committee, when the Committee is already able to give effect to the object of the Motion without such Instruction? I understand that an Instruction is only permissible where the Committee about to be appointed is unable to report without that Instruction.

Mr. Marjoribanks

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Gentleman has rightly stated the Rule on this point. Instruction is only permissible when it is necessary for the purpose of giving powers to a Committee to do that which otherwise they would have no authority to do.

MR. HEALY: How are we to know what view the Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means will take of an Amendment embodying the terms of the Motion? We may have the Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means ruling that such an Amendment does not come within the scope of the Bill. I ask, whether it is intended to inform the Chairman of Ways and Means that the Amendment may be moved?

MR. SPEAKER: The terms of the Motion will be a matter entirely for the Committee, and not for the Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, to decide.

MR. HEALY: But with regard to an Amendment; it will be competent for anyone in Committee of Ways and Means to ask the Chairman whether the proposal which the hon. Member for Berwickshire (Mr. Marjoribanks) has moved would be in Order; and it might be part of the tactics of other hon. Members to defeat the object of the hon. Member by some other means, just as they were trying to defeat it at the present moment. I wish to know, whether we have any guarantee that the Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means will not give a ruling in favour of the Resolution not being moved?

MR. SPEAKER: It is a question of Order that has arisen, not a question of the ruling of the Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means.

MR. HEALY: Then I understand that you have given no ruling on the point with regard to the Resolution in the Committee?

MR. SPEAKER: I am quite willing to hear the arguments on that point.

MR. COURTNEY: Sir, I am sorry there is another point which must be raised, as to whether it is competent to move the Resolution at all.

MR. MARJORIBANKS said, that in the Public Works Loans Act, 1879, certain authority was given to the Treasury, and the Treasury, using that authority, had issued a certain Minute, and it was that Minute which he desired to take the power of altering in this Bill.

MR. COURTNEY: This Committee derives authority from the Public Loans Act, 1879, which deals with the whole question of public loans. I submit that the Motion for going into Committee on the Public Works Loans Bill of this Session would not be the proper place in which to introduce a Resolution of this nature. It would be irregular to move an Instruction to the Committee to do that which they already have the power to do under the Act. From the nature of the aim which my hon. Friend has in view, I believe it is within the competence of the Committee to deal with the question.

CAPTAIN AYLMER said, he thought the position taken by the hon. Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy) had not been clearly understood. It seemed to him that the point of the hon. Member was, that if Mr. Speaker ruled that this Resolution could be put in Committee without Instruction, the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury might nevertheless rise in Committee and object to the Amendment being inserted, on the ground that a money question was raised.

MR. HEALY said, he would submit a point in support of what had fallen from the hon. and gallant Gentleman who had just sat down (Captain Aylmer). It was that it was not competent to any Member of the House to move a Resolution of this kind in Committee, and therefore an objection taken by the Government would completely upset any such Motion. They were taking the only course open to them on a Money Bill—that was to say, they were appealing to the Government, by Resolution of the House, to give effect to the recommendations of the Select Committee; and it was because, as private Members in Committee, they had no power to proceed by way of Amendment, that they appealed to the Government to carry out their object by Instruction to the Committee.

MR. COURTNEY said, the argument of the hon. Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy) was fatal to the Motion. A private Member could not move the House to do that which he could not move in Committee.

MR. HEALY said, it was not necessary at all that, because they were asking that effect should be given to the Resolutions of the Select Committee, they should go into the recommendations of the Select Committee. They were simply asking that the Resolution passed by the Select Committee should be given effect to, and they were not called upon to go into the question raised by the hon. Gentleman.

MR. SPEAKER: It would be clearly competent to the Committee to undertake this duty without Instruction from the House. It has already competence to do so.

MR. HEALY: Will you, Sir, supplement that by a statement to the effect that it would be competent for a private Member to move the Resolution?

MR. SPEAKER: It would not be proper to move in this House an Instruction to the Committee to do that which the Public Works Loans Act already empowers the Committee to do. The Question, therefore, cannot be put.

MR. Inderwick said, he would be glad to hear what course the Government intended to pursue in this matter. His hon. Friend the Member for Berwickshire (Mr. Marjoribanks) had given Notice of this Motion, for the purpose of obtaining a statement from the Government on this question of interest. He was not himself a Member of the Select Committee; but he had some knowledge of the smaller harbours on the South Coast of England, many of which were silted up and quite useless for the purpose for which they were intended. They had drifted into that condition, because the money was lent to the Trustees at such a high rate of interest that it was impossible for them to borrow the money necessary to keep them in an efficient state. For the purpose of giving the Secretary to the Treasury an opportunity of stating what course the Government proposed to follow in this matter, he begged to move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned."—
(Mr. Inderwick.)

MR. COURTNEY said, he was about to make a statement on the subject. Perhaps the hon. and learned Member would withdraw his Motion for the adjournment of the debate.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. COURTNEY said, that this Resolution had been brought on by his hon. Friend the Member for Berwickshire (Mr. Marjoribanks) rather suddenly. He did not mean to say that the question was a new one.

Mr. MARJORIBANKS said, he begged the hon. Gentleman's pardon; his Notice had been on the Paper during the whole of the Session.

Mr. COURTNEY said, his meaning was that the Motion had been brought on rather suddenly, so far as this Bill was concerned. He had to state that only that morning, having had an opportunity of consulting the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Childers) upon it, they were in hope that the hon. Gentleman would not have thought it necessary to proceed. In the first place, he would point out that the rates of interest charged on the loans were regulated at present by Treasury Minute, and that the proper form of making an alteration of the rate of interest to be paid hereafter on those loans would also be by Treasury Minute. It was therefore considered undesirable in this Bill to specify any exact terms on which money should be advanced. As an illustration of that, he was bound to point out the inconvenience which would result from the rate of interest being fixed by the Bill. If the rate of interest were fixed by Act of Parliament, instead of by Treasury Minute, they would not be able by Treasury Minute to reduce the rate of interest. It was, therefore, thought desirable that the Executive Government should have power to determine the rate of interest from time to time, as well as the amount of security to be provided. Therefore, he urged upon his hon. Friend the imprudence of bringing this matter within the scope of the Bill, instead of leaving it to be dealt with by a Treasury Minute. It was quite true that this subject had been brought before the Select Committee of last year, and that it formed part of the preliminary Report at the end of last Session; and although it was true that his hon. Friend had, on one or two occasions, put a Notice on the Paper in relation to the question, he had yet never brought it forward. The recommendations of the Select Committee were considered at the beginning of the Session by the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer and himself (Mr. Courtney), with a desire to go as far as possible, consistently with, and having regard to, the responsibility of the Treasury, to meet the recommendations of the Committee. They believed they had discovered a way which promised to fulfil that aim. They thought that some form of collateral security should be given for loans of this kind, and that if such were forthcoming a reduction of the rate of interest might be made. Now, he believed that the principle of collateral security was one which had not been very much embodied in Acts of Parliament, so far as England was concerned, although it had been acted upon in Ireland, where loans had been made for the purpose of constructing railways on the security of the rates. It was thought, with respect to recent harbour loans, that collateral security might be offered on the part of the municipalities. There was the idea that the municipalities might come in aid of the tolls, because the tolls of harbours were obviously a very unsatisfactory and risky security. For instance, a harbour might pass out of use, merely by the falling off of the shipping trade at the place where it was situated, and the tolls of the harbour, under such circumstances, would constitute a very unsatisfactory security for the amount of public money which might be advanced. But in the event of adequate collateral security being forthcoming in the neighbourhood, from persons responsible for the harbour, and responsible for its management, and having, probably, a voice in the selection of Trustees for keeping the harbour in a proper condition, under those circumstances, he said, the desire would be to meet the view of the Select Committee of last year with regard to reducing the rates of interest. He appealed to his hon. Friend to leave the matter in the hands of the Treasury; because he believed it was one which should be regulated by Treasury Minute, and not by a strict line embodied in an Act of Parliament, which could not necessarily provide for all the circumstances connected with the harbours for which the loans might be asked. He trusted this statement would be satisfactory to his hon. Friend, and that he would now allow the Bill to go forward.

Mr. MARJORIBANKS said, his hon. Friend the Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Courtney) had not confined himself to his arguments at all. He spoke of taking collateral security for harbour loans; but he (Mr. Marjoribanks) would remind the hon. Gentleman that that was the very thing recommended in the Report of the Select Committee last year. The recommendation with regard to the reduction of the rate of interest was entirely distinct, and in addition to that recommendation. A number of boroughs had been able to give that security; he knew a case in his own district where the local rates were assigned as collateral security. With regard to the amount of loss supposed to accrue from these harbour loans, he would like to say a few words. The amount of interest actually received on all loans under the Harbours and Passing Tolls Act since 1861 was £897,381; the amount that would have been receivable on the same advances at 3 per cent, the rate at which the Government borrowed money, would have been £822,428, or £74,953 less than the amount actually received. So far, therefore, the Government had made an actual profit of nearly £75,000 on advances in respect of interest alone. There was in arrear on the 31st March, 1883, the sum of £61,270, out of the total sum advanced of £2,561,849, while the total sum remitted amounted to £33,992. He hoped that his hon. Friend the Secretary to the Treasury would have gathered from the observations which had fallen from hon. Members in the course of the discussion that there was a strong desire in the House to make a material reduction in the rate of interest, and he trusted that they would have a reduction made known to them before long in the shape of the Treasury Minute announcing the fact.

MR. HEALY said, it was much to be regretted that, owing to the technical point raised by the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Courtney), the House was unable to come to a decision on the question brought forward by the hon. Member for Berwickshire (Mr. Marjoribanks). The principle on which the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury wished the House to act was something like this—"Shut your eyes and open your mouth, and see what the Treasury will send you." Having had some experience of Irish loans, he could assure the hon. Gentleman the Member for Berwickshire that the Treasury would not do a single thing after having got the Act passed. When the Act was passed, the hon. Member for Berwickshire might organize as many deputations to the Treasury as he pleased, or he might raise discussions in that House; but the Secretary to the Treasury would only shrug his shoulders and say—"I am very sorry I am quite unable to do anything for you." Such was the experience of Irish Members with regard to the Government in the matter of loans. It might be said that when they had passed their Bill, and fixed the rate of interest by Treasury Minute, their regard for that Minute was much greater than the regard which a poor Mussulman had for the Prophet. The hon. Member for Berwickshire might take it for granted that the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury, at the present time, would do absolutely nothing to forward the recommendations of the Committee; and, so far as the Resolution was concerned, when the time came, the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury would completely ignore it. The House would have come to a decision on the point that night had it not been prevented by the clever technical device of the hon. Gentleman, who, directly the Bill was passed, would simply say that, having looked into the circumstances, he was quite unable to do anything in the matter.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1 agreed to.

Clause 2 (Grant of £3,000,000 for Public Works Loans. 38 and 39 Vict. c. 39. 42 and 43 Vict. c. 77.)

MR. MARJORIBANKS said, unless he received some satisfactory statement from the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Courtney) he should be compelled to move that Progress be reported.

MR. COURTNEY said, he hoped his hon. Friend (Mr. Marjoribanks) would not think it necessary to move to report Progress. He was very much surprised that the hon. Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy) should doubt what he had said with reference to the rate of interest.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Marjoribanks.)

MR. HEALY said, the hon. Member for Monaghan was extremely obliged to the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury, and begged leave to inform him that observations of that kind were not likely to induce the hon. Member for Monaghan to accept the representations of the Secretary to the Treasury, or to facilitate the passing of the Bill.

MR. WARTON said, there had been so many instances of breaches of faith on the part of the Government that he, for one, was very suspicious of their assurances. He would ask, with regard to this question, whether they intended to perform what they had promised? For his own part, he never trusted the Government at all.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir FARRER HERSCHELL) said, he would remind the Committee that the remark of his hon. Friend the Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Courtney) was due to the observations made by the hon. Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy). His hon. Friend had distinctly assured the hon. Member for Berwickshire (Mr. Marjoribanks) that the matter would be dealt with by Treasury Minute. He had, at the same time, pointed out the advantage of dealing with it in that way, as opposed to dealing with it by Act of Parliament. The hon. Member for Monaghan thereupon said—"Do not give the Government their Bill, because, when it has passed, the Secretary to the Treasury will do nothing."

MR. HEALY said, if he had understood the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Courtney) to give a distinct pledge, he would not have made the remarks to which the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General referred; but he did not believe that the Secretary to the Treasury gave any pledge whatever.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir FARRER HERSCHELL) said, he understood his hon. Friend the Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Courtney) to say that he would deal with the matter in a Treasury Minute, and that he shadowed out the form which the Treasury Minute was to take with reference to the rate of interest. That he understood to be what his hon. Friend intended. The hon. Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy) said he did not understand that a pledge had been given; but his (the Solicitor General's) hon. Friend certainly thought he had given a strong pledge, and that was why he had spoken so warmly.

MR. DODDS said, that this was a matter in which he took great interest, and had taken great interest for many years. The Act of 1861 provided that advances should only be made for public harbours. Loans had been refused where adequate security was not provided.

MR. BUCHANAN rose to Order. He wished to know whether it was competent for the hon. Member for Stockton (Mr. Dodds) to go into this matter, seeing that the Motion before the Committee was that the Chairman report Progress, and ask leave to sit again.

THE CHAIRMAN said, the hon. Member for Stockton was scarcely in Order—in discussing the subject-matter of the Bill on the Question to report Progress.

MR. DODDS said, they were now discussing whether they should report Progress for the reason that they had not received a distinct pledge from the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Courtney) as to the rate of interest. He (Mr. Dodds) had listened in vain for a single word from his hon. Friend to the effect that the Government would consent to reduction spoken of. It had been said that these matters would be dealt with by a Treasury Minute; but nothing had been said as to whether the Government would consent to reduction. If the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury would give that pledge he would satisfy the Committee; but with anything short of that the hon. Member for Berwickshire (Mr. Marjoribanks) ought not to be satisfied.

MR. COURTNEY said, he had thought he had given a most distinct pledge that the matter would be dealt with on the Report of the Committee. If he had not absolutely agreed to the figure stated by the Committee, he had, at any rate, stated the figure as near as he could. The only reason he was not in a position to say more was that he had not been able to see his right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer that evening. That had probably prevented him from being able to give the exact figure; but he had certainly given a pledge that the matter should be dealt with by way of a reduction of interest. Having, as he thought, given that pledge distinctly, he had felt very much hurt at the remarks of the hon. Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy).

CAPTAIN AYLMER said, he thought it would be well to report Progress, in order that an opportunity might be given to the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Courtney) to consult with the Chancellor of the Exchequer upon this subject.

MR. SEXTON said, he considered that the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Courtney) had given a conclusive and unquestionable reason why the Committee should agree to report Progress. He had given a pledge that the hon. Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy) was quite entitled to regard as evasive—namely, that the matter would be dealt with by a Treasury Minute. That might mean that the hon. Gentleman intended to deal with the question according to his own pleasure and fancy. The hon. Gentleman had now altered his statement at the Table, and had declared that he could not give a distinct pledge, on account of the absence of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. It was, therefore, desirable that the Committee stage should not be further proceeded with until the hon. Member had had an opportunity of seeing the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

Question put, and agreed to.

Committee report Progress; to sit again To-morrow.

SAVING BANKS ACTS AMENDMENT BILL.—[BILL 277.]

(Mr. Fawcett, Mr. Courtney.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be read a second time To-morrow."—(Mr. Courtney.)

MR. WARTON said, he wanted to know whether the Government intended to proceed with this Bill? This was one of the measures mentioned by the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister on the memorable Thursday when he killed nine of his Bills. The right hon. Gentleman had stated that he would not go on with any measure which was seriously opposed. Well, this was a measure against which there was serious opposition, and they should have a distinct understanding whether the Government were going to go on with it. The Government ought to say exactly what Bills they were going to pass, and what Bills they were going to give up.

MR. COURTNEY said, that one clause in this Bill was very important—namely, the clause enabling the amount to be deposited in the Savings Banks in a year to be increased from £30 to £50. That clause was likely to be opposed, and therefore the Government intended to drop it.

Question put, and agreed to.

EGYPT—THE CONFERENCE.

QUESTION.

EARL DE LA WARR: I wish to ask the noble Earl the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs a Question of which I have given private Notice. I beg to ask him, when it will be convenient for Her Majesty's Government to give some further information to this House relative to the Conference?

EARL GRANVILLE: Her Majesty's Government are anxious that there should be as little delay as possible in making a statement with regard to the Conference; but I can make no definite promise. I can only inform the noble Earl that the Conference met yesterday, and that it will hold a meeting on Monday, and it is possible that on that day I may be able to make a statement. However, as I have said, I can give no positive pledge on the matter.

QUESTIONS.

METROPOLIS (THAMES CROSSINGS)—BRIDGE AT LITTLE TOWER HILL.

SIR HUSSEY VIVIAN asked the Right honourable the Lord Mayor,

Whether it is the intention of the Corporation of the City of London to apply to Parliament next year for power to construct a Low Level Opening Bridge across the Thames at Little Tower Hill, and to apply thereto the surplus funds of the Bridge House Estate?

MR. R. N. FOWLER (LORD MAYOR), in reply, said, that the Bridge Estates Committee had had the subject under their consideration, and had reported in favour of a low level opening bridge. He had summoned a special meeting of the Common Council for Monday, in order to consider the question.

PARLIAMENT — BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—ATTENDANCE OF MINISTERS.

LORD EUSTACE CECIL, who had given Notice that he would ask the Secretary of State for War,

"Whether he can now state when any Supplementary Estimate will be presented to the House to defray the cost of any expedition that may be necessary for the defence of Egypt?"

said: I think it is unnecessary for us to come down to the House at a quarter-past 4 o'clock to find that Ministers are not present to answer Questions.

MR. COURTNEY said, he was afraid he could give no information on the subject; but he imagined that the matter had been under consideration that afternoon. There was no doubt a Supplementary Estimate would have to be presented; but how far that would have relation to any expedition to Egypt he was not in a position to say.

LORD EUSTACE CECIL (before the Marquess of HARTINGTON's arrival) said, that in the absence of the Secretary of State for War he would postpone his Question until Monday, unless the President of the Board of Trade was prepared to answer it. He must again protest against the manner in which the Cabinet was treating the House of Commons by Ministers not being present to answer Questions.

SAVINGS BANKS ACTS AMENDMENT BILL.

LORD ARTHUR HILL (for Mr. ION HAMILTON) asked the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether, viewing the great probability of much opposition being offered to the provisions of the Savings Banks Acts Amendment Bill, it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to proceed with that measure at the present late period of the Session?

MR. COURTNEY, in reply, said, everybody seemed to be absent. He had arranged with the Postmaster General to answer this Question, and in his absence he could only repeat what he had already said, that there was no serious opposition to the Bill except with regard to the clause raising the limit of the yearly deposits from £30 to £50, and that clause it was proposed to withdraw.

MR. MOORE inquired whether the Secretary to the Treasury was going to answer all the Questions addressed to the Postmaster General in the right hon. Gentleman's absence?

MR. COURTNEY: Oh no, Sir.

CUSTOMS—IMPORTATION, MANUFACTURE, AND SALE OF OLEOMARGARINE AND OTHER BUTTER SUBSTITUTES.

MR. DUCKHAM asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether he is aware that large quantities of oleomargarine are manufactured in the United Kingdom; that most obnoxious compounds of fatty matter are used in its manufacture; that it is sent from this Country to Holland and to Norway to be there manipulated with milk and re-imported as butter or butterine; whether he has any power to order a supervision of the oleomargarine and butterine factories in the United Kingdom; and, if not, whether he will be prepared to introduce a Bill during the Autumn Session to provide for such a supervision, in order to guard against the use of impure or deleterious compounds in its manufacture; and, whether he will direct the attention of the local authorities throughout the United Kingdom to the deleterious compounds used in the manufacture of oleomargarine, butterine, and cheese, in countries from whence large quantities are imported, and request them to enforce the provisions of the Food and Drugs Adulteration Acts, in order to prevent the sale of articles so calculated to injure the health of those who consume them?

MR. HIBBERT: The Local Government Board have no definite information as to large quantities of oleomargarine being manufactured in the United Kingdom. Neither have they any power to order a supervision of oleomargarine and butterine factories. At present the Board have no information that would lead them to suppose that the provisions of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act are not sufficient to meet the case of any deleterious compound being used in the manufacture of these articles. The Board last month issued a Circular letter to the Sanitary Authorities in England directing their attention to the provisions of the Sale of Food and Drugs Acts and urging them to avail themselves of their powers under those Acts of obtaining samples of food and drugs for the purpose of analysis. From the answers already received the Board have reason to believe that those powers will in future be more fully exercised than has hitherto been the case. The samples analyzed will no doubt include the articles mentioned by the hon. Member; and if, as alleged, they are injurious to health, or if they are sold in substitution for the articles asked for, it may be anticipated that prosecutions will follow. There have already been many convictions for the sale of butterine in the place of butter. At present, the Board do not consider that it is necessary to address any special communication to the authorities on the subject, further than the Circular already issued.

SCOTLAND—NORTHERN LIGHTS COMMISSIONERS—LIGHTHOUSE ON FAIR ISLE.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether the Trinity House authorities have come to any conclusion as to the erection of a lighthouse on Fair Isle; and, if not, whether, considering the great advantage a light on Fair Isle would be to vessels crossing the Atlantic, the providing of a lighthouse on it might not be considered apart from the general scheme for lighting the Shetland and Orkney coasts?

MR. CHAMBERLAIN, in reply, said, that the Trinity House authorities had not yet reported on the extensive scheme which had been under their consideration; but the question of dealing with the lighting of the Fair Isle was one which naturally came under the consideration of the Northern Lights Commissioners.

IRELAND—ORANGE PROCESSIONS—THE 12TH OF JULY CELEBRATIONS—ORANGE ARCH AT GLENARM.

LORD ARTHUR HILL asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether his attention has been drawn to a letter which appeared in The Belfast News Letter on the 23rd instant—

“The Arch at Glenarm.—Sir, We, the owners and occupiers of the two houses from which the Orange arch was suspended on 12th July last, are very much surprised at the reply given by the Chief Secretary to Lord Arthur Hill in the House of Commons last night;

“We beg to give the statements therein made the fullest and most emphatic contradiction. No arch was ever erected there against our will, nor was there ever any disturbance in Glenarm in connection with an arch;

“We are prepared to make affidavits to this effect;

“In to-days issue of Morning News we see that Mr. Sexton insinuated that the arch was attached to the house of the parish priest. All we can say in reply to this is that neither of us is a parish priest: and, whether he still adheres to the statement which he made on the 22nd instant, or whether he proposes to modify it in any manner?

“(Signed) John Cobain,

MR. TREVELYAN: The noble Lord has not given me any opportunity of making the further inquiry which I presume he desires, as he has put down his Question without Notice. I can, therefore, only say that I based my Answer on an explicit statement of the District Inspector of Constabulary as to facts known to the police.

IRELAND—MONEY RETURNED THROUGH THE POST.

MR. HEALY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, What disposition was made by him of the money recently returned him through the Post; and, will it be refunded to the Secret Service Department?

MR. TREVELYAN: Some time ago I received £15 in notes in a letter without address. Knowing nothing of the matter, I followed the course I always follow with regard to anonymous communications which appear to require notice, and handed the letter and its contents to the police authorities.

MR. HEALY: I beg to inform the right hon. Gentleman that the money belongs to Mrs. Tyler, of the Secret Service Department.

LAW AND POLICE (METROPOLIS)—THE REFORM DEMONSTRATION.

MR. TATTON EGERTON asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether the police guarding a procession on Sunday passing through Onslow Place were employed on special duty, and by whom paid; whether he approves of the Metropolitan Police being employed for the protection of mendicinity; and, whether the refusal of a superintendent of police to enable a Member of the House of Commons to cross Piccadilly in the crowd, before any passage of the procession of 21st July, is in accordance with the pledge given by Her Majesty's Government?

Lord Arthur Hill

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: The police were not employed on special duty on the occasion in question at Onslow Place. The only men present were those on the adjoining beat, and they remained on duty to preserve order, seeing so large a concourse of people. No payment was anticipated. With regard to the second Question, I am bound to say, from the particulars with which the hon. Member has furnished me, I think that the police have fairly done all they could in the circumstances.

MR. TATTON EGERTON: As to my first Question, the police were marching with the procession. I do not think that they were the police on the adjoining beats. The right hon. and learned Gentleman has been misinformed by the heads of his Department.

ARMY—VOLUNTARY RETIREMENT.

COLONEL KINGSCOTE asked the Secretary of State for War, Why voluntary retirement, with pension and gratuity sanctioned by the Pay Warrants, have been partially suspended?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: In replying to this Question, Sir, it may probably remove some misconception if I make a short statement on the subject of voluntary retirement. The House is, perhaps, aware that the present system of Army promotion is based on the Report of a Royal Commission, presided over by Lord Penzance. In the Report of the Commissioners the following passage occurred in reference to the voluntary retirement with pension or gratuity which they recommended:—

“The above system, then, is intended as a flexible one, under which the actual rate of promotion can be controlled. It is an inevitable result of the regimental system, and of promotions taking place within the regiment, that the officers of any one regiment may, from time to time, go forward quicker than those of another, by reason of more frequent deaths or other causes of vacancy. This inequality may, to some extent, be rectified in the granting or withholding voluntary retirement in each individual case, according to the state of promotion in the particular regiment. By the exercise of a like discretion the general rate of promotion may be held in check on the one hand, or stimulated on the other, throughout the Army. And further, we may remark that a system of this kind, capable of expansion or contraction in the hands of those who are to administer it, will readily adapt itself to the changes by way of augmentation of the higher ranks or otherwise, which the future development of military organization may render necessary."

This recommendation was given effect to by Article 94 of the Royal Warrant, which runs as follows:—

"Voluntary retirement with retired pay or gratuity shall only be permitted when it shall be deemed expedient by our Secretary of State. Before such voluntary retirement be permitted it shall be specially recommended by our Commander-in-Chief and approved by our Secretary of State."

The contingency contemplated by the Commissioners has arisen. Promotion has for some time been, on the average, very much more rapid than the normal rate; and if no change were made would continue at an undue rate. I have, therefore, partially suspended voluntary retirements, so as to check promotion in regiments where it is unduly rapid, in accordance with the intention of the recommendation of the Royal Commission and of the Royal Warrant. I have thought it fairer to the officers of the Army to do this in the form of a General Regulation, so that they may know their exact position, than to treat each case on its merits, as recommended by the Royal Commission.

EDUCATION (IRELAND)—LEGISLATION.

Mr. SEXTON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If he will introduce, before the end of the Session, the Bill which he has prepared on the subject of Irish Education, in order that its provisions may be considered during the Recess.

Mr. TREVELYAN: No, Sir; the Government cannot bring in any Bills at this period of the Session which they do not see their way to passing. When I promised to bring in the Bill, it was on the distinct understanding that if it was to be passed at all, it was to be passed by common consent, or something approaching. I do not consider it desirable to introduce a Bill merely to have it seen.

Mr. HEALY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If the Intermediate Education Secretaries edit the questions set at each examination, if they are competent to do so in all the subjects; and, if not, upon what grounds do these officials continue to receive as salaries six per cent. of the entire income of the Board, or, as per the Report of 1883, a very large percentage of the Board's annual expenditure; which of the Secretaries was responsible for editing and correcting the proofs of the papers set in algebra and arithmetic at the recent examination; whether one of the papers set in algebra contained questions extending beyond the prescribed course, and whether the junior grade paper in arithmetic contained an unpardonable error; and, do these mistakes arise from the employment as secretary of an ex-Queen's College professor who is past his labour, and otherwise incapacitated?

Mr. TREVELYAN: The Assistant Education Commissioners, in pursuance of the Rules of the Board, approved by the Lord Lieutenant, revise the examination papers except in five special subjects, and are competent to do so. In all cases proofs are submitted to the examiners for correction. One or two letters have been received objecting to two questions in the junior grade algebra paper, on the ground that they were outside the prescribed course. In the opinion of the Assistant Commissioners the objection is not well founded; but the matter awaits the decision of the Board. Dr. Curtis is the Assistant Commissioner who revises the science papers. The error in the arithmetic paper, to which the hon. Member refers, was, I am informed, purely a typographical one—the misplacing of a point, which arose in the process of printing, and did not exist in the proofs corrected by the examiner and revised by the Assistant Commissioner. I am not aware of any grounds for the suggestion that Dr. Curtis is past his work or otherwise incapacitated.

POST OFFICE (IRELAND)—DISPLAY OF PARTY EMBLEMS BY THE LETTER CARRIER AT NEWCASTLE, COUNTY DOWN.

Mr. HARRINGTON asked the Postmaster General, Whether it is true that on July 12th, the Orange anniversary, the letter carrier at Newcastle, county Down, wore an orange sash when delivering the letters through the town; and, whether this was noticed by the Postmaster; and, if so, was any remonstrance addressed to this man for wearing party emblems while engaged in official duties?

MR. FAWCETT: It is the case, as implied in the Question of the hon. Member, that on the 12th instant the man who delivers letters at Newcastle, county Down, wore an orange sash while in the discharge of his official duties. The man in question, who is employed by the local Postmaster, disclaims all intention of giving offence, expresses regret that offence should have been given, and promises not to wear his scarf when on duty again.

LAW AND POLICE (METROPOLIS)— THE REFORM DEMONSTRATION.

MR. J. LOWTHER (for Viscount FOLKESTONE) asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether it is true, as stated in a letter in The Times of the 24th, that three Yeomanry bands, in uniform, took part in the Demonstration on Monday last; and, if so, if it is not an infraction of the "Queen's Regulations;" and, whether the Military authorities propose to take any and, if so, what notice of such an infringement of the "Queen's Regulations?"

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: It would be a grave breach of discipline for a Yeomanry or Volunteer band to take part, in its military capacity, in a political assemblage; and if any case is reported to me, with the name of the offending corps, proper notice will be taken of such an infringement of Regulations. On the other hand, the noble Viscount will perhaps allow me to point out that the letter in The Times, to which he refers, is flatly contradicted by a signed letter in the same journal to-day.

MR. WARTON said, he had a letter from a gallant Colonel of the Army and Navy Club confirming the statement of the noble Viscount the Member for South Wiltshire.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: It is extremely desirable that particulars of the alleged attendance of the band should be furnished to me. I am inclined to think that no such incident took place.

POST OFFICE (IRELAND)—THE MAILS BETWEEN DUBLIN AND CORK.

MR. LEAMY asked the Postmaster General, Whether, seeing that a stoppage of five minutes would be quite sufficient to allow the Great Southern and Western Mail, under the proposed new service between Dublin to Cork, to drop and take up passengers at Maryborough, and that the Central Ireland Railway is willing to send a special train to meet the Mail at Maryborough, he will, in the interests of the public, require that such stoppage shall be made?

MR. FAWCETT: In answer to the hon. Member, I beg to say that, beyond the detention during the actual stoppage, time is lost in slackening speed and getting it up again; and a stop at Maryborough, which is not required for Post Office purposes, would proportionally shorten the very moderate interval which it is possible to secure for replies at Cork by the accelerated service; by which service also Waterford will largely benefit.

MR. LEAMY asked what time would be lost by stopping the mail train at Maryborough?

MR. FAWCETT said, he believed eight or ten minutes; but there was another application from the hon. Member for Clonmel for stoppage at Thurles. ["No, no!"]

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR asked whether the mail train did not now stop at Thurles for water; whether water could not be taken in instead at Maryborough?

MR. MOORE said, it was not a question of stopping the train at Thurles, but of throwing out the mail bags. He begged to ask the right hon. Gentleman at what hour it was anticipated that the accelerated mail train would pass Thurles Station; and, what was the nature of the inconvenience urged by the Limerick and Waterford Railway Company as a reason for not running a train to meet the mail train?

MR. FAWCETT said, there would be no objection whatever to throwing out the mail bags at Thurles, if the local railway would run a train to meet the mail bags; but he understood they did not consider the traffic would justify them in doing that, so that there would be no advantage in throwing out the mails.

DEFENCE OF EGYPT—EXPENSES— SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATE.

MR. J. G. TALBOT (for Lord EUSTACE CECIL) asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether he can now state when any Supplementary Estimate will be presented to the House to defray the cost of any expedition that may be necessary for the defence of Egypt?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I have communicated on this subject with my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and have come to the conclusion that unless circumstances, at present unforeseen, should arise which would lead to a larger expenditure than is at present going on, it will be unnecessary to present any Supplementary Estimate for the Army in the course of the present Session.

MEDICAL ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

In reply to Mr. J. G. TALBOT,

MR. GLADSTONE said: We have considered as carefully as we could the prospects of this Bill, and, I am sorry to say, with the result which is often arrived at. Our chance of carrying the Bill would be very small; and having regard to the comfort and convenience of the House, and to the circumstances of the period of the Session, although anxious to push it forward, I am obliged to state that the Government do not intend to proceed with the Bill.

IRELAND—MANUFACTURES AND INDUSTRIES—A ROYAL COMMISSION.

SIR EARDLEY WILMOT asked the First Lord of the Treasury, If he will advise Her Majesty graciously to issue a small Royal Commission to inquire into the present condition of manufacturing and productive industries in Ireland, with a view to the more ample development of those industries, and the more effectual promotion thereby of the material wealth and prosperity of the Irish people?

MR. GLADSTONE: I have consulted my noble Friend the Lord Lieutenant, and our opinion certainly is that, even if an inquiry of this kind were desirable, a Royal Commission would not be the best instrument for conducting it, viewing the nature of the subject. It is a subject which would be more fitly considered by a Committee of this House; and with regard to a Committee of this House, that must depend a good deal on the desire and views entertained in this House. But I am bound to say that we do not feel great anxiety for such an inquiry even by a Committee of this House, and for this simple reason—what we are afraid of is, that bringing to bear further public inquiries on this matter would rather tend to weaken what, above all things, we wish to see strengthened in Ireland—namely, the sense of self-reliance, and would raise expectations of aid from a quarter from which it could never effectually come.

POOR LAW GUARDIANS (IRELAND) BILL.

MR. PARNELL asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether, in view of the rejection by the House of Lords on the Second Reading of the Poor Law Guardians (Ireland) Bill, he will introduce a similar measure during the Autumn Session with the view of enabling the Upper House to reconsider the subject?

MR. GLADSTONE: We regret very much the loss of this Bill. I have not had the power of communicating with my noble Friend in whose charge it was. But I presume there will be a desire to revive it on the first proper opportunity. I think, however, the hon. Member can hardly expect me to say that a proper opportunity would be found in the Autumn Session. The Autumn Session, according to the advice on which Her Majesty has been pleased to express Her intention to act, will be summoned for a very specific and a peculiar purpose; and it would be a very great mistake on our part if we were—I will not say to allow, because, of course, the House must be the sole judge of what subject it will entertain—but if we were to be parties to mixing up other matters totally distinct from the question of the Franchise with the Business of the Autumn Session. It is obvious that in rejecting the Poor Law Guardians (Ireland) Bill, although we may lament the circumstance, the House of Lords did not go beyond its rights. This Bill has none of those specialities which would entitle it to be taken in the Autumn Session.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: In reference to the distinction which the right hon.

Gentleman has just drawn between the Poor Law Guardians (Ireland) Bill and the Franchise Bill, I should like to ask him whether he is aware that whereas the Franchise Bill has only passed a second reading once, the Poor Law Guardians Bill has passed a second reading two or three times?

MR. GLADSTONE: That circumstance does not bear on the conclusion to which we have come.

PUBLIC WORKS LOANS BILL.

MR. MARJORIBANKS asked the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether he would now state what amendment he was prepared to introduce into the Public Works Loans Bill, which stood for Committee that evening?

MR. COURTNEY, in reply, said, he had been in consultation with the Chancellor of the Exchequer on the subject, and his right hon. Friend would be in his place and make a statement when the Order was called.

LAW AND POLICE—ARMED BURGLARS.

SIR FREDERICK MILNER: I wish to ask the Home Secretary a Question, of which I have given him private Notice, in reference to his Answer yesterday to me on the subject of armed burglars. I would ask whether he can conceive any reason why a man who knocks you down, ill-treats you, and robs you in the street, should be visited with a more severe punishment than a man who shoots you in the groin with a revolver, or makes a hole in your skull with a life-preserver?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: My hon. Friend has given me short Notice of the Question. He asks me whether I should prefer one treatment or the other. I have not had time to reflect which of these two operations I should prefer; and, therefore, if he will allow me to think over it during the Autumn Recess, I shall perhaps be able to give him an answer.

BURGH POLICE AND HEALTH (SCOTLAND) BILL.

MR. ANDERSON: I wish to ask the Prime Minister, Whether he has come to any decision as to proceeding with the Burgh Police and Health (Scotland) Bill?

MR. GLADSTONE: We have never wavered in our expectation with respect to that Bill. I cannot say anything with regard to the exact time or date when it will be taken; but we desire to proceed with it this Session.

PUBLIC HEALTH—CHOLERA—RAGS FROM MARSEILLES.

SIR FREDERICK MILNER asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether it was not a fact that the cargo of rags from Marseilles believed to be infected with cholera, to which allusion had been recently made in that House, had, notwithstanding assurances to the contrary, been actually passed through Goole and landed near Dewsbury, a low-lying district specially liable to infection?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: I asked the hon. Member the other day to take a little more trouble in ascertaining the facts before asking Questions of this character. It is not a fact that these rags have been landed near Dewsbury. They have not been landed anywhere at all. The rags which have arrived near Dewsbury are a different cargo, from a different place, and of a very different quality. They have been landed, not at Dewsbury itself, but near Dewsbury, and we have no reason to suppose that any danger attaches to them. A General Order was issued after the difficulty had arisen as to the first cargo, against the landing of any rags from Toulon and Marseilles. The cargo of rags, as to which there was a discussion in this House, was never landed anywhere, and the statement to that effect in the newspapers was absolutely untrue. The rags landed near Dewsbury came, I believe, from Dieppe.

MR. TATTON EGERTON: Will the right hon. Gentleman state where the original rags are now?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: They have certainly not been landed. I have received a very satisfactory telegram from the Town Clerk of Hull with regard to them. I do not quite know where they are at this moment; but they certainly have not been landed. They were transferred to lighters; but were not taken up the canal, and they were never put ashore. The probability is they were sent back again.

MR. TATTON EGERTON: Will the right hon. Gentleman give the House an assurance that they will not be landed?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Yes; they certainly will not be landed.

MR. JOSEPH COWEN: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether it is not a fact that the cholera never was transmitted by rags, so that all this excitement is entirely unnecessary?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: I stated in the House the other day, in reply to a Question, that there was no evidence that cholera had been communicated by rags. Small-pox and wool-sorters' disease have been transmitted by rags; but there is no evidence to that effect with regard to cholera.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY.—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

INLAND REVENUE—CARRIAGE TAX.

RESOLUTION.

LORD ALGERNON PERCY, in rising to move—

"That the Taxes on Carriages are exceptional in character, and injurious to trade, and should therefore be abolished," said, he would only detain the House for a short while, as that period of the Session was not favourable to a detailed consideration of the question. Great misapprehension prevailed as to the character of the Carriage Tax. It was commonly believed that it was a tax upon luxury, and that it was only paid by those who could well afford to do so. It was also argued that it was too small an amount to seriously affect any trade. He contested all these positions. The real fact was that the tax was not levied upon luxury, but was a tax upon the product of industry. It was the last special trade tax remaining, and was injurious to that trade, and thus affected many artisans and working men—over 26,252 being employed in that trade alone—and there were, at least, 116 collateral trades concerned by the imposition of the tax in coach-building, all of which suffered. The tax had to be paid by many to whom a carriage was not a luxury, but just as much an article of necessity as a chisel or a hammer was an article of necessity to a workman. A carriage was not a luxury to a doctor, a surveyor, or a commercial traveller. It was just as much a necessity to the members of these professions as carts were to farmers, and tools to workmen. The carriage manufacturers had no right to ask for special legislation; but they had a just claim to be put on the same footing as other trades. They had a right to demand fair play; and this they did not obtain as long as their industry was singled out for taxation, and it should be remembered that this tax was an annual tax, such as was imposed on no other trade. The Carriage Tax was the last special trade tax, the Silver Duty being the only other tax of the same kind; but that tax was only paid once, whereas this was an annual tax. All other trade taxes had been repealed. As a matter of justice, it was impossible to defend the maintenance of a tax which pressed injuriously upon a highly skilled and a most important trade. He had said that the Carriage Tax was not a tax upon a luxury. Whatever might have been the case when most travelling was done on horseback, it was evident that even to the rich the carriage was not to the same extent a luxury as formerly. Carriages were now used by medical men, clergymen, hotel-keepers, jobmasters, and others; and it was just as necessary that they should use them in the duties of their calling as the farmer should use the carts on which he did not pay duty. Even if a tax were a tax upon luxury, the House would be cautious about imposing it if it hampered or injured an important trade which if free would give employment to many additional skilled artisans; indeed, the trade taxes had been repealed for that very reason. Even if the carriage were a luxury there was no good ground for a carriage being singled out as a special article of luxury for taxation. Yachts were built with the greatest care, and fitted up with the greatest luxury, yet a yachtsman might travel all round the world without paying any taxation, while the country doctor could not go his round of two miles without having to pay a heavy tax on his carriage, very much disproportioned to its value. Billiard tables, pictures, and musical instruments were certainly articles of luxury quite as much as carriages, but these articles were rightly not taxed. Why should a carriage be especially singled out as an object for taxation? If the supporters of the tax defended it on the ground of luxury at least they should be consistent, and subject other luxuries to taxation. But they did not do this, and those interested in the carriage trade had good grounds for complaining that they were not treated impartially. The tax, to a certain degree, was a tax on locomotion. Steamers were not taxed; and although there was a Passenger Duty on railways, it did not press with anything like the severity that the tax on carriages did. Bicycles, tricycles, and train carriages were not taxed and more or less competed with the carriage building trade, and thus the tax rendered it more difficult for the coachbuilding trade to meet this competition. The tax itself was very unfairly apportioned; it was levied with a total disregard either to the value of the article or to the period during which it was employed. For instance, a pony carriage of a certain size and weight paid the same tax as the State coach of the Lord Mayor, the tax often amounting to 5 per cent on the value of the carriage, and in a number of years to half, and more than half, its original cost. A carriage costing £40, supposing it to last for 10 years, during that time would have paid in taxation more than half its cost. The amount paid in tax frequently came to more than the cost of keeping the carriage in repair. A coach-builder had informed him that a brougham taken out of his yard 11 years ago cost £9 to keep it in repair, and the taxation during that time amounted to 22 guineas. Then, again, an old and rickety carriage paid exactly the same as a new one; and if a carriage was only used for one week, it had to pay the tax for a year. If a man borrowed a carriage from the coachmaker while his own was being repaired, he had to pay duty on the borrowed carriage, thus mulcting him in double duty for what was practically the use of only one vehicle. With regard to the objection that the tax was so small that it could not affect the trade, he might say that the annual turnover of the carriage-building trade was £2,500,000, while the amount raised by the tax was over £550,000, so that the trade was practically taxed to the amount of 20 per cent. It was evident, he thought, that no trade could really prosper under such circumstances. However surprising it might seem, there could be no doubt the existence of the tax prevented many people from purchasing carriages. Some hon. Members had told him that but for the tax they would buy one or two more carriages than they now possessed. The first economy made in an establishment was the discontinuance of the use, of a carriage, and the real fact was that the tax did not fall on the rich, but the rich suited their establishment. In Ireland, where there was no Carriage Tax, many more carriages were in the hands of owners than was the case in England. In Ireland there was no inducement for a man to limit the number of his carriages, and when a carriage was partly damaged, there was no necessity to part with it. In England, however, when a carriage was much worn the owner did not retain it, as he was called upon still to pay duty for it, although the vehicle was unusable. This led to a system of barter in the trade. The carriage dealers, when they got an order for a new carriage, always had to take an old one in part payment. The result was that their premises were crowded with surplus stock. He had received letters from coachbuilders, one of whom said he had 150, and another 500, second-hand carriages on hand. An ordinary carriage occupied something like 60 superficial feet, and anyone could easily estimate how much ground a stock, varying from 150 to 500 carriages, would cover. Rent and rates for these premises had to be paid. The same cause that returned carriages to the coachbuilders' yards tended to keep them there, and often carriages were kept until they largely depreciated in value. This was a very serious inconvenience and loss, which would not arise if the duty were abolished. The whole system, therefore, hampered and harassed a most important industry. If there were no tax, the carriage dealers would be enabled either to let these old carriages at low rates or sell them at small prices. Old carriages might thus be brought into use at country railway stations and other places to the great benefit of the people. If the tax were removed, there was every reason to believe that there would be a great impetus given to the trade. Whenever a tax had been taken off an industry that had always been the result, and there was every reason to believe that in this instance it would be equally as great, if not greater, than in the case of other trades that had been freed from taxation. In Hungary this tax was removed a short time ago, and the carriage-building trade had revived, in consequence, to an enormous extent. One firm alone had received an order for over 400 carriages. Like results had accrued in other trades in this country. When the duties had been taken off soap, paper, and bricks, vitality had been given to each business; and there had been an immense development in all these trades after they had been freed. The parties directly interested in them had not alone been served, but the entire population had been benefited. He felt sure a like result would spring from the removal of the tax on carriages. He knew it was contended by some that as carriages wore away the roads they should contribute to the highway rates. But it was not the carriages that cut up the roads. It was the farmers' carts, waggons, traction engines, and other heavy vehicles. They did infinitely more damage to the highways than carriages did, and were not taxed as being necessary to their owners for the proper carrying on of their business; he had shown that carriages were employed by many to whom their use was a necessity. He was neither advocating nor condemning the principle of taxing vehicles generally; but if they were to be taxed at all, the most destructive should be taxed as well, and the tax should not be levied in the way it was now. The trade thankfully acknowledged the small relief the Chancellor of the Exchequer had accorded it in his Budget. But it did not affect them much. It was, however, a tacit acknowledgment that the tax was false in principle. The trade had been unusually depressed in recent years, as an illustration of which he might mention that over 14,000 carriages had been returned on the builders' hands within the last three years. That might be owing, in part, to the general depression of the times; but it was also due largely to the great increase of tramways and railways, and they were placed besides in a peculiarly disadvantageous position in comparison with other trades in consequence of special taxation. He had good authority in favour of the cause he was advocating. The tax, according to the Prime Minister, was a remnant of the stupidity of past legislation. In 1879 the right hon. Gentleman told the farmers of Mid Lothian that, in his opinion, "they should be relieved of every unjust and unnecessary restraint," and that "they were entitled to the free sale of all their produce." "And his whole argument applied to all trades they pleased to name." The senior Member for Birmingham had also expressed himself in favour of the abolition of the tax, and had stated that it was totally indefensible. The Chambers of Commerce of London, Newcastle, Bristol, Derby, Worcester, Leicester, and other places had passed resolutions in favour of the abolition of the tax. The combined Chambers, at a meeting held in London, had also passed a similar resolution. There had been upwards of 80 Petitions in favour of this Resolution. The Petitioners felt that in asking this relief from taxation they only asked for justice and fair-play, and he trusted they would not long have to ask in vain. He would only add that he pleaded for the abolition of the duty: first, because it was based on bad principles—principles that did not apply to any other trade; second, because it was a direct hindrance and injury to a skilled and highly-important industry; third, because the incidence of its imposition was inequitable and unjust in operation; and, lastly, because he believed that if it was removed it would give an impetus to trade, and be of great service to a large number of skilled artisans and working men. On these grounds, he commended the proposal to the favourable consideration of the House, and asked for it the support of the Government. The noble Lord concluded by moving the Motion which stood in his name.

MR. JOSEPH COWEN said, he had much pleasure in seconding the Resolution of the noble Lord; but he was not able to add much to what the noble Lord had already said, and so well said. The case was covered by very few facts, and these facts had been so clearly put before the House, that all there was left for him to do was to compress the salient points into a few sentences, and urge the Government to give favourable consideration to the subject. The carriage trade was a highly important one. There were between 25,000 and 26,000 workmen directly employed in it, and there was a large number of others indirectly interested. The annual turnover of the trade was calculated at £2,250,000, and the Carriage Tax amounted to £250,000. The amount of revenue, therefore, that the carriage business yearly contributed to the Exchequer was something like one-fifth of the turnover. This was very large, and it seriously hampered the trade, which, for several years past, had been in a very languishing condition. The depression was something more, he feared, than temporary. There were upwards of 14,000 less carriages in use now than there was a few years ago, and the trade with the Colonies and other countries was declining. He did not mean to contend that this decrease was entirely attributable to the duty; but certainly the duty was principally the cause of it. The tax itself was unsound in principle and inequitable in operation. The noble Lord had quoted the testimony of the Prime Minister and the right hon. Gentleman the senior Member for Birmingham against the tax. But he might have gone further, and quoted the testimony of every Chancellor of the Exchequer since the Reform Bill. All condemned taxes upon industry, and nearly all condemned taxes upon locomotion. The Carriage Duty was a tax on both. It was argued that it was too small an impost to injure the trade; but they all knew that the injury inflicted by a duty was not in proportion to its amount. Sometimes an insignificant tax inflicted considerable injury upon a trade. And that was the case in this instance. It was levied in a very offensive manner. The coachbuilders were required to keep books always open to the Revenue officers, in a way that was both annoying and troublesome. And they had to do this under a penalty of £20. When a carriage left the builder, it continued to pay the tax until it was destroyed; and the result was that when the owner of a carriage wanted a new one, he always gave the old one in part payment for the new one. As a consequence, the carriage-builders' yards were crowded with carriages which they could not dispose of. The rent and rates they were called upon to pay for the extensive premises necessary was a very heavy drain on a depressed trade. Old carriages were often kept for years, and the amount paid in shape of duty equalled the price of the article. It was incorrect to say that this was a tax upon luxury. It was a tax upon industry. It was quite true that the more sumptuous carriages were used only by the most wealthy section of the community; but there was a very large section to whom carriages were a necessary part of their stock and trade. But whether it was a tax upon luxury or upon industry, the fact was that they had abolished nearly every tax on industry except this, and it ought to go also. He knew the Chancellor of the Exchequer was not unfavourable to the proposal in principle; but, of course, it was necessary for him to raise the Revenue. All taxes were objectionable, and he recognized that it was difficult to choose whether this or some other tax should be removed; but, as far as he knew, there was no other tax that for its amount did so large a measure of injury as this one, and he claimed that it should have the first attention of the Government. But even if the tax were not abolished, it certainly might be more equitably levied. A tax upon a carriage when it was made would be better than an annual duty levied in the way this was. He appealed for the liberal and favourable consideration by the Chancellor of the Exchequer of the very reasonable request the noble Lord had made in such very felicitous terms, and in so temperate a spirit.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "the Taxes on Carriages are exceptional in their character, and injurious to trade, and should therefore be abolished,"—(Lord Algernon Percy.)

—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. Childers), said, that the noble Lord and his hon. Friend had put forward clear and able arguments in very few words, and he must congratulate them on having done so. His hon. Friend had mentioned, frankly enough, the first argument which any Chancellor of the Exchequer would have to use in meeting a proposal to condemn a tax. His hon. Friend said that almost all taxes were objectionable. That was so, though in one or two cases taxes had their good side and were in themselves advantageous. But as to the great mass of taxes, whether direct or indirect, he admitted that they were in themselves, to a very large extent, evils, and it would be much better if they could do without them. There was a series of taxes—he would enumerate some of them—which had been the subject of Parliamentary debate, of a good deal of discussion outside the House, and of deputations to himself and his Predecessors, and which it was acknowledged were open to grave objections. But if the House of Commons passed a Resolution of that character as to a particular tax, it would be held to mean that that tax was to be taken first among those which were to be altered, reduced, or abolished. Now, he could not admit, so far as he was concerned, the doctrine that the Carriage Tax was so bad that it should be repealed before other taxes. He would give instances of one or two taxes which had been the subject of discussion, and which it was said ought to be repealed. They had had an interesting debate on the subject of tobacco not long since; and the argument had been put forward, not without effect, that the time had come when the 4*d.* per pound imposed a few years ago might safely be taken off. It was imposed, the House was told, only as a temporary measure; and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for North Devon said, the other day, that he hoped the time would soon come when it would be possible to take it off. If the Motion of the noble Lord were carried, the tax on carriages would be taken off first. There had been no little discussion lately in the Press about the Railway Duty, and his hon. Friend behind him had a Motion to take off the rest of the duty. On that he expressed no opinion; but certainly, if the Motion of the noble Lord was carried, the Carriage Tax would have precedence of the Railway Duty. There were other taxes which had been the subject of discussion, and as to which strong representations had been made. Take, for instance, the Death Duties. He admitted there were some who thought the Death Duties might be increased; but there were others who thought that a considerable remission in the aggregate amount received ought to be conceded by the Treasury. That remission must give precedence to the Carriage Duty if the Motion of the noble Lord were carried. Then there was a strong feeling on the subject of the Marine Insurance Duty. But the repeal of the Marine Insurance Duty would have to give way, if the Motion of the noble Lord were carried; but there was a more important duty. His hon. Friend the Member for the City of London (Mr. Alderman W. Lawrence) had brought several times before the House the question of the House Tax, and his hon. Friend the Secretary to the Treasury and others had admitted that there were great anomalies in the tax, and it had been urged that in redressing them it might be necessary to sacrifice a certain amount of Revenue. But here, again, they would be unable to deal with the House Tax if this Resolution should be adopted. There was a much more important class of duties still—the duties on tea, coffee, and dried fruits, which a very large section of the House, with which he sympathized, wished to reduce or abolish. Were they to give precedence to the tax on carriages before carrying further the proposals for a free breakfast table? The tax on gold and silver plate was small, and might be expected not to stand in the way. Still, the supporters of its repeal, like those who would deal with patent medicines and the like, must be taken into account. There was another great demand affecting the power of the House to reduce taxes—namely, for aid in relief of local burdens, the charge for which must, to a large extent, whether it was direct or indirect, fall on the Exchequer. Now, was the noble Lord prepared to say that the repeal of this particular tax should take precedence of the measures for giving relief to local burdens, which, whatever form they took, must heavily burden the Exchequer? On these grounds alone, it would be impolitic in Parliament to take one particular tax for remission out of the dozen to which grave objection might be urged, and virtually call on the Chancellor of the Exchequer to deal with that particular tax before adopting any measure of relief. And now a word or two on the tax itself. Nobody would deny that, in the main, the tax fell upon the rich. There were some, no doubt, who could not avoid using carriages—professional people, for example—who might not belong to the rich or the well-to-do classes; but they bore a very small proportion of the tax. If he were to hazard a guess, he should say that about three-fourths at least of the duty was paid by the wealthy. Therefore, by that Resolution they singled out a tax, not like taxes on tea, coffee, and tobacco, which were mainly paid by the poor, but a tax which was mainly paid by the rich; and the House would declare, if it adopted the Resolution, that the first taxpayer to be relieved should be mainly the rich people in Great Britain, for in Ireland, he might remark, no Carriage Tax was paid. On that ground alone, he confessed that he should see grave objection to that Resolution. But the noble Lord said it might be true that the rich in the main paid that duty; but incidentally it fell on those who built carriages. That was true. Every tax on articles of manufacture, although it fell directly on those who had the advantage of the article produced, incidentally fell on the manufacturer, whoever he might be. But that afforded no reason why they should single out a tax that was paid mainly by the rich, merely because it incidentally touched those who were engaged in the trade of making the taxed article. The noble Lord had alluded to some incidents of the tax, and had repeated the figures given by a deputation which waited upon him some months ago. Many of these were doubtless not far wrong; but he must except those of the numbers in the trade and the annual turnover, which, he was satisfied, had not been sufficiently worked out. The turnover, he felt satisfied, was much larger than the amount that was estimated by the deputation to which he had referred, and from the report of which the noble Lord had quoted. Then the noble Lord said—"You select a particular form of locomotion for taxation; but you leave other forms of locomotion untaxed;" and he particularly mentioned railways. The railways, the noble Lord said, paid only a small tax as compared with the owners of carriages. Now, he had read that morning the report of a speech made by a great Railway Chairman, in which he alluded to the incidence of the Railway Duty, and certainly his idea of its incidence was very different from that of the noble Lord. He described it in strong language as very heavy. The produce of the Railway Passenger Duty was something over £400,000 a-year, and that of the Carriage Duty something over £550,000; so that there was no great excess in the Carriage Duty over the Railway Duty. Then the noble Lord said—"Look what a number of second-hand carriages are to be found in all the carriage-builders' shops. That is because persons who want a new carriage before their old one is worn out are driven by the tax to send the latter to the coachmaker, who has to make them an allowance for it in the price of the new carriage." Now, judging from his own experience, the price given for an old carriage was very small indeed; and he did not think the transaction was a very lucrative one for those who kept carriages. The argument was exactly the other way. But the noble Lord had referred to the state of things abroad in connection with that question. On that subject he had a good deal of conversation with the intelligent deputation which waited upon him; and he had since made inquiries as to Carriage Taxes abroad—particularly in France, the country to be compared most properly with our own. Hungary or Austria could bear no comparison with England as to the use of carriages; but in France, especially in Paris, the use of carriages almost approached that of England. Through the kindness of Lord Granville, he had obtained very full information from the French Government as to the Carriage Duties there. He was not speaking now of the municipal charges paid in Paris and other French towns for cabs and other vehicles plying for hire, which were very heavy, but of the Government tax on carriages. That tax was far larger than it was in England. In Paris the Government tax on a four-wheeled carriage was 60 francs per annum, on a two-wheeled carriage 40 francs, and on every horse 25 francs. These were the duties paid in Paris by the owners of carriages as part of the Inland Revenue. In other places in France there was a sort of sliding scale; but in Paris and in France generally the Carriage Tax was far higher than in this country. The state of things in France was far more burdensome on carriage owners than it was here; and yet in France he had heard of no complaint of the large number of second-hand carriages accumulated in the hands of the coachmakers. The fact was, carriages were not the only second-hand articles that accumulated in the hands of the makers. The owners of pianofortes often preferred, after using them a certain time, to send them back into the hands of the maker, and get new instruments; but there was no tax on pianos. That practice in regard to carriages was not the consequence of the tax at all, but the consequence of the habits of the country. He did not think that the smallness of the increase in the number of carriages kept from year to year, as the noble Lord supposed, had practically anything to do with the duty. In point of fact, those who kept carriages had largely benefited by recent legislation. The repeal of the Horse Duty and the abolition of turnpikes had been a great relief to them; but those measures had not led to more carriages and horses being used. Therefore, he could not see that the Carriage Duty had the effect which the noble Lord supposed. The tax constituted a very trifling percentage in the cost of keeping a carriage, and could not be called burdensome to those who had to pay it; and for these reasons he trusted that the House would not adopt the Resolution of the noble Lord.

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, he thought that the statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer raised an issue altogether foreign to the point raised by the noble Lord. The Motion said that that tax was exceptional in its character and injurious to the interests of a particular trade. The Chancellor of the Exchequer told them that there was a series of taxes open to grave objection, among them being the duty on tobacco, the Tea Duty, the Railway Duty, the Marine Insurance Duty; and he asked whether the Carriage Duty ought to have the precedence over those taxes? Now he would point out that that was the only annual tax on a useful manufactured article in this country. Moreover, there were not only some 26,000 skilled artisans directly interested in that trade; but a vast number of collateral trades depended on the success and the excellence of the work which those 26,000 skilled artisans were employed in perfecting; and he maintained that that tax being very injurious to trade ought to be abolished. A deputation had waited on the right hon. Gentleman a short time ago in connection with this subject. He had given that deputation, he believed, encouragement; but it was a remarkable fact that in addition to that deputation the Chambers of Commerce throughout the country had dealt with the question. He found on inquiry that the Chambers of Commerce of London, Bristol, Derby, Newcastle, Worcester, and Leicester had all passed resolutions in favour of the remission of this tax. Besides these Bodies very important meetings at Bath and Manchester had dealt with the question; and, as had been pointed out, even the Prime Minister himself had advocated some years ago the remission of this tax. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had acknowledged that the complaint of the deputation was well founded. The trade said that the overturn of their business in the year was £2,500,000; the amount of tax it had to pay to the Chancellor of the Exchequer was about £545,000 a-year. He asked the House, therefore, whether the subject was not worthy of consideration? The right hon. Gentleman had said that the tax was one which fell mostly upon the rich. This was a great mistake. Everyone knew that in commercial and industrial districts, where there was hardly any resident gentry, the carriage became almost an article of livelihood to the neighbourhood. He thought there was great force in the Motion of the noble Lord, and he hoped the House would not put it aside merely upon the assertion of the Chancellor of the Exchequer that there were so many other taxes which ought to be considered, and that this tax on carriages ought not to have the preference.

MR. ANDERSON said, he did not agree with the right hon. Gentleman who had just spoken that the manufacturers of carriages paid this tax. He recognized that the tax fell mainly on the rich; but the manner in which it operated against the manufacturers of carriages was to cause the rich people to keep a smaller number of carriages in consequence of the tax. If they freed the trade of this tax, therefore, they would give an impetus to it, and create a larger demand for carriages. There were two ways of looking at the question—first, as a tax upon a luxury, and next as a tax upon industry. So far as the tax was a tax upon luxury paid for by the rich, he approved of it. It was a good tax. So far as it acted as a restraint upon an important manufacture he disapproved of it; it was a bad tax. What the House had to consider was whether it did more good in the one direction or more harm in the other. After fully considering the matter for some years, he confessed his opinion was that the tax did more harm in restraining a trade than it did good as a tax upon luxury; and he thought, therefore, the tax ought as soon as possible to be abolished. The Chancellor of the Exchequer admitted that it was not a good tax—at least, he mildly condemned it; and his answer was practically that he could not afford to take it off, because there were a number of other taxes which competed for his attention when he had any surplus to dispose of. There were, for example, the Tobacco Duty, the Railway Duty, the Death Duties, local burdens, marine insurance, and the duty on gold and silver plate. He (Mr. Anderson) had on previous occasions advocated the taking off of the Marine Insurance Duty and the duty on gold and silver plate, because he thought those duties were in restraint of a manufacturing industry. He maintained, therefore, that the taxes on gold and silver plate, marine insurance, and on carriages were directly in restraint of manufacturing industry, and ought to be taken off. The right hon. Gentleman also mentioned the Tea and Coffee Duties. He had before now advocated the reduction of those duties; and what he complained of was that while the right hon. Gentleman condemned a great many taxes and said they were bad and ought to be taken off, he did not avail himself of his opportunities to take them off when he could. The right hon. Gentleman had this year no less a sum than £5,000,000 dropping into his hands by the expiry of Terminable Annuities. Why could not the right hon. Gentleman have used some part of that surplus in removing these most objectionable taxes. That could have been done, and a large part of the sum used for the reduction of the Debt. Instead of doing that the right hon. Gentleman kept on all these objectionable taxes, however bad they might be, in order that he might use the whole amount of the expired Terminable Annuities to make a great flourish about the reduction of the Debt. Instead of relieving the present generation of manufacturers and taxpayers, the Chancellor of the Exchequer threw the relief on to some future generation, about which they knew nothing at all. There was another way in which the right hon. Gentleman might make a very considerable amount of money that would help him a good deal. He was glad the proposal to issue bogus half-sovereigns had been dropped. If the right hon. Gentleman, instead of issuing bogus half-sovereigns, would issue a reasonable quantity of paper money—both £1 notes and 10s. notes—the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the country also would obtain great benefit. The right hon. Gentleman had missed one golden opportunity for removing these taxes, and it was impossible to say when he would find another.

Mr. MACFARLANE said, he did not think the tax affected the coachbuilder to anything like the extent which had been stated. He looked upon the tax as strictly a rich man's tax, and therefore it was one of the best taxes in use. He believed that no man who could afford to keep a carriage was deterred from doing so by this impost. A reference had been made to the Tea and Coffee Duties; but what, he asked, was the actual comparison between the old woman who drank tea and the old gentleman who rode in his carriage? The old woman paid 100 per cent on every pound of tea she drank, while the Carriage Tax only amounted to 2 or 3 per cent. The working man, too, paid a duty of 600 to 700 per cent on his tobacco. If the question were pressed to a Division he would vote against the Motion.

Mr. FRANCIS BUXTON expressed a hope that the Chancellor of the Exchequer would see his way to abolishing the Passenger Duty, which affected far more people than the Carriage Tax. He (Mr. F. Buxton) was in favour of the abolition of all duties on locomotion; but if the effect of passing this Resolution were to be to abolish the Carriage Duty rather than the Railway Passenger Duty, he must vote against the Motion of the noble Lord.

Mr. ILLINGWORTH said, he thought the grievance of the carriage makers was more fancied than real. He did not believe that it affected the carriage industry. No doubt there was stagnation in the trade, but there was depression all over the country, and carriages being a luxury were naturally one of the first things that people gave up. There were many taxes that the Chancellor of the Exchequer ought to have taken the opportunity before now of abolishing or reducing, instead of indulging in an heroic plan for the reduction of the National Debt. He agreed with the hon. Member for Glasgow (Mr. Anderson) that the Chancellor of the Exchequer was doing rather too much for posterity in his endeavours to reduce the interest on the National Debt. He thought there was no case to be urged for the abolition of the Carriage Taxes in comparison with the claims of tea and tobacco. Tea was consumed to an enormous extent, and the duty on it was disproportionately large. He would urge that it was to the advantage of the country, consumers, producers, and taxpayers, that we should lessen the proportion of indirect taxation, and go to the more scientific principle of direct taxation. That system would be far preferable to the present crude and unjust system of levying taxes not in proportion to the ability to pay, but on the amount of the article actually consumed.

MR. DUCKHAM said, he did not consider that the Carriage Tax seriously affected an important industry. It was a tax paid by those who used the vehicles, and its effect upon the manufacturers, he thought, must be very infinitesimal. As a Local Taxation Reformer, he considered it to be a tax that should be transferred from Imperial to Local Authority. Upon the removal of the turnpike gates the Chambers of Agriculture strongly urged that the horse and vehicle tax should be so transferred; but, unfortunately, one of the first acts done by the late Government was to repeal the Horse Tax, although that repeal was comparatively unasked for; and the overburdened ratepayers had their burden most seriously increased, the gates being removed without any equitable provision being made for the future maintenance of the roads. And now an attempt was made to obtain a further repeal, and that of a tax yielding upwards of £500,000 annually, and that, too, a tax borne principally by the wealthy. He (Mr. Duckham) hoped that the right hon. Gentleman would consider the cry of the heavily taxed urban and rural ratepayers. They had been promised substantial relief. The transference of Imperial taxes had been shadowed forth by the Government as the source from whence to expect that relief; but he failed to see how that promise could be carried into effect if such taxes were frittered away.

MR. WHITLEY said, he did not think the Chancellor of the Exchequer had met the real question—namely, that that tax was the only existing tax upon industry. The interests of this country were suffering in every direction; and though hon. Members had spoken of the other classes who were suffering from an excess of taxation, it had been forgotten that those taxes affected the whole section of citizens, whereas the Carriage Tax was put upon a class who were also subject to other taxes. He had never heard that the rich scrupled to pay the tax; but there was a very strong feeling on the part of those engaged in the trade, on the part of a large number of workmen who were struggling for their living, that the tax being the only one which pressed on industry and labour was one which ought to be repealed at the earliest possible moment. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had avoided that question, and had never alluded to the exceptional nature of the tax, that it was one dealing entirely with labour, and therefore essentially different from other taxes. On those grounds he should support the Motion of his noble Friend.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 93; Noes 38: Majority 55.—(Div. List, No. 183.)

Main Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

PARLIAMENT — PUBLIC BUSINESS — PROCEDURE—HOUSE OF LORDS BILLS.—OBSERVATIONS.

MR. WARTON, in whose name the following Notice stood upon the Paper:—

"To call attention to the procedure in this House with respect to Bills brought from the House of Peers; and to move the following Resolution:—'That all Bills brought from the House of Peers be read the first time by announcement from the Chair, and that one clear day at the least intervene between the first and second readings of such Bills. That this Resolution be a Standing Order of this House.'" said, there was, in the procedure of the House, an evil with regard to Bills brought from the Lords, and that was that they were read a first time as a matter of course. A Bill might be brought down one evening, read a first time, and the very next morning might be down for second reading. With regard to the first part of his Resolution, an improvement had been made in the practice, because Mr. Speaker had been careful to announce from the Chair Bills coming from the Lords; and, therefore, the first evil seemed to have been remedied. What he would ask, however, was that, when a Bill came down from the Lords, Notice of that fact might be put upon the Papers distributed to Members in the morning. The Prime Minister, who always spoke of the majority in that House as a thing to be regarded as sacred, was in the habit of characterizing a majority of the House of Lords as a mere majority or a sheer majority. Although the Forms of the House would prevent him from moving the Resolution of which he had given Notice, he trusted that, as he had on a former occasion withdrawn his Notice on this subject to facilitate progress being made with the Franchise Bill, the Prime Minister would give him an assurance that he would give the matter his favourable consideration.

MR. GLADSTONE: I beg to assure the hon. and learned Member that I retain a full recollection of his courtesy on a former occasion in allowing us to proceed with other matters, and I hope that a recollection of such Parliamentary goodwill will not easily be effaced from my mind. I am afraid, however, that I should fail in my duty if I were to permit a grateful recollection of that courtesy and of my obligation to the hon. and learned Member to give a bias to my view of the merits of any particular question; and, therefore, I feel bound to look at his proposition in a spirit of rigid impartiality, and in the result I cannot say that I regard it altogether with favour. In dealing with this question we must fall back upon the principle which men necessarily apply to a great portion of the transactions of this life, which is not to make an alteration in an established Rule without good cause being shown. The hon. and learned Member seeks to introduce an exception into the established proceedings of this House, and I must presume that in practice the Rule which he seeks to alter has been found convenient; and neither my Colleagues nor myself have ever heard that any inconvenience has arisen from the mode of procedure adopted by this House in reference to Bills coming down to us from the House of Lords. That mode of procedure simply implies the existence of a certain amount of courtesy between the two Houses of Parliament, and that the fact that a measure has passed through one of the Houses of the Legislature affords a presumption favourable to a Bill, not as regards its merits, but merely that it should receive an early introduction into the other. That is a principle which I regard as being reasonable in itself; and if we were to depart from it, it might possibly follow that counter projects "elsewhere" might diminish the facilities which Bills coming from this House receive "elsewhere." The difference between the practice as regards a Bill originally introduced into this House and a Bill coming down from the House of Lords is that the latter Bill gains a single day, in consequence of its having passed through the House of Lords by reason of no Notice of the intention to move for leave to introduce it being required. I do not see how any more limited privilege can be accorded to a measure coming down to us from the House of Lords if there is to be any privilege at all in the matter. But then the hon. and learned Gentleman puts forward another argument derived from the half-past 12 o'clock Rule. He says that the indulgence accorded to Bills coming from the House of Lords prevents the sweeping application of that Rule. Perhaps I do not take so high a view of that Rule as the hon. and learned Gentleman does. I am not a decided opponent of it by any means; but the hon. and learned Gentleman seems to idealize and to worship it, and to be desirous of elevating it into the Magna Charta of Parliament. He appears to think that it is a principle of such wide scope and so consecrated in its character that on no account must anything be allowed to limit its application to any measure to which it is capable of being applied. I must say that I am not able to accompany the hon. and learned Member in his view of the matter. The amount of the hon. and learned Gentleman's grievance is that, in consequence of the system adopted in regard to Bills coming from the House of Lords, the blocking of such Bills cannot be made applicable to the second reading if the Bill goes forward de die in diem, except in the single case where the Member has not happened to perceive the announcement of the introduction of the Bill. I admit that very often a Member may not be present, or the announcement of the Bill may take place, as it does sometimes, at the close of the proceedings, in which case he loses the opportunity of blocking Bills on the second reading. But what does that amount to? The hon. Member may, if he thinks fit, block the Bills at their Committee stage—

MR. WARTON: That is not enough.

MR. GLADSTONE: That exactly illustrates what I was just saying. The hon. and learned Gentleman's enthusiasm on this subject is well calculated to inspire sympathy; but we must be upon our guard against the too great indulgence of that kind of sympathy; and, on the whole, I think that the hon. and learned Member ought to rest content with his power of blocking these Bills at their Committee stage, if by chance the fact of the announcement of their introduction has escaped his vigilance. Upon these grounds I feel bound to say that I cannot concur in the proposal of the hon. and learned Member.

CENTRAL ASIA — RUSSIAN ADVANCE.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. MACFARLANE, who had given Notice of his intention to call attention to the advance of Russia in Central Asia, with the view of moving a Resolution to the effect that the advance of Russia to Merv and Sarakhs endangers the safety of Herat, threatens the independence and integrity of Afghanistan, and is deserving of the most serious consideration of Her Majesty's Government, said, that there were many reasons why he should not proceed with his Resolution. In the first place, the House being occupied with things near at hand would pay no attention to matters which were occurring at a distance. He was not one of those who held that the British lion should go growling about the world, wagging its tail, and seeking matters of quarrel on every side; but, at the same time, he conceived that where this country really possessed interests, the British lion should let it be generally known that he was prepared to defend them. In the next place, he believed that at length the Indian Government had become alive to the importance of this question, and that the policy of masterly inactivity, or, as he should rather say, of dastardly inactivity, which they had followed with regard to it had come to an end. As he believed that the Government of India were now alive to the importance of this question, he should be content to leave it in their hands until next Session.

MR. J. K. CROSS said, that he could assure the hon. Gentleman that he was not wrong in supposing that the Government of India were fully alive to the importance of the matter referred to; and after that assurance he hoped the hon. Gentleman would not further press it upon the attention of the House.

POOR LAW (IRELAND)—ELECTION OF GUARDIANS, NEWRY UNION — ILLEGAL ACTION OF RETURNING OFFICER.—OBSERVATIONS.

MR. SMALL, who had a Motion on the Paper in the following terms:—

"That, in the opinion of this House, the action of the Local Government Board in Ireland in neglecting to hold an inquiry into the charges made against the Returning Officer of Newry Union is most unsatisfactory," rose to call attention to the subject. He complained that he and his colleague were not allowed to inspect the voting papers, which were inspected at an advanced hour. The Returning Officer did not show the smallest favour to himself (Mr. Small) or his colleagues at the late election; but, on the contrary, showed the most unfair partizanship towards their opponents. They applied, on the 31st March last, to the Local Government Board for an inquiry into the charges which they had preferred; but notwithstanding all their efforts that inquiry had never yet been held, although the result of it had been to deprive them of their seats. They had not obtained the smallest satisfaction. The entire majority of the Board of the Newry Union had been changed at the election; and, although they had made charges against the Returning Officer, not the smallest notice had been taken of it. They had repeatedly specified these charges; but all their complaints had been of no avail. The Returning Officer had, on the occasion of the scrutiny of the votes in the Division, showed the most marked animus against himself and his colleagues, and said three days before that he knew what the result of the election would be. He and his colleagues had been told that at the scrutiny of the votes there had occurred what was very seldom done in the country—namely, the counting in of the votes of political friends and the rejection of the votes of those who did not happen to be political friends. It was, considering all these allegations, a most extraordinary thing that the Local Government Board would not grant an inquiry, or even send down an Inspector in order to investigate the matter. He would not ask the Chief Secretary to prejudge the matter; but he would ask him, as President of the Local Government Board in Ireland, to have an inquiry granted into these charges.

MR. TREVELYAN said, he had read the very voluminous Papers in this case, and he should say that they appeared to him to bear in a very marked manner on the events of the past few days. He was impressed by the reading of the documents with the enormous advantage to the public at large of the proposals contained in the Poor Law Guardians (Ireland) Bill, which was unfortunately rejected in "another place" last night. He was quite satisfied that the great abuses, the enormous waste of time of the Local Government Board, and the extreme uncertainty of the law relating to claims to vote at Poor Law elections would be obviated, and thoroughly obviated, by that Bill. The whole process of election was in an unsatisfactory state. When the election approached, instead of having a register of electors, it was left to a clerk to settle who should vote. Then voting papers were left at houses to be filled up in circumstances which lent themselves, in a most remarkable degree, to fraud. It was impossible that an election could be quite fairly conducted on such methods as those. Then it was not satisfactory that the inquiring into questions arising out of elections should rest with an Inspector of the Local Government Board, which was not a judicial, but an administrative body. He regretted very much indeed, therefore, that a Bill which proposed to establish an excellent tribunal—namely, the County Court, to hear disputes arising out of these elections—a tribunal to which no objection had been raised there or in "another place"—had been so summarily rejected; and he foresaw that, as a result of that rejection, they would have to again enter into a wilderness of mutual recrimination and mutual distrust, and go on with labours that were simply Herculean when every election of Guardians arose. But, in the present case, he did not think, on such an examination of the Papers as he had been able to make, that the charge of personal animus against the Returning Officer had been made out. That officer, so far as he could judge, was a painstaking man, who had done his best in the circumstances. He was not, however, satisfied that the question of the return of the Guardians had been satisfactorily ascertained. He was much struck by the magnitude of the contest, and the narrow margin of majority by which it was decided. On the whole, he had come to the conclusion that an inquiry from head-quarters ought to be instituted into the conduct of the election, although he could not then specify what would be the exact character of the inquiry. He trusted, however, that no personal charges would be brought forward, unless really substantial grounds for such charges could be furnished. The personal charges, in this instance, appeared to him to be somewhat frivolous in their nature. ["Oh!"] He was of that opinion after having carefully read the Papers. He should communicate with the Local Government Board in order to see what course should be taken. Poor Law inquiries were not so easy as the hon. Member seemed to think, and the Inspectors at present had their time fully occupied.

MR. MOLLOY said, he was unacquainted with the particular case in question; but so many complaints were made of a similar character, that it seemed evident that the present system required amendment. The election of Mr. Farrell, of Edenderry Union, had been conducted in an equally unsatisfactory manner. Votes had been received from persons on a property qualification who had really possessed no property in the neighbourhood. If the Chief Secretary admitted that injustice existed, it was his duty to see that justice was done. Was he prepared to use the powers invested in him?

Mr. O'SULLIVAN said, he hoped that some Inspector of experience would be sent down to Newry to hold the inquiry, as questions of great difficulty would arise, and that there would be no delay in dealing with the matter.

Mr. WILLIAM REDMOND said, that many ratepayers were deprived of the right of voting at Poor Law elections simply because they were not at home at the time the policeman called with the papers. He had received a letter on this matter from the County Carlow, where it appeared that persons, who had not received voting papers on the days appointed for distributing them, applied to the Clerk of the Union for them, but were told that the police of the district had already sent papers to all voters. It afterwards turned out that the police had called at the houses, but that, not finding anyone there, they brought back the papers, so that some of these persons had no opportunity of voting.

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members being found present,

LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)—THE TUBBERCOURRY PRISONERS.

OBSERVATIONS.

Mr. SEXTON, who had given Notice that he would call attention to the course pursued by the Crown in the case of the Tubbercurry prisoners; and to move—

“That, in the opinion of this House, the practices growing in Ireland, of delaying magisterial action in criminal cases by repeated remands, and of postponing, by adjournment of trials, the right of the accused to have his case decided by a jury, are unconstitutional, and prejudicial to the interests of justice, and therefore ought to be discontinued,” said, he had grievous ground of complaint against the Legal Officers of the Crown. Several months had passed away since these 11 men, who were connected with the county he had the honour to represent, were arrested by the police and thrown into prison. They were all persons of respectability. The gravity of the charges against them—treason-felony and conspiracy to murder—made it the more important that they should be speedily brought to trial. What course did the police pursue? They began, and continued from week to week, an unconstitutional system of private remands in gaol; and when attention was called by him in that House to that proceeding, they resorted to a system of eight-day remands in public, doling out the evidence on each occasion in dribblets. It appeared quite plain that the Crown was acting not so much from a sense that they had evidence in their possession to entitle them to get a committal, as from a hope that chance circumstances would enable them to eke out their case. A promise was at length made on behalf of the Crown that these men should be tried at the next ensuing Sligo Assizes. That promise was not fulfilled, and he was informed the other day by the Solicitor General that an application was made by the Crown to postpone the trial, and that it was granted. In the report of what took place, he found it stated that a circular, appealing for funds in aid of the defence of the prisoners, had been distributed in the County of Sligo, and that the document was calculated to interfere with the fairness of the trial. He quite admitted that the circular indicated a strong feeling on the part of those who sent it out; but he desired to point out that it was dated the 16th of June, and that the Attorney General for Ireland might have used the power he had of changing the venue some weeks before the date fixed for the Sligo Assizes. The application to postpone the trial was not made until the last moment, and the result was that some of the men had to be detained in prison for a further period. He had to-day received a letter from one of these unfortunate men, who was a Poor Law Guardian, and occupied a respectable position in Tubbercurry. He had now been in prison four months, separated from his family, his business ruined, his health impaired. Writing from prison on the 23rd instant, he said—

“I have seen the Solicitor General's reply to your question. The appeal he referred to appeared immediately after we were sent for trial seven weeks ago, and we never heard a word about it interfering with our trial until we were put into the dock last Saturday. Was there not time enough during these seven weeks to have the venue changed? But was it not one of those flimsy excuses the Crown resort to in cases like this? I believe they are ashamed to bring us to trial on the evidence.”

Three of the prisoners were charged with treason-felony and conspiracy to murder; but, notwithstanding that serious charge, they were admitted to bail in the sum of £25 each. That fact, in his opinion, showed the real character of the case, and indicated that the Crown had no hope of obtaining a conviction. The men were anxious to be brought to trial, and they were confident that they would be able to prove their innocence. The general opinion in Sligo was that the informer in this case was a person of such a character that it would be an injustice to keep a dog one hour in a kennel upon his oath. It was neither reasonable nor constitutional to arrest men, and then find a reason for keeping them in prison. No man ought to be arrested without reasonable evidence having been obtained beforehand against him. He protested against the system under which these men were kept in prison for months together without being brought to trial. This whole system was a scandal. There was nothing in the present condition of Ireland to justify it. The country was now peaceable and law-abiding, and this sinister and vindictive method of prosecution ought to be abandoned by the Government. As Representative of the county to which these prisoners belonged, he deemed it his duty solemnly to call upon the Solicitor General to place these men in the dock without delay, and to produce his evidence against them.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. WALKER) said, he extremely regretted that the Tubbercurry prisoners were not tried at the last Sligo Assizes. When they were first brought before the magistrates, he himself gave directions that there should be as few remands as possible. In a case of this kind, however, it was obvious that there should be remands from time to time, and it was considered desirable that the whole of the evidence should be produced before the prisoners were committed for trial. The men were charged with conspiring to murder an official of Tubbercurry Workhouse, and also with treason-felony. He would not comment upon the case beyond saying that the charge was a very serious one, and that there was prima facie evidence against the 12 men in question. It was the desire of the Crown that the prisoners should be tried at the Sligo Assizes, and the Attorney General for Ireland went down for the purpose of conducting the prosecution. A document, however, had been circulated, dated the 16th of June, among the special jurors who were to try the men, and he was of opinion that the Attorney General was right in the conclusion at which he arrived—namely, that that document would affect the fairness of the trial. The document said that the only crime of the accused men was undying attachment to their country, that their liberty had been bartered away for lucre; and it contained the strongest reflections upon their accusers. The District Inspector made an affidavit that that document had been widely circulated among the class of special jurors, some of whom would have to try the case, and that a widespread feeling existed among them that their lives would not be safe if they were to convict. Therefore, an application was made, but with the greatest reluctance, for the postponement of the trial, and the learned Judge consented to postpone it. The hon. Member said that three of the prisoners had been admitted to bail. That was because the Attorney General, as the trial was to be postponed, out of a kindly feeling, consented that they should be allowed out on bail. [Mr. SEXTON: £25 bail.] Surely the hon. Gentleman could not complain that the bail was so small. He was informed that the Attorney General would consider whether he could not let out more. It was never intended that the prisoners should remain in gaol until the March Assizes. The trial would take place about the 1st of October, so that they would be left in gaol only for two months more.

Mr. PARNELL said, that he had read the proceedings, and he was surprised that the learned Judge should have agreed to the postponement of the trial on so flimsy a pretext. The circular was not issued by the prisoners; it was an appeal to raise a fair trial fund; and it furnished no grounds whatever for depriving the men of their right to be tried in their own district by people among whom they had spent their lives, and by whom the informers also were well known—probably too well known in the opinion of the Crown officials. The issue of the circular was no reason why the men should be taken off to Dublin, far from their own residences, to be tried by jurors prejudiced by appeals daily made to them by the English Press to convict and hang those who came before them. If there was intimidation involved in the issue of the circular it was not within the control of the prisoners in any respect whatever. Why was not Mr. Devine, who put his name to it, proceeded against under the Intimidation Clauses of the Prevention of Crime Act, or why was he not punished by the Judge, with the enormous powers he possessed, for contempt of Court? Instead of that the cause of the prisoners was prejudiced and their prospects imperilled. He had taken a special interest in this case from the beginning, particularly in connection with the arrest of one of his constituents—Mr. Fitzgerald—whom he had known for years. He (Mr. Parnell) had come to the conclusion that it was a "fishing" prosecution. All the proceedings had been dictated by a desire to get further evidence, which, in all probability, did not exist in a case which was bound to break down in present circumstances. The Prime Minister, when the Prevention of Crime Act was passing, promised that no proceedings should be taken against persons on stale charges of treason-felony, and it was upon that condition that the Irish Members modified their opposition to the clauses. But after the Irish Members had been forcibly driven from the House, other and different clauses were brought forward. Mr. Fitzgerald had been arrested, and would be tried upon as stale a charge of treason-felony as ever entered the head of an Attorney or a Solicitor General. He protested against the action of the Government in this case, which was bringing law and order into contempt. In the district of Tubbercurry crime had ceased; it had ceased in Sligo, and nearly all through the country. He would ask the Chief Secretary whether it was desirable to go on in such circumstances with a case against respectable men on the testimony of the most abandoned informers that could be collected throughout the country? The district was now, and had been for some time past, perfectly safe; but these people were bandied about from place to place and from week to week, and their trial delayed. Nothing could be more injudicious and foolish on the part of the Government than the venomous way in which prisoners were persecuted, and he hoped they might hear that the Chief Secretary would consider the whole question of bail. Persons having a stake in the country ought clearly to be allowed out on bail, so that they might return to their avocations and to that breadwinning which their families stood so much in need of.

Mr. HARRINGTON called attention to the conviction of the policeman Muldowney, and pointed out the fact that the policemen present in Court all declared him innocent. Equally, in his opinion, had other innocent people been convicted and hanged in Ireland. In no other country in the world, he believed, would a case be trumped up on the evidence of a man who had, first of all, got seven years' penal servitude for highway robbery, then 12 years' penal servitude for an attempt upon the life of Mr. Justice Lawton in the streets of Dublin, and then penal servitude for life for complicity in the Phoenix Park murders. Great injustice was also done by the Irish authorities by delaying the trial of prisoners. They were thus prevented from proving their innocence, because their witnesses often left the country and could not be called when their trial at length was called on.

Mr. HEALY said, he was astonished at the action of the Government in these trials. It had been stated in the House that they had no intention of postponing them to any subsequent Assizes; and what reliance could be placed upon any assurance of the Government or Ministers of the Crown after this pledge had been broken? They were to be kept in gaol seven months longer. He thought that no better training could be had for a Solicitor General or a Chief Secretary for Ireland than a few months in gaol, and a little oakum picking, in order that they might realize what unfortunate prisoners had to endure through their neglect. He wondered how the Chief Secretary would like having to spend the next three months in a cell 8 feet by 5 feet in extent. He ventured to think that if he had a little experience of that kind he would have more commiseration for unfortunate prisoners remanded from week to week and month to month at the quibble of some lawyer, and in spite of Constitutional practice. Now, they were to be transferred to Dublin, in order to be tried by grand jurors of the class of the gentlemen now in Kilmainham awaiting trial for unnatural offences. The Crown would have no difficulty in a county where there were at least 100 magistrates like Sligo in packing a jury of 12 men and true, excluding every Catholic, or even fair-minded Protestant. No Catholic prisoner against whom the Crown had any animus had a chance of getting off. What was the pretence for postponing the trial until October? Plenty of other Assizes were going on in the country. Why must Government rely upon the tainted jurors of the City of Dublin? Were they to be told that there was no body of men to be trusted except the corrupt jurors of Dublin, against some of whom the Government had been obliged to bring most frightful charges? This continual reliance upon the City of Dublin bore, to his (Mr. Healy's) mind, a very extraordinary complexion. The Freemasons met in their offices in Dublin, and decided who should be acquitted and who should be hanged. James Ellis French had been made Prime Mason on the very day that the charge was brought against him by the hon. Member for Mallow. It should be remembered that the organization of Freemasonry, as it existed in Ireland, was imbued with political virus, and was not to be compared with the order of English Freemasonry. Were Irishmen to be subjected to indictments sworn, for anything they knew, in these secret Lodges on the night before a trial? That secret body controlled verdicts. Delaney had been arraigned for attacking Judge Lawson and for other serious offences, and yet there was no objection to his being brought forward as a Government witness; and one would have thought that a living Chief Secretary would have hesitated before making use of man as a witness on behalf of the Crown who had been convicted of the murder of the right hon. Gentleman's Predecessor. In no other country in the world had there been an instance in which a Government had availed themselves of such testimony. By a careful process of picking and choosing the Government might succeed in getting 12 men of a class who would believe any story which the Crown might choose to tell them. But the children and friends of the men whom the Government unjustly hanged and imprisoned would yet constitute a form of danger to the Government of Ireland and to the peace and order of the country. He (Mr. Healy) did not say he approved of it; but retaliation would assuredly come, and would throw the country into turmoil and disorder. The Government were doing their best to bring about that state of things. A trial was to take place in Belfast on Monday. The plaintiff was Mr. George Bolton. Evidence was requisite, and that very day he understood the Government had again placed themselves in partizanship with men of Bolton's class. He had here a telegram detailing how the solicitor and detective of his hon. Friend the Member for Mallow (Mr. O'Brien) had been to-day arrested in Dublin. He should read the telegram to the House, and ask why the Government lent their policemen to Bolton any more than to French? ["Question!"] If that ignorant Gentleman on the Ministerial side understood his business he would perceive that the Question was that the Speaker do leave the Chair. He trusted he should be free from interruptions for the remainder of his address. He had here a telegram from Mr. Chance with regard to his arrest, and if the Government spared him from the interruptions of their ardent supporters he would read it—

"Meiklejohn and I went to see Alice Carroll, a witness re Bolton, to-day. While talking to her mother, Constables 79 D and 149 D entered, and requested us to go to the station (a polite way of saying 'We arrest you'). I asked upon what charge. Constable 79 D replied being there for unlawful purposes (exactly the charge made by Head Constables Cottingham and Irwin against Meiklejohn in regard to French). The constable said, 'I must take you into custody.' This they did. Both constables refused to make any charge. Alice Carroll and her mother were asked by the police to make a charge. They refused. We were brought to the North Circular Road Station, and interrogated. I required the charge to be entered. Both constables refused to make any. No warrant was shown or produced. This deprives us of important evidence against Bolton."

Now, when the Government, which had not hesitated to enlist its detectives on behalf of French, were likewise throwing its ægis over Bolton, the chaste and virtuous, he wanted to know what guarantee was there for fair play or law and order in Ireland? They had got two of their police constables to obstruct the solicitor for Mr. William O'Brien, and to prevent him getting evidence against one of the Crown prosecutors. Was such a thing ever heard of before?

What did English Members say to that? They were told there was trumped-up evidence in the case of French. The Government were now relying upon that "trumped-up evidence." It was upon "trumped-up evidence" that the reporters were being excluded from the Police Court in Dublin, because, he presumed, French wanted to "round" upon Colonel Hillier and other high officials; yet the Government to-day had sent two constables to arrest Mr. Chance and Mr. Meiklejohn because they were getting up evidence against Bolton. Matters were coming to a serious pass in Ireland. They had the Government, on one hand, changing venues and arresting innocent men, delaying trials for months, and visiting prisoners in their cells; and, upon the other hand, using the same machinery to shield Bolton, the swindler and forger, whom they persisted in keeping in their employment. What were they to think of such a Government? They said they were anxious to convict criminals. If so, why would they not put Bolton on his trial? And, above all, why did they use Government machinery to obstruct the obtaining of evidence against them? There never was a more flagrant instance of the use of the machinery of Dublin Castle than these arrests to-day for the purpose of preventing justice being done in the Bolton case. Whatever the verdict in this case now, it would go forth to the world that the Constabulary of Dublin, under the advice of the Chief Secretary, had been employed to prevent witnesses being brought forward. When they found the circumstances he had mentioned, they were entitled to say that this thing in Ireland which was called the Government was simply a prostitution, which was not entitled to any respect from any honest man, but which ought to be covered with scorn and shame by every man who had the interest of his country and his race at heart.

MR. TREVELYAN: I can only speak now by the indulgence of the House. I rise simply for the purpose of saying that the hon. Gentleman, before stating that what has been done in Dublin to-day was done at the instigation of the Chief Secretary, ought to have asked me whether that was so?

MR. HEALY: What I said was this. After what occurred in French's case, after Gottingham and Irwin had been used by the Government on behalf of French to prevent the witnesses of Mr. O'Brien coming forward, I did not believe that these constables would have acted except at the direct instigation of high officials of whom the Chief Secretary is the Head.

MR. TREVELYAN: I will not dispute the words of the hon. Member. The hon. Member has left the impression upon the House that he believed this was done by my orders. I know nothing about it. I was not aware whether Mr. Chance and Mr. Meiklejohn were in Dublin or Belfast, or where they were, or what connection with this case they had. I do not enter into these minute points in legal cases. I do not think it is the business of the Chief Secretary of Ireland to do so, as it is not of the Home Secretary in this country. If the police have exceeded their duty, I will ascertain that after due inquiry, and I will see that proper means are taken that they shall not do so again. I will look into the case, and do what is just and right in the matter. If the story turns out to be incorrect, of course, there will be an end of the case. I have no further observation to make, except this—that I agree generally with the views put forward by my hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor General for Ireland; and I would remind the hon. Member who introduced this discussion of his assurance that the Attorney General was considering at this moment whether two more of the Tubbercurry prisoners could not be let out on bail.

MR. DEASY remarked, that when the Government arrested these men they had no idea of the charge they were about to bring against them, but trusted entirely to chance. The witnesses against them were of the lowest class; and no credence ought to be given to their evidence as against that of respectable persons. He hoped these men would either be unconditionally released, or be brought to trial at once. Mr. Fitzgerald, one of the men charged, happened to be one of his constituents; and he was convinced that the Government only arrested him because he was a troublesome person whom they were determined to get rid of at any cost.

Main Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," put, and agreed to.

SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES.

SUPPLY—considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

CLASS III.—LAW AND JUSTICE.

(1.) £134,957, to complete the sum for Reformatory and Industrial Schools, Great Britain.

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; Committee counted, and 40 Members being found present,

MR. WARTON said, the law as it now stood provided that no child should be sent to a reformatory school unless it had been previously convicted by magistrates. He believed he was correct in saying or supposing that there was some disposition on the part of the Government in favour of a change of the law in this respect. He (Mr. Warton) believed there was a general feeling that there ought to be some change in the law; that there ought to be some reformatory or other to which children could be sent who had not proper homes, and who had not become criminals in the strict sense of the word.

MR. HIBBERT said, he quite agreed with the hon. and learned Member for Bridport (Mr. Warton) that it was very desirable that a child could be sent to a reformatory without first of all being sent to prison. He was, however, not aware that there was any proposal now before the House to obviate that, though it was very desirable such a proposal should be made. He had no doubt that when the Report of the Commissioners who sat upon industrial and reformatory schools was being considered, this question would be considered along with others.

MR. RANKIN asked whether, under the Industrial Schools Act, it would be possible to make grants to those schools which had been formed for the sake of taking in children of the same class and character which supplied the present industrial schools, but destined to train children for emigration to the Colonies? He thought that the making of grants to those schools would be one of the most useful ways in which money could be spent; and, on the whole, it would be a most economical way. He knew that what he suggested would meet with the approval of the Colonial agents and other persons connected with the Colonies.

He would be glad to know whether, if the Government thought it was not possible to make the grants under the present Act, they would consider the advisability of making some alteration in the law by which grants could be made?

MR. HIBBERT said, that under the present law it was not possible to make grants to the schools established for the purpose the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Rankin) had indicated. It was no doubt a very desirable object, and might be considered when a reconsideration of the subject took place. He would take care the matter was considered by the Home Office during the Recess.

MR. HARRINGTON said, he did not know whether the same system with regard to industrial schools prevailed in England as they had to complain of in Ireland. The system was practically this—that before a child could go to an industrial school he must place himself in the position of a criminal; before a child could be got into an industrial school in Ireland it must first be proved before a magistrate that he had been seen begging, for instance. The system was abused to such an extent that a child was very often sent into the streets to beg by those who were interested in his removal to an industrial school.

THE CHAIRMAN (MR. RAIKES) called the attention of the hon. Gentleman to the fact that Ireland was not included in this Vote.

MR. HARRINGTON said, he had no desire to discuss the custom in Ireland; but simply wished to ask the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Hibbert) if the system in this country was the same as that in Ireland? If it was he intended to move for its abolition.

MR. HIBBERT said, the system was very much the same in England as in Ireland. It was not necessary that in all cases a child should be sent on the streets to beg before it could be sent to an industrial school. There were many reasons why a child should be sent to an industrial school, and no doubt one of the reasons was that it should be found begging in the streets. That was one way of getting a child out of the hands of parents who did not behave properly to it. There were many instances in which, in consequence of the neglect of the parents, it was to the interest of children that they should be sent to some industrial school.

Mr. HARRINGTON said, he was not referring to the case of children whom it was necessary to take away from the charge of negligent parents; but he was referring to cases of frequent occurrence where children had no parents or guardians able to provide for them. He had known the magistrates refuse to admit orphan children to industrial schools until they had been found begging in the streets. He regarded that as a great grievance, and one which required a remedy. Possibly the law was a desirable one where it became necessary to take children out of the charge of negligent parents; but, in the case of orphans, it was really leading children into hypocrisy at the very commencement of life, to send them into the streets to beg in order that they might, therefore, be sent to an industrial school. Surely such children might be admitted without their first of all committing some criminal act.

Mr. HIBBERT assured the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Harrington) the subject should be fully considered.

Vote agreed to.

(2.) £19,772, to complete the sum for the Broadmoor Criminal Lunatic Asylum.

Mr. WARTON said, he had a question to ask which seemed to him to be one of considerable importance. There was a large increase in the number of patients provided for this year—namely, 550 against 515 last year. The increase was thus very nearly 7 per cent. He would like to know to what cause the increase was to be attributed? They were told that, upon the whole, crime was on the decrease; and, therefore, it was well they should be told whether the increase in the number of criminal lunatics arose from any increasing tendency on the part of the Judges and others to agree with what might be called the medical, rather than the legal, theory of insanity. There was no disguising the fact that lawyers and doctors had been at variance with regard to the theory of insanity. It was quite possible that a man might know that what he did was wrong, and yet not be morally responsible for his actions. The only other question he had to ask was, whether it was expected that any difference would be made in the expenses of the Broadmoor Asylum owing to the operation of any Bill which might now be before the House, and which had been introduced in consequence of the recommendation of the Committee that investigated this subject?

Mr. HIBBERT said, the increase in the number of patients at Broadmoor arose very much from the fact that no criminal lunatics were now sent to licensed houses; and he thought the Committee would agree that it was very desirable no more criminal lunatics should be sent to houses of that character. Another reason of the increase was that strong representations were made by the Local Authorities against the practice of sending dangerous criminal lunatics to county and borough asylums. More criminals of that class, therefore, were now confined at Broadmoor. With regard to the second question of the hon. and learned Gentleman, he was bound to say that if the Criminal Lunatics Bill became law, there would be a considerable increase of the Vote, because the Bill relieved the Local Authorities of very considerable burdens they had at the present time. The matter had been very fully considered by a Departmental Committee. They went fully into the question, and recommended a change to meet the views of the Local Authorities. Of course, the alteration would not come into operation just yet, so it was not necessary to make any provision for it in the present Estimates. Perhaps it might be necessary to provide for the additional expense by a Supplementary Estimate, which would be submitted, not in the present Session, but later on in the year.

Vote agreed to.

(3.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

Dr. CAMERON said, that this Vote included the salaries of the Procurators Fiscal. He had some time ago brought forward the anomalies, and worse than anomalies, of the existing system with regard to Public Prosecutors in Scotland. Since then a number of new cases had come into his hands. For instance, the Chief Constable of an important burgh complained that the Procurator Fiscal of that burgh refused, in a case which the Chief Constable considered most clear, to prosecute a man who was his private client. He (Dr. Cameron) was not going to enter into cases of this kind; but since he brought his Motion before the House, the Crofters' Commission had reported in favour of the proposition he then made; and he would now ask the Government whether they would be prepared to carry out the recommendations of that Commission, and forbid Procurators Fiscal in Scotland to act as agents in private cases, or as land agents? Unless he got a satisfactory answer with regard to the case of the Procurator Fiscal of Dumfries, he should move to reduce the Vote by £670, which was the amount of his salary. Some time ago a young man in Dumfries applied for a licence, but the licence was refused by the magistrates on the ground that he was under 21 years of age; but they told him that if he overcame that difficulty by living for another six months they would probably grant him a certificate. In the meantime, he went to the Excise, and got permission to carry on a public-house without a certificate or licence. The law provided that a penalty of £500 should be imposed on any official of the Crown who permitted liquor to be sold without a licence; but when he mentioned this matter in the House, the Secretary to the Treasury lightly suggested that he (Dr. Cameron) might enrich himself by recovering that amount. He had no ambition to figure as a common informer; and he thought the best course was to move a reduction of the Vote, and allow the country to profit, not by £500, but by £670, which was the amount of the salary of the Public Prosecutor, whose business it was to enforce the law, and who had not enforced it in this case. The law distinctly laid down that any person shebeening in Scotland should be prosecuted. Recently, in Glasgow, some extraordinary arrests for shebeening were made; but at the very time these arrests were being made in Glasgow the Lord Advocate was allowing shebeening to take place in Dumfries with perfect equanimity.

Dr. Cameron

The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Lord Advocate had perfect confidence in the Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Courtney), and said that if the Excise Authorities had not seen fit to interfere he did not see how he was called upon to do so. However great might be the iniquity of the Excise Authorities, who seemed to do almost anything for money, he held that the Lord Advocate, as the Head of the Department which had to administer justice, was bound to obey and to administer the law; and it was no excuse for him to appeal to the Secretary to the Treasury. What he (Dr. Cameron) and others wanted was to see the law properly administered in these matters by the Lord Advocate and the Procurators Fiscal. Numerous instances had come under his notice in which the law had not been enforced by these officials. He had taken one case, in which there was no room for quibbling, and he asked the Lord Advocate why he had failed to put the law in operation in that case, and why he allowed shebeening to go on for six months even? For the purpose of bringing the matter to an issue, he moved to reduce the Vote by £670, being the amount of the salary of the Procurator Fiscal of Dumfries.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR) said, he understood that the case to which the hon. Member for Glasgow (Dr. Cameron) referred, was one which he brought under the notice of the House on two previous occasions by way of Question. If he (the Lord Advocate) recollected aright, it related to a hotel or inn called the "Ship" Hotel, at Dumfries. The facts, as far as they were present to his mind, were that the application for licence had been made in the usual way, when it appeared that, on the ground of minority, or some similar ground, the Licensing Magistrates did not feel that at that moment they should grant the licence to the applicant, but they unanimously recommended that the matter should be kept in a state of suspense, and, he thought, indicated that when the next licensing period came round they would grant the licence, they were so well satisfied of all the qualifications being possessed by the applicant. The point then came to be what course the Revenue authorities should follow—whether they should treat this as a case of what his hon. Friend (Dr. Cameron) had called “shebeening,” which he (the Lord Advocate) did not at all admit to be a correct description; or whether they had not the power to consider that, in the circumstances of a particular case it was intended to meet, it would not be an act of oppression to apply a stringent law? The Revenue authorities came to the conclusion that it would be stretching the law to put in force the power of suing for penalties in such a case. In that state of matters, he apprehended that the Procurator Fiscal was guilty of no neglect of duty—on the contrary, that he would have been guilty of something like improper meddlesomeness in a Revenue matter if, when the authorities who were more directly charged with the conduct of the Department said they considered this was not a proper case for a prosecution, it not being one, in their opinion, in which a statutory offence against the Inland Revenue had been committed, he had presumed to override the Department, and, against their directions and wish, instituted a prosecution. He (the Lord Advocate) was perfectly willing to leave it to the judgment of the House whether the Procurator Fiscal so acting was guilty of any wrong; or whether, where the Licensing Magistrates and the Department charged with the matter considered that it would not have been a right use of the statutory powers to apply them in such a case, there was anything blameworthy on the part of the Procurator Fiscal? As regarded the more general request which his hon. Friend (Dr. Cameron) had raised, and which he brought under the notice of the House on a previous occasion, he (the Lord Advocate) had nothing to add to what he then said. He then explained the plan on which the present Government, at all events, had been acting with regard to the appointment of Procurator Fiscals. His hon. Friend, he was afraid, forgot that this was a matter that stood on the Statute Law of the country. Procurators Fiscal were not appointed by the Government, but under an Act of Parliament only six or seven years old, by the Sheriff, and all the Home Secretary had to do was to give his assent or withhold it; in fact, he had a power of veto, but not a power of appointment. It was not an element in the qualification for a Procurator Fiscalship that the person should not engage in private practice. He knew that was a point as to which there was great difference of opinion. He was perfectly familiar with the recommendations, by no means unanimous, of the Crofters' Commission on the point. Anyone who had read and studied the Report must have been struck with certain weighty observations made by a very respectable and eminent Member of the House on that point. That hon. Gentleman called attention to the fact that it was only by some large interpretation of the Reference to the Commission that the Committee took cognizance of such matters as law and justice at all. He (the Lord Advocate) welcomed anything that came from that Commission; but, at the same time, he was not aware that the Commission took evidence on the point that they called before them those who were best qualified to give an opinion upon it; and it was impossible for anyone who was familiar with the course of inquiry into this branch of the administration of law to forget that a very influential Commission, composed of distinguished lawyers of the two countries, of chief magistrates of various burghs, of conveners of a number of counties, and of many of the most eminent and best informed laymen, reported so lately as 1871 against the restriction of Procurators Fiscal from private practice. That matter was now under the consideration of the Government, like all the other points in the Report of the Crofters' Commission; but he was not prepared, until the matter had been fully matured, to say that the Government would legislate against the recommendations of a Commission appointed to inquire into Law and Justice in Scotland because of the recommendations of another Commission, before which the matter had come only incidentally. The Government had always gone on the principle of seeing that the private duties of an official should never be allowed to come in collision with his public duties.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON said, he did not consider the answer of the Lord Advocate was at all satisfactory. He should like to know whether the man to whom his hon. Friend (Dr. Cameron) referred was selling drink illegally or not? If the man was selling drink illegally, who ought to see he did not continue to do so? He (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) asked this question, because whenever anybody in the House got up and tried to amend the law relating to the sale of drink, it was said—"Oh, the great thing is to carry out efficiently the laws that you have."

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR) said, that, as put by his hon. Friend the Member for Carlisle (Sir Wilfrid Lawson), there was a charming simplicity about the question, and he supposed the hon. Baronet wished a "Yes" or a "No" to it. This person was selling drink without a licence; but the licensing authority recommended that he should not be interfered with, and practically promised he should have a licence; and the Department of the Government charged with the administration of the matter said that the circumstances were not such as to warrant a prosecution. As to who was responsible, he should perhaps say that the Department was responsible. Whether they were right or wrong, he left the House to judge. It rather seemed to him that the suggestion involved in the question was, that if anybody was to be prosecuted it should not be the man, but somebody connected with the Department.

MR. FRASER-MACKINTOSH said, he was rather disappointed at the answer of the Lord Advocate with regard to Procurators Fiscal. The right hon. and learned Gentleman always showed a disposition to throw in their faces the fact that several years ago a Commission upon Law and Justice reported that the position of Procurators Fiscal should remain as it was; but the Lord Advocate must recollect that there was a very considerable minority in that Commission in favour of the change. In the recent Commission on the Highlands and Islands, five out of six Commissioners were perfectly unanimous for the change. Some years ago this question was brought to a Division in the House; and among those who voted for limiting the duties of Procurators Fiscal, were five Members of the present Administration, including the Secretary to the Treasury, the Home Secretary, and the Judge Advocate General. That Division took place years after the Commission, to which the Lord Advocate referred, reported. The Vote under consideration included the expenses of the whole of the administration of justice in Scotland, both civil and criminal; and, as he understood that the Lord Advocate was responsible for that administration, he wished to bring before the Committee two points—one affecting criminal and the other affecting civil law in Scotland. With reference to criminal administration, the Lord Advocate was assisted in his duties by four Advocates-Depute, appointed mainly, as commonly reported, for political services. Be that as it might, he wished to ask the right hon. Gentleman for an explanation of a very extraordinary case which recently occurred in the High Court of Justiciary. The parties accused of serious offences, from the counties of Orkney and Shetland, were obliged to appear in Edinburgh.

THE CHAIRMAN (MR. RAYNES): I must point out to the hon. Member, that although he is in Order in discussing any part of the present Vote at the present moment, he is not in Order in anticipating the next Vote, which includes the Court of Justiciary.

MR. FRASER-MACKINTOSH said, he was about to refer to the action of one of the Advocates-Depute whose salary was included in the present Vote. He was informed that in a recent case a great number of witnesses came up from the remote Islands of Orkney and Shetland—some for the Crown, and some for the prisoner. When the case was called, an objection was stated on behalf of the prisoner to the relevancy of the indictment. The Judges threw out the libel very summarily, indulging in some plain observations on its construction; and the consequence was that the whole matter fell to the ground, and that a great deal of expense fell upon the Crown and inconvenience upon the prisoner. He also understood that it was not an uncommon occurrence for criminal indictments framed by this Advocate to be cast; and, therefore, he should like to receive some explanation of the matter from the Lord Advocate. The next point to which he wished to refer was connected with Sheriff Courts. The Lord Advocate was aware, no doubt, that the question of double Sheriffships had been frequently brought before Parliament. It was complained by many persons that there was great expense and delay, and he was obliged, with great hesitation, to bring his own county (Inverness) before the attention of the Lord Advocate. He held in his hand a letter just received, with regard to his own county, in which the writer said—

“The state of our local Sheriff Court has become intolerable, and calls for immediate attention on the part of those at head-quarters. The Sheriff cannot be got to decide the cases before him, and most of the cases in Court are lying at avisandum—some of them for one year. This causes a great loss to the parties.”

Some years ago there used to be complaints that in the Supreme Courts of Scotland there were considerable delays; but of late years the despatch of the business in those Courts had been satisfactory. But with regard to the other Courts, where double Sheriffships prevailed, delays were becoming greater and greater.

MR. DICK-PEDDIE said, there could be no doubt that the selling of beer without a licence was clearly an illegal act. It was an illegal act under the Statute, and if an act were illegal, it could not be made legal by the Department condoning it. He would like a further explanation of this matter, because he understood it was one of the functions of a Procurator Fiscal to prosecute whenever an illegal act was committed. With regard to the complaint made by his hon. Friend (Mr. Fraser-Mackintosh) of dilatoriness on the part of the Sheriff of Inverness, he was bound to say that if there had been any dilatoriness, it, no doubt, arose from the circumstance, which was within his own knowledge, that the gentleman in question had been for several months in an indifferent state of health.

MR. KENNY said, one point struck him as being rather peculiar in connection with this Vote. The Committee would observe a discrepancy in line 3 of Page 263, which, he thought, ought to be explained or removed from the Estimate. He perceived that the First Clerk to the Crown Agent had a minimum salary of £500 a-year, and a maximum salary of £650, rising to that amount by an annual increment of £25. Now, the amount voted for this official last year was the minimum salary of £500, whereas the amount asked for this year was the maximum sum of £650. He should like to know how the amount of £125 paid in excess was accounted for?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (MR. J. B. BALFOUR) said, if there were no other reasons for the amount of salary asked for in this case than appeared on the face of the Estimate, the charge would, of course, be open to objection; but the gentleman who now occupied the position of First Clerk to the Crown Agent, did so with very great advantage to the public, and when, about six months ago, there was a re-arrangement in the Office, it was deemed right to make this addition to his salary.

MR. KENNY said the right hon. and learned Gentleman had not accounted for the excess.

THE LORD ADVOCATE (MR. J. B. BALFOUR) said, with respect to the points raised by the hon. Member for Inverness (Mr. Fraser-Mackintosh), he did not know on what authority or evidence he had arrived at the conclusion that the Advocates-Depute were appointed for political reasons, and not because of their fitness for the office. His experience of these gentlemen was that they were exceedingly well qualified for their office; and during the time he had held his present position, he had uniformly received from them the most devoted and valuable assistance in the duties of the Office. He hoped the hon. Member for Inverness did not want to cast any imputation upon them in respect of the manner in which they discharged their duties. The hon. Member had not indicated the particular Advocate-Depute to whom he referred; but he seemed to be under the impression that it was ground for complaint against a public official, that an indictment which he had framed or supported was found to be irrelevant—a thing which happened when the matter set out did not sustain a valid criminal charge. It must be evident to all concerned in the administration of the law in this country and in Scotland that there were very many acts which it was difficult to bring under the category of any particular crime. There was, consequently, great difficulty and nicety in framing an indictment, and indictments were often found irrelevant upon strictly technical rules of construction; acts had been committed which it would be a misfortune not to make the subjects of criminal charges, but with respect to which it was found on strict examination that an indictment would not hold. That was what hon. Members would see in the public Press every day, and he was satisfied that the mere fact of a particular charge having failed, was by no means evidence of any incompetence or carelessness on the part of those who were concerned in its preparation. He did not think his hon. Friend alleged that there was anything of that nature involved in this question; but he clearly appeared to think that the fact of the indictment having failed, constituted ground of complaint. However, he felt sure that, on reflection, his hon. Friend would feel that it was not so, and that it would appear to him that there was no ground for the suggestion which it seemed to him (the Lord Advocate) he was ready to make. With regard to the Sheriff Courts, the hon. Member had raised a question which everyone acquainted with the administration of the law in Scotland knew to be a very vexed and difficult one—that was to say, the question of double Sheriffship, and with regard to it he was compelled to differ from the view taken by his hon. Friend. But his hon. Friend must see that it was a very large question, and one involving many considerations, and with which Her Majesty's Government had no power to deal without an Act of Parliament. He quite agreed that there were many matters connected with the administration and with the framework of the judicial system which did admit of remedy, and if there were more Parliamentary time, he thought such remedial legislation would be a very fitting subject to take up. But at the present time the double Sheriffship did exist; and although he could not say he was particularly favourable to it himself, still it was a point on which there was considerable divergence of opinion. But he did not see, looking at the present state of Public Business, that Her Majesty's Government had any means of making immediate proposals to Parliament on the subject. Again, his hon. Friend had read a letter which seemed to reflect on the Sheriff-Principal of the county of Inverness. He could only say that he had known that gentleman for many years—since the time he (the Lord Advocate) came to the Bar, and previously—and he had never, until that time, heard any suggestion made against him of the nature which he understood to be implied by the statement of his hon. Friend. The delay alleged in this case was perfectly new to him; he had never heard of it before; and having known the gentleman in question for so many years, it was not what he should have expected, nor was he prepared to accept it on a mere passage from a letter which, in his judgment, was insufficient to sustain a complaint of this kind. If there existed any ground for the complaint made, and if the allegation was made in a formal manner, the matter would be investigated. For his own part, he had no doubt that an explanation would be forthcoming of the delay which might have occurred. He was bound to add his belief that the Committee would not expect him to say more than this, having, as he had already pointed out, full knowledge of the personal character of this gentleman, as well as the devotion with which he had discharged his duties. There was no doubt that the Sheriff Courts in Scotland had been generally very efficiently administered, and he did not think there had been much delay in the transaction of their business, although there might, of course, have been some special cases. He believed that they had shared in the spirit of despatch which his hon. Friend admitted to have very largely pervaded the Supreme Courts during recent years.

DR. CAMERON said, the Lord Advocate had told the Committee that the proposal of the Crofters' Commission, with regard to the form of appointment of Procurators Fiscal, was under consideration by Her Majesty's Government, upon which he would remark that the proposal had been under consideration for a long time, and that it would be, in his opinion, considerably longer before anything was done to give effect to it. When the Conservatives came into Office, the Lord Advocate would, probably, be ready to deal with the matter, and he would be found, no doubt, supported by the Secretary to the Treasury, the Home Secretary, the Judge Advocate General and others, who would have nothing to say to it when they sat on that side of the House. With regard to the licensing question which had been raised, it appeared to him that the Government acted on the principle on which "Messrs. Spenlow and Jorkins" conducted their business. Deputations innumerable came up to London to see the Lord Advocate. They were received with the utmost politeness; they were assured that nothing was more at the heart of the Government than the carrying out of the legislation thought to be necessary; that none more bitterly deplored the present state of things; and that none were more anxious to give effect to the heart-felt desires of those persons who wished to free themselves from this curse of drink. Thus, the deputation afterwards went away satisfied for the time being. But, to return to his illustration, it was found that "Mr. Spenlow was perfectly willing that the law should be given effect to, but—there is Mr. Jorkins!" And Mr. Jorkins, in this instance, was personified by the Secretary to the Treasury. Of course, he and his hon. Friends could not carry out the law; it was the business of Parliament to make laws; and when a law was made with the most deliberate intention by Parliament, it was the business of the Government to administer that law. The Government were very ready in making promises to the supporters of the Permissive Bill; but it appeared to him that, in this instance, they had been a Permissive Bill unto themselves, having granted this licence in spite of all they could have done to prevent it. On that account, he should take a Division on his Amendment for the reduction of the Vote.

MR. KENNY said, he did not agree with hon. Gentlemen from Scotland opposite, because he believed there was a very wide difference between the case of the individual in question and that of the shebeen man. The difference was that whereas the shebeen man sold liquor without any licence whatever, this individual had received permission to sell liquor. Under those circumstances he did not think he ought to be prosecuted. He was a man who went to the authorities and asked for a licence, and it was said they refused to give him the licence—if so, it was a great shame—but the Excise Department took no steps to interfere with his selling liquor. Therefore, he could not support the Motion of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Glasgow (Dr. Cameron) for the reduction of the Vote by the amount of the salary of the Procurator Fiscal of Dumfries. He observed on Page 254 of the Estimates a charge of £1,100 for the Sheriff of Lanarkshire for salaries of criminal officers in Glasgow. He also observed that there was no Vote under this head last year, and, therefore, he would like to know what this new charge was for, and what were the functions of the so-called criminal officers in Glasgow?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR) said, the question of the hon. Member for Ennis (Mr. Kenny) was very fairly raised on this Vote, and the explanation was simply this—that formerly these officers were paid by fees, but latterly every opportunity which presented itself for commuting those fees for fixed salaries had been availed of, and the consequence was the present charge for the salaries of criminal officers at Glasgow. The alteration was one which he believed the Committee would approve.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON said, as the Committee could get no satisfaction out of the Lord Advocate, they might, perhaps, get something out of the Secretary to the Treasury. He would be glad to hear whether that hon. Gentleman approved this breaking of the Law of Excise at Dumfries? His hon. Friends and himself did not want to divide on the Motion of the hon. Member for Glasgow, if they could get an assurance that the law would be carried out. His hon. Friend had told the Committee that this sort of thing was perpetually coming up in Scotland. [The LORD ADVOCATE dissented.] The Lord Advocate shook his head, which showed that he had a bad case. The way the authorities had dealt with the licence in this case reminded him of the old barrel that used to be kept until the heir came of age. The Lord Advocate would only allow the licence to be used when this individual had reached the age of 21. However, he relied much on the Secretary to the Treasury to clear up the difficulty. He desired to put two questions. Was it legal for this young man to be selling drink at the present time? If not, who was responsible for his not being prosecuted?

MR. ILLINGWORTH said, the position taken up by the Government seemed to be that when a young man came of age he should have a licence to sell liquor, and that before he came of age he should have every opportunity of breaking the law. [The LORD ADVOCATE dissented.] The Lord Advocate shook his head, as much as to say that the matter was a very simple one. But a principle of importance was involved, and he should have thought that the state of affairs which had been disclosed would be insupportable in Scotland after the statement of the Lord Advocate. For his own part, he could not see why his hon. Friends on those Benches should be called upon to lower their flag at all; he thought they were bound to go to a Division, otherwise they would be parties to this lax administration of the law. If this young man were to be allowed to sell liquor for profit without a licence, he would like to know where the matter would end. He was bound to say that the right hon. and learned Gentleman had, by his statement on this question, laid himself open to considerable comment. It was of such a character that he hoped his hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow (Dr. Cameron) would divide the Committee on his Motion.

MR. KENNY said, with regard to the payment of the Procurators Fiscal by fees, that he should have expected the Estimate would show exactly the amount of fees in excess of the amounts asked for last year.

MR. COURTNEY pointed out that, in consequence of the present arrangement, the salaries appeared as diminishing, and the fees as increasing.

MR. JOSEPH COWEN said, that if the case at Dumfries were exceptional, he thought it might be passed over; but if it were not, the matter assumed a very different form, and it was most important that some steps should be taken.

THE LORD ADVOCATE (MR. J. B. BALFOUR) said, it was only right to say that his information about this case had come to him exclusively in reply to his inquiries. The case had never been reported to his Department, and he knew nothing about it until, in consequence of Questions in that House, he caused inquiries to be made, with the result stated. That information he had laid before the Committee. He never knew another case like it. He had nothing whatever to do with licences, or the supervision of publicans, or anybody else.

MR. COURTNEY said, he was not at all aware that this was a customary case; he looked upon it, on the contrary, as distinctly abnormal. With respect to the observations of the hon. Member for Carlisle (Sir Wilfrid Lawson), the hon. Baronet knew perfectly well that he was not responsible for the administration of the Law of Licence. He was responsible, to a certain extent, for the collection of the money paid for licences.

DR. CAMERON said, he could assure the Committee that this was not an exceptional case; he should, therefore, go to a Division on his Amendment as a protest against the acquiescence of the legal authorities in the infraction of the law. Last year he had asked Questions with regard to three similar cases in Fraserburgh; and this year, also, he had asked a Question with regard to a case of the kind at Bellshill. Nor were these all the cases that had been brought to his attention, although he had not thought it necessary to make every one of them the subject of a Question in that House. They were of far more frequent occurrence than might be supposed, in spite of the elaborate system of Rules laid down to prevent the sale of liquor without licence; and he felt bound to express his regret and surprise that the Questions he had put in that House had made so little impression upon the Members of the Government to whom they were addressed.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 19; Noes 58: Majority 39.—(Div. List, No. 184.)

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(4.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £42,657, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1886, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Courts of Law and Justice in Scotland, and other Legal Charges."

MR. FRASER-MACKINTOSH said, he desired to have an explanation from the Lord Advocate of one item in this Vote—namely, £350 for the Deputy Keeper of the Signet. Some 20 years ago, a professional man in Edinburgh of great practice was appointed Keeper of the Register of Sasines. This appointment was considered so objectionable, in view of the great private practice of the person appointed, that in the year

1868 an Act of Parliament was passed regulating the registration of writs in Scotland, and by Section 20 of the 30 & 31 Vict. c. 64, it was declared that when the office of Keeper of the Register of Sasines became vacant, the next person appointed should hold no other place, either by himself or by deputy. Now, a few years ago, on the death of the holder of the office of the Deputy Keeper of the Signet, a new appointment was made; and who was the person appointed? The House would be surprised to hear that the very individual was appointed who, by the Act of 1868, was declared, inferentially, not to be a suitable person. He understood the patronage of the office rested with the Lord Clerk Register, and not with the Crown; but he wished to know whether, seeing that the Act of 1868 showed that the person who held the office of Keeper of the Register of Sasines had occupation enough to do to keep that office alone, and that some years afterwards he was selected for a second post—he wished to know whether the Lord Advocate or the Crown did, or did not, make any objection to the appointment of this official, and whether or not it was competent now for them to refuse to pay any salary for the service?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR) said, he was not aware that the Crown either did or could make any objection to this appointment; and he could only say that, even if it had been in the power of the Crown to make any such objection, if the case had been represented to him he should have advised the Crown not to make it, because the Act referred to did not relate to this matter, but pointed to cases where difference of opinion existed, and provided that, in future, holders of the office of Keeper of the Register of Sasines should not be engaged in private practice. That Act did not, however, make any provision with respect to the present holder. As his hon. Friend (Mr. Fraser-Mackintosh) had made reference to that gentleman, he (the Lord Advocate) could only say that, in the opinion of everyone acquainted with the services he had rendered to the important Department with which he was connected, those services had been most valuable to the Office. A great many changes which had been made in the system of registering and for giving additional security to the Scotch system of land rights and additional facilities for the searching of those rights, were due to this gentleman. He (the Lord Advocate) did not know whether it was suggested that this gentleman holding the office of Deputy Keeper of the Signet interfered with his proper discharge of the duties of Keeper of the Register of Sasines; but it was certain that such was not the case.

MR. FRASER-MACKINTOSH: May I ask the Lord Advocate if this gentleman discharges the duties of this office in person? Does he ever go near the Office?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR): This gentleman does discharge his duties in person most certainly.

MR. FRASER-MACKINTOSH: I mean the duties of Deputy Keeper of the Signet?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR): I am not aware of that—I am not so well acquainted with the duties of the Deputy Keeper of the Signet. I should not, however, think them particularly onerous. These duties the present holder of the office, I understand, has discharged with efficiency and great success.

DR. CAMERON said, he thought it would, perhaps, be worth the while of the Secretary to the Treasury to look into the matter, and see whether there was any necessity to pay a salary of £350 a-year for a Deputy Keeper of the Signet. Probably that £350 a-year might be saved to the State. The point, however, he (Dr. Cameron) wished more particularly to call attention to was in connection with the office of Extractor. There had been numerous complaints in this matter. The duty of the Extractor was to extract judgments.

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR): I rather think my hon. Friend is about to refer to another Extractor—not to the one affected by this Vote.

DR. CAMERON: I rather think the salary of the one I wish to refer to comes under this Vote.

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR): No; it comes under another Vote.

DR. CAMERON said, he thought he was right in the matter. He wished to refer to the Extractor of the Court of

Session. The Extractor to whom he was referring was complained of very seriously by solicitors and litigants, who complained that they could not get their extracts out of him. Having got their judgments, they were kept a long time, under one plea or another, waiting for what they wanted. There was another complaint. A gentleman who, at one time, was in the Office, had gone very minutely into the whole working of the Extractor's Office, and had compiled a specific list of many hundreds of cases, showing that, in the case of a large percentage of the extracts procured by the public, a charge was made more than the statutory charge. In cases where a number of extracts were taken, the over-charge was considerable. Well, the law provided that if any circumstances of that kind were brought under the notice of the Lord Advocate, there should be a clean sweep made; but specific cases of these over-charges had been brought under the notice of the Lord Advocate by himself (Dr. Cameron), who had told him that the man who had given him his information had been dismissed from the Office under circumstances which were not creditable. He (Dr. Cameron) knew nothing about this man who had drawn up the list of cases. The statement of the Lord Advocate was altogether disputed by him; but, however accurate the right hon. and learned Gentleman might be, it had nothing whatever to do with the question. In the list there were a large number of cases—hundreds of cases given, chapter and verse. Either these allegations were true, or they were not true, and a reference to the books of the Department ought to enable a calculation to be made to show whether there had been over-charges made or not. He (Dr. Cameron) contended that it was in the public interest, and their duty to the public, for those in authority to see whether over-charges were made in connection with any Public Office, and where they were found to exist to put an end to them at once. In addition to this matter of over-charging, he was told that this office of Extractor was one which could well be dispensed with. Unless he had been misinformed, nothing analogous to it existed in England. It was a drawback against litigants enforcing their rights. He was not aware of the precise method adopted in England, but he was assured that it was quite as satisfactory as the Scotch. Before moving a reduction in the Vote, he should like to hear what explanation the right hon. and learned Gentleman might have to offer on the three points he had mentioned—namely, the over-charges, the delays, and the absence of necessity for the office?

THE CHAIRMAN (Mr. RAIKES): The hon. Member has not moved the reduction of the Vote.

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR) said, that, no doubt, various questions had been raised as to the office of Extractor, whose duty was to draw up copies of the decrees of justice. No doubt, there had been various complaints and questions raised as to the administration of the Office, and, so far from these complaints not having been effective, they were made the subject of careful examination by the officials of the Treasury and the Crown Agent acting under his direction, so that the matter had been fully gone into. There did appear to have been some irregularities; but he did not think there had been any clear defalcations except on the part of the person whom his hon. Friend (Dr. Cameron) spoke of as his informant in the matter.

DR. CAMERON: No; not my informant.

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR) said, that, at any rate, this person had been proved to have been guilty of very grave defalcations—defalcations which the Extractor, with great kindness, perhaps, with too great kindness, had overlooked at the time. Then followed the charges to which the hon. Gentleman had referred; but, so far from this person having any cause of complaint, if the Extractor was to blame at all, it was for having treated him with undue leniency. This person had commenced an action in the Courts against the Extractor, but, seemingly, had not gone on with it. The hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury would bear him (Dr. Cameron) out when he said that, both on the part of the Treasury and his own part, full inquiry had been made into the Extractor's Office, and they had come to the conclusion that the public had no reason to complain in regard to defalcations.

DR. CAMERON said, the Lord Advocate told them there were defalcations in the Extractor's Office in consequence of which the gentleman whom the right hon. and learned Gentleman designated as his (Dr. Cameron's) informant was dismissed. Now, in the first place, the gentleman in question altogether denied the Lord Advocate's statement; and, in the second place, he was not his (Dr. Cameron's) informant. This gentleman had published a volume giving instances in which these over-charges occurred. The Lord Advocate had been questioned about the over-charges, and he said they rested on the statement of the dismissed official. It did not matter whom the charges were made by—whether by Ananias and Sapphira, or anyone else. Chapter and verse of the defalcations were given. The amounts the Office was entitled to charge under the Statute were given, and the amounts actually charged were set forth. The Lord Advocate had not promised to make any investigation into the matter at the time the disclosure was made, and he had not told them whether he had since made any investigation into the specific charges. These were not the matters in regard to which the person who had given the information had been dismissed. If this man had had anything to do with these things, it was not likely that he would have published his defalcations to the world. At any rate, if he had done so, he should have been punished. The dismissal was owing to a dispute between the person dismissed and the Extractor. Personally, he (Dr. Cameron) had not investigated the matter. That duty devolved upon the Lord Advocate. He was bound by Statute to look into the charges, and yet he had not said that he had looked into them. He (Dr. Cameron) did not wish to go into the dispute between this man and the Extractor; but desired simply to know whether the list of alleged over-charges had been investigated, and whether anything had been done to punish the individuals who made them, and to prevent over-charge in future?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR) said, he was not in a position to say whether all the particular instances alleged in the pamphlet which this gentleman had published had been gone into individually; but he knew that, with this document and other documents before them, the Treasury officials and the Crown Agent had made the best investigation into the matter they could. There did seem, so far as supervision was concerned, that there had been a certain amount of laxity in looking after the work of subordinate clerks. There had, however, been nothing discovered reflecting on the integrity and honour of the Extractor. So far as he (the Lord Advocate) knew, the only person against whom defalcations appeared to be established was the gentleman the hon. Member referred to. He (the Lord Advocate) had not gone fully into the question of the dismissal. The man denied that he was dismissed on account of the alleged defalcations about which he had given information, and he (the Lord Advocate) did not say he was; but it was, nevertheless, the fact that this person had been guilty of defalcations to a very considerable extent.

DR. CAMERON said, the right hon. and learned Gentleman had again entirely evaded the point. As the volume of over-charges referred to had not been published until after the man was dismissed, it was impossible that he could have been discharged in consequence of an investigation into the over-charges. Every question he (Dr. Cameron) had put had been evaded. It appeared to him that, in the interests of justice, the Lord Advocate, on whom the statutory duty devolved, should look into the matter. The right hon. and learned Gentleman said that, if anyone had been wronged, he should have proceeded against the Extractor. Imagine a man who had been over-charged to the extent of 10*s.* bringing an action to recover the amount. Winking at these over-charges, and permitting them, was a scandal, and he should therefore, move to reduce the Vote by the sum of £500, being the salary of the principal Extractor.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £42,157, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1885, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Courts of Law and Justice in Scotland, and other Legal Charges."—(Dr. Cameron.)

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 23; Noes 59: Majority 36.—(Div. List, No. 185.)

Original Question again proposed.

MR. KENNY asked for an Explanation of the item of £1,000 for "Expenses of agents attending to the interests of the Crown." It appeared from this Vote that the Crown appointed the agents, and paid them out of the Consolidated Fund. Further on there was a sum of £450 for "Costs and expenses recovered from the Office of Woods in actions to which the Crown is a party;" and, again, under the heading "Law Agents' bills of charges," £1,000 for the Office of Woods. Perhaps, the Lord Advocate would explain these items?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR) said, the £1,000 was the solicitor's charges in certain civil actions. The Agents for Woods and Forests were charged for separately.

MR. RAMSAY said, he voted in the minority in the recent Division with considerable reluctance, because he had hitherto believed that the administration of justice in Scotland was free from the shadow of suspicion. He felt that when charges were made against individuals or Departments employed in the administration of justice, the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Lord Advocate should, whether he was bound by statutory obligations resting upon him or not, in the interest of the public, make such investigations as to whether the individuals or Departments charged were free from the suspicion of defalcations of any kind. It did not appear to him that the right hon. and learned Gentleman had given a satisfactory explanation of the various delays which had taken place in the various Departments connected with the Supreme Court. He felt that any undue delay in any one Department should, in the public interest, be satisfactorily explained. He felt that when any aspersions were cast upon the administration of justice, the Lord Advocate should not rest satisfied until he had obtained full satisfaction in his own mind that the whole administration was perfectly pure, and, as he (Mr. Ramsay) said, free from the shadow of suspicion. He did not regret having voted, apparently, against the right hon. Gentleman, because he failed to see that the right hon. Gentleman gave a satisfactory explanation either as to the delays he (Mr. Ramsay) had referred to, or as to the defalcations which the right hon. Gentleman himself admitted had occurred, and which were a disgrace to the administration of justice in their country.

Mr. Kenny

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR) said, he fully accepted the responsibility for the duty of making an investigation into such a matter as that alleged; and he thought he stated that he did make an investigation, and that the Treasury, for their own purposes, also made an investigation at the same time. The result of his investigation was, that there did appear to have been some delay in the extracting of judgments on the part of subordinate clerks; but certainly nothing derogatory attached to the integrity or the honour of the gentleman who held the office of Extractor. There had been a certain amount of complaint with regard to the delay, and that was one of the matters investigated. Complaint was also made of delay in the extracting of deeds. The extracting of deeds, however, belonged to the Lord Clerk Register's Department, a Department for which he was in no sense responsible.

MR. ANDERSON asked what was the meaning of the item for investigating Peerages? Was it not the fact that gentlemen who claimed Peerages had to make their own investigations, and pay the cost of such investigations?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR) said, that since he had held the Office he had now the honour to hold, there had not been any charge under this head that had actually come against the Crown, because there had not been any Scotch Peerage cases during the last two or three years; but it had always been the practice, both in England and Scotland, for those who represented the Crown, which was the fountain of honour, to see that any claims which were made to Peerages in either country were not allowed to pass unless they were satisfied that the claims had been made out. Accordingly, it had always been the custom that, in Peerage cases in the House of Lords, the Attorney General in the case of England, and the Lord Advocate in the case of Scotland, had appeared in fulfilment of their duty as representing the Crown, from which all honours flowed. He had never had the honour of appearing in such a case; but if a claim to a Scotch Peerage came to be made, it would be the duty of the Crown Solicitors to make certain investigations, so that the Crown might be advised whether the claim was well-founded or not; and the Committee of Privileges, when they came to hear a Peerage case, always expected that counsel representing the Crown should sum up the case, and indicate whether the Committee ought or ought not to grant the title.

MR. RAMSAY said, he should like the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Lord Advocate to say who was responsible for the provision of such an adequate staff as would secure that there should be no delay in any Department with regard to deeds or extracts of deeds? Perhaps the right hon. and learned Gentleman might tell him that it was the Treasury, and not himself personally, who was responsible for the appointment of such a staff as would guard against undue delay. If the Treasury was responsible, the injustice was more aggravated, because the people of Scotland paid fees adequate to secure despatch.

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR) said, the last question of his hon. Friend (Mr. Ramsay) related not to the Vote applicable to Law and Justice, but to the Vote relative to the Register House. As a matter of fact, it was the Treasury and the Registrar General's Department who were responsible. He did not feel competent to go fully into the subject; but he might point out that it would not be quite just to assume that wherever there was delay there was necessarily blame, because there were certain functions requiring to be performed both in the writing up of registers and in the making of extracts, which, from their very nature, prevented more than a certain number of persons being employed on the work simultaneously. The work would be done, he was sure, with all due despatch, and whatever staff was necessary would be employed.

MR. ARTHUR ARNOLD wished to ask a question with reference to a Department in which he had taken considerable interest—namely, that of Woods and Forests. He noticed that in this Vote there was a charge of £1,000 for "Law Agents' bills of charges for the Office of Woods and Forests." He was speaking from memory; but he thought he was quite correct in saying that the Crown Woods and Forests in Scotland were confined to six farms in Caithness. Was it possible that, under such circumstances, there should be a charge of £1,000 for law agents' charges?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR) said, that all the Crown fisheries and teinds, and such things, in Scotland came under this head. It would be satisfactory to the hon. Member (Mr. Arthur Arnold) to know that the law charges of the Department had very largely diminished of late years. There was less litigation than formerly.

MR. ARTHUR ARNOLD said, that fisheries could not come under the head of Woods and Forests.

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR) said, the public fisheries did not, but the Crown salmon fisheries certainly did; and many of the greatest questions that had arisen in the Department had related to salmon fisheries, and also to foreshores.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, the Lord Advocate had not explained how the £1,000 for expenses of agents attending to the interests of the Crown was distributed. All he had given the Committee to understand was, although some years ago a good portion of the money went for investigating Peerage claims, of late years no such work had been done. If that was the case, the Government could not want all the money, and it would be fair to move a reduction of the Vote for that reason alone. But with regard to the Office of Woods, the explanation of the Lord Advocate did not appear to explain anything. They found that £450 was set down for office work in the Office of Woods; but three lines above that £1,000 was charged for the Office of Woods. It would occur to anybody that if £1,000 was charged for the Office of Woods, and if costs and expenses were recovered to the amount of £450, that £450 might well come out of the £1,000; but, instead of that, it was added to it. There must be an error there. If there was not, then an explanation was wanted. Perhaps the right hon. and learned Gentleman could give the Committee further information?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR) said, the hon. Member for Queen's County (Mr. Arthur O'Connor) would see that the £1,000 was followed by £500 for "other departments." Then there was an estimated reduction for probable amount to be recovered within the year of £300, and that brought the estimate down to £1,200. The estimate did not seem to him to suggest the difficulty which occurred to the hon. Gentleman.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, that if the £300 was deducted, and the £450 was charged on the very same account, there must be, according to the right hon. and learned Gentleman's own showing, an error of £150.

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR) said, the hon. Member must see that the £300 was set down as the probable amount to be recovered during the year, while the £400 was an absolute charge.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, these were estimates, and not actual sums at all, they were dealing with, and the Lord Advocate had not said how it was he asked for £1,000 for agents, the need for whose services he himself admitted no longer existed.

MR. KENNY said, this was a case which the Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Courtney) would, no doubt, understand. Perhaps he would explain it to the Committee?

MR. COURTNEY pointed out that the amounts recovered were put down in diminution of the sums charged. As to the "expenses of agents attending to the interests of the Crown," the item varied from year to year; it varied to a large extent from the want of regular recurrence of Peerage claims. For instance, the item charged under this head in 1868 was £2,337; in 1879, £648; in 1880, £1,212; and in 1882, £2,609. In that year there were two Peerage claims, including the Annandale case. It was hoped that £1,000 would cover the expenses during the next year. If any expenses were not incurred, of course, the money would not be paid.

MR. ANDERSON said, he did not think the hon. Gentleman's (Mr. Courtney's) answer was quite clear. £300 was set down as the probable amount which would be recovered, and it was deducted; but £450 was the amount actually recovered, and that was charged.

MR. COURTNEY said, that the true explanation of the matter was that in the one case the recovery was from the Crown, and in the other case against the Crown.

MR. RAMSAY said, he had always understood that those who inherited Peerages were made to pay certain sums for the honours they acquired. Why should they not pay this £1,000? He did not see any reason why the expenses connected with the investigation of Peerage claims should fall as a charge on the public. The public took no interest in the Peerages, and, therefore, they should not be required to pay any expenses connected with their investigation.

MR. COURTNEY said, he believed that if a debit and credit account were made out, it would be found that the fees paid by the persons claiming Peerages would very much exceed the fees which were paid to the Law Officers for conducting the investigations. It must be obvious to his hon. Friend (Mr. Ramsay) that when a person made a claim to a Peerage which had been in abeyance, it was necessary that some public officer should attend and watch the case on behalf of the Crown. It could not be expected that the applicant should pay the expenses of his enemy as well as his own.

Question put, and agreed to.

(5.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

MR. FRASER-MACKINTOSH said, the administration of the Register House excited a great deal of interest in Edinburgh. There were several grievances in connection with that administration which he would endeavour to explain as briefly as possible. A few years ago, the clerks and other officials in the Register House, Edinburgh, were made Civil servants, and the charge for them put upon the Treasury. Amongst the arrangements that were made, first, second and third class clerks were created. As to the first class clerks, he had no observation to make; but in respect to the second and third class clerks, the complaint of the third class clerks was, that while their rate of remuneration was very much below that of second class clerks, their duties were decidedly the same. In answer to a Question he (Mr. Mackintosh) put some time ago, the Lord Advocate stated that the duties of the two classes were analogous, but that the quality of the work was much better in the one case than in the other. While the second class clerks began at £170 and rose to £240, the third class clerks commenced at £90 and increased to £160. The second class clerks were 12 in number, and the third class 63. The latter thought that, as they had to perform exactly the same duties as the second class clerks, they were very improperly and unfairly treated. He thought it was a matter which ought to be dealt with by the Treasury. The engrossing clerks, also, had a grievance. Those clerks were only paid for the work they did, and he believed that in the aggregate something like £8,000 was paid them. They did important work, because accuracy in the engrossment of the public records was most essential. Some time ago, these clerks sent a Memorial to the Lords Commissioners of the Treasury in which they set forth the most depressing effect which certain recent regulations had had upon them. Amongst others, it was stated that an errors' book was kept, and the result of the audit had been that since the beginning of the year every engrossing clerk had been fined from one month's to 10 weeks' salary. Recently an order had been issued threatening even a more severe punishment; and the Memorialists complained that the suspicions and threatening had a very demoralizing influence upon them, and made them work in daily fear. Now, this was a lamentable state of matters to have in any Public Office. Some of the clerks were obliged to work sometimes 70 hours a-week, and yet their payment was not greater than that made to similar clerks 60 or 70 years ago. He held it was the duty of the Treasury to look into the grievances of these clerks without delay. Another point he had to bring under the notice of the Committee was that the fees for searches charged in the Register House were much larger than necessary, and outsiders took up the business and undersold the Government. It was of importance that the Treasury should look into this matter, and consider whether or not they should any longer permit these high charges to be made, or, on the other hand, should permit outside people to make use of the public records at a very small charge. A further point was that for a great number of years the receipts in this Office had far exceeded the expenses. In the last 10 years, nearly £40,000 had been taken from the pockets of the proprietors of land and houses in Scotland, while the expenses had not reached nearly that amount. Complaints had been made to the Treasury upon this subject, and a Departmental inquiry had been made, but the result had not been satisfactory; and he thought that an inquiry by a Select Committee of that House was the only way of properly dealing with the matter, and no other would be satisfactory to the public, or those more immediately concerned.

Mr. J. A. CAMPBELL said, that he had much pleasure in supporting the complaint put forward by his hon. Friend opposite. The grievances of the clerks of the Sasines Office had been frequently brought before the public in recent years, and always in a quiet and temperate manner. He (Mr. J. A. Campbell) thought that the patience and moderation which the clerks of this Office had shown in prosecuting their complaints entitled them to favourable consideration. It was impossible to exaggerate the importance of the Sasines Office to the public; and it was certainly a serious matter that so large a proportion of the staff should be discontented and feel that they had serious grounds for complaint against the Government. The hon. Member for Inverness (Mr. Fraser-Mackintosh) had referred to the number of the third class clerks. These clerks numbered no less than 63, while there were only 12 second class clerks; so that the 63 third class clerks saw little prospect of promotion into the second class. While their remuneration was very much less than that given to the second class clerks, their work was of equal importance. In a Memorial which they presented they stated that the work of the two classes was absolutely the same. It would be seen by reference to the Estimates that the third class clerks began at £90 a-year, and reached no higher salary than £160 a-year, which was £10 less than the minimum salary of second class clerks. In the Treasury Minute, dated March 8th, something like a promise had been made to these third class clerks that their case should be considered, it being stated that the number of the second class clerks would be subjected to revision hereafter when experience had shown to what proportion of the staff it would be necessary to intrust work which they at present performed. These clerks looked upon that as indicating a probability, although it was not an absolute promise, that their case would be reconsidered before much time had elapsed. They felt that now sufficient experience had been obtained of the working of the Office to enable the Treasury to come to a decision upon their Memorial, and what they asked for was a public inquiry such as was held some years ago with regard to the Deeds Office in Ireland. The hon. Member opposite had also referred to clerks who were described in the Estimates as copyists. Their grievance was that, owing to changes adopted by the Keeper of the Register of Sasines, their power of obtaining emoluments had been reduced, new duties having been imposed upon them which interfered with their opportunities of earning money. Their present rate of pay was the same as it was 70 years ago, but owing to the changes made in the Department they could now only earn 4*d.* for an amount of work for which they formerly received sixpence. The consequence was, that in order to earn a decent livelihood they had to work from 60 to 70 hours a-week. Some time ago there were serious frauds committed in this Office, which were traced to some of the engrossing clerks. It was impossible, of course, to excuse fraud; but, at the same time, when a fraud was committed by an under-paid servant, there was some ground for reflection on the employer as well. The public confidence in this Office had been considerably shaken by the frauds he had referred to, and a very serious reflection was cast upon the general management of the Office. He had no intention of throwing blame on the highly respectable and able gentleman who was Keeper of this Office. He was a man of first-rate position, and great ability, and had introduced many improvements in the administration of the Office. But there was this serious defect, that, being a gentleman in large private practice, he could not devote very much time to the Keepership. He would not say that it might not be the right thing to have a man of his position at the head of the Office, but he would say that if it was, there ought to be a Deputy Keeper also, a professional man of high standing, who could give the whole of his time to the duties of the Office. In answer to the possible objection that this would involve an additional charge, he would repeat what the hon. Member for Inverness had stated, that the Office yielded to Government a large profit—he believed of from £8,000 to £10,000 a-year. There was, therefore, no reason whatever for sparing expense in order to have the work of the Office thoroughly and efficiently done. But in urging on the Government that the Memorial of these clerks should receive favourable consideration, and that a public inquiry into the whole condition and management of this Office should be held, he desired to say that that would be the shortest and the best way of restoring public confidence.

MR. ANDERSON said, that, in supporting what the hon. Member for Inverness had stated, he would like to add that these engrossing clerks had not only complained of the time their duties occupied, but that they were not in any way on the permanent staff. They might go on year after year, but they had no hope of being taken on to the permanent staff. In former years, the permanent staff was open to them; but they were now absolutely debarred from being taken into the third class of clerks, and so from being placed on the permanent staff. That was a great hardship upon them. There was nothing to distinguish them from the other clerks, and there was no reason why they should not have these means of promotion open to them if they were able to pass a Civil Service examination. Some of them, possibly, would not be able to do that, but at least they ought to have the opportunity; and he thought that when vacancies occurred in the third class, preference should be given to these engrossing clerks.

MR. DICK-PEDDIE reminded the Committee that, two years ago, he brought the grievances of these clerks before the House. The grievances of the third class clerks had been well stated by the hon. Member for Inverness, but they had not been stated so fully as they should be. Their chief grievance was not so much that their salaries were inadequate when compared with those of the second class clerks, as that they were inadequate when compared with those of clerks in all other branches of the Civil Service. In this connection it might be well to compare the Register House in Edinburgh with the Registry of Deeds in Ireland. The latter Office contained only 45 first, second, and third class clerks, whose salaries amounted to £12,585; while in the Sasine Department of the Register House in Edinburgh there were 83 clerks, whose salaries amounted to £13,115. If the clerks in Edinburgh were paid at the same rate as the Irish clerks, their salaries should amount to £22,672. The work in the Edinburgh Office was of a very superior kind compared with that in the Dublin Office. In the Edinburgh Office the clerks registered in the public records a great variety of writs affecting land in Scotland, and on the accuracy of those records depended the validity of all titles to land in that country. They were not only required to pass Civil Service examinations, but had to go through a good deal of legal training, and many of them had attended the legal course in the University. In Ireland no such qualification was required. The only qualification there was the passing the Civil Service examination. But the Scotch clerks, doing much more onerous work than those in Ireland, were paid less than two-thirds of the amount paid for inferior work in the Irish Office. In the Sasine Office it was the duty of the third class clerks to prepare minutes of all the deeds presented for registration. In Ireland these minutes were prepared by the solicitors of the persons whose deeds were presented, and thus a large expense fell on the clients of these solicitors from which persons presenting deeds for registration in Scotland were exempt. While all classes of clerks in the Register House in Edinburgh were paid on a much lower scale than that on which the clerks in the Irish Registry of Deeds were paid, the third class clerks in Edinburgh had a special ground for complaint. Not only was the scale of their pay very low, but their chances of promotion were very small. In the Irish Office the third class clerks had a salary beginning at £90 and rising by annual increments of £10 to £170. In the Scottish Office the salary also began at £90, but it rose by annual increments of only £5 to £160. But in Ireland the second and third class clerks were nearly equal in numbers, while in Scotland the second class clerks were 12 in number, and the third class clerks 60. The result was that in Scotland the third class clerks, doing exactly the same work as the second class, had but little chance of promotion, and could hardly look to get into the second class until after 25 to 30 years of service. It might be said that the Irish clerks were overpaid, and that their being so was no reason for overpaying the Scotch clerks; but he did not think the Irish clerks were overpaid, and the Financial Secretary had not, when the Vote was discussed, two years ago, ventured to say that they were. He (Mr. Dick-Peddie) believed that they were underpaid. When he brought this matter forward, two years ago, the Financial Secretary to the Treasury stated, as a justification for this low rate of pay, that the Government could easily find other persons able and willing to do this work at the same rate. If they were to act upon that test, they might, perhaps, be able to effect a large saving in many Departments of the Public Service, and might begin with advantage by applying it to some of the occupants of the Treasury Bench. He cordially supported the suggestion that a Select Committee should be appointed to inquire into this case, as was done in the case of the Irish Deeds Office some years ago.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS said, that this was a question which in former years he had considered, and the first conclusion he came to was that these clerks had always put forward their grievances in the best spirit of moderation. He was certain it would be for the public advantage that, if the alleged grievances did exist, the clerks should at least feel that their case had been fully inquired into before a resolution was come to upon the subject. They had sent Memorials to the Treasury; but they felt that those Memorials had never been properly attended to, as similar Memorials from the Irish Office had been some years ago. An Office of such importance as this to the country should be above all suspicion of error in any way, and the clerks should, at all events, be satisfied that there had been a full inquiry into their grievances. They were not satisfied at present, and he thought it rested with the Government to accede to their extremely just claim. This was an Office which returned a large sum of money to the Treasury, and these clerks were not asking for a single farthing beyond what was fair. They were putting a large sum of money into the Treasury; and, while he agreed that the Treasury should see that a proper margin of profit was obtained from this Department, they ought to give the clerks, who earned the money, proper remuneration. But there was no chance of the Treasury suffering, and he believed that before long it would become a fair question whether the fees charged at this Office should not be diminished. That was a matter which would have to be thoroughly discussed; and he hoped that the whole subject would receive the earnest consideration of the Government. He wished to put one question to the Lord Advocate upon another point affecting the Registry of Deeds. There were two systems of working up the arrears, and it was decided that both systems should be kept up, in order that there should not be any arrears. But he could not imagine why the official staff had not been employed in this work? He was perfectly aware of the great services rendered in this Office by Mr. Brodie; but he thought Mr. Brodie's time was so much occupied with other matters that he had not sufficient leisure for the duties of this Office; and he urged that whenever a vacancy occurred in the post which Mr. Brodie held, some person should be appointed to it who would be able to devote very much more time to its duties.

Mr. COURTNEY stated that the amount of salary of clerks and payment of copyists came to £25,550 a-year; but there must be added to that amount two items, before it was possible to obtain a just account of profit and loss—namely, the amount for pensions, which was, in fact, deferred pay, and the amount for stationery. The Non-Effective Vote for the whole Office was £4,800. As a matter of fact, this Office only just paid its way. The right hon. Gentleman (Sir R. Assheton Cross) had expressed the opinion that the application of these clerks was a just one. [Sir R. Assheton Cross: A just application for inquiry.] Well, did the right hon. Gentleman know whether there had been an inquiry? This Office was the subject of an inquiry in 1881, upon an application of the Departmental clerks. With regard to the different classes of clerks in this Office, the grievance was that the copyists did not become third class clerks, and the third class clerks did not become second class clerks. The third class clerks were in an enviable position when copyists were talked of, and in a deplorable position when their own claims were urged. He wished to put it to the Scotch Members, whether they were going to pay for what was, to a large extent, only routine work the same rates which prevailed in mercantile offices, or whether they were going to pay some fancy rates fixed by the judgment of the clerks themselves? The appeals made by the Scotch Members were appeals to the benevolence of that House, at the cost of the taxpayers of the United Kingdom. There was nothing that he was aware of to render it necessary to deal with this Office on principles different from those which were applied in the case of other branches of the Civil Service. The claim of these clerks, which the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Sir R. Assheton Cross) said was a just one, had been duly examined at the time when the Office was re-arranged in 1881. Since then, he believed that two Memorials had been received, and in each case the position of the clerks had been reconsidered. The Petition of the clerks, referred to particularly by the hon. Member for Inverness (Mr. Fraser-Mackintosh) and by the hon. Member for the Glasgow and Aberdeen Universities (Mr. J. A. Campbell), had been fully considered two months ago. Application had been made to Edinburgh for further light upon the matter; but in view of the Report received, and of the Memorials themselves, the Treasury had not seen any ground for acceding to the application for an improvement of terms. He very much regretted that the rate of remuneration of writers should be so low; the Treasury would be glad to see an improvement in that respect; but they could not increase the salaries of these individuals at the expense of the taxpayers of the country. Very proper rules had been laid down in the Office to insure the correctness of the copying work, one of which was that the copyists should be fined for errors. It was, in his opinion, perfectly just that the consequences of these errors should, to some extent, be visited on those who made them; the Memorialists, however, asked to be relieved from the consequences of their own carelessness. That application had been fairly considered; it had been judged on its merits; it had been referred and reported upon; and the Government were obliged to say, reluctantly, that it was impossible to accede to the principles set forth in the Memorial. In replying to the appeals of the hon. Member for Inverness, and other hon. and right hon. Gentlemen, he addressed himself to a general principle, and upon that general principle he felt that the common sense of the House, as well as public opinion, should resist these applications for increased pay at the expense of the taxpayer.

COLONEL NOLAN said, that there were no less than 12 men in the Registry of Deeds Office, Edinburgh, who got £500 a-year, as compared with four persons in the Irish Office. Then, with regard to the whole number of Curators and Assistant Keepers, with salaries rising to £550 a-year, there was nothing like a corresponding arrangement in the Dublin Office. He thought the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury had not gone with sufficient fulness into the case, and that hon. Members on those Benches would require some further particulars. Their contention was that the Civil Service system, as between the two countries, should be the same, and if a Committee were moved for to consider whether the employés should be dealt with in the same way he should support the Motion.

DR. CAMERON said, he thought that a great deal more might be done with regard to this Office in the interest of the taxpayer than had been done. He was amused at the facility with which that rigid political economist the Secretary to the Treasury denounced appeals to the benevolence of the House of Commons, and also at his remark that men must be justly punished if they made mistakes. Why, the Keeper of the Registry of Sasines received £1,000 a-year as salary, and Parliament had decreed that he should devote the whole of his time to that important Office. But he and his hon. Friends had heard that he had another Office, and that his present business left him no time to attend to the important duties of the Register House. He asked where was this severe application of the principles of political economy to begin and to end? All they asked was that there should be an inquiry into the condition of affairs at the Register House. He reminded the Committee that in the course of the trial of certain clerks of the Office, one of the counsel declared that the Register House was rotten from top to bottom. Departmental inquiries, under such circumstances, were of no use, because the only desire would be to hush up the bulk of the jobs that were perpetrated. The appointment of a Committee of Inquiry, composed of Members of that House, would, he was convinced, be attended with very different results; and although the conduct of some overpaid officials in connection with the Department might be gone into, the result, in his opinion, could not fail to be of benefit to the public interest. The Secretary to the Treasury had stated that the surplus of the Department derived from the fees was not great; but that was not due to the amount paid for the labour of copyists and clerks. With regard to the alteration in the arrangements to which the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury had referred, he reminded the Committee that it was only when the state of things at the Register House became a public scandal, and a lively interest was taken in it by the people, that any reform was introduced, and then all that was done was to adopt the Glasgow system which had been for years in operation with regard to the registration of titles. But there was another point. His hon. Friend the Member for the Inverness Burghs (Mr. Fraser-Mackintosh) had referred to the great difference between the charges made by private and official searchers, and the result this difference had in throwing business into the hands of private searchers. He would ask whether the interest of the taxpayer might not be served by reducing the large official charges? Finally, he thought every reason pointed to the desirability of instituting a public inquiry in order to see whether the working of the Department might be improved, and whether they could cut down the salaries of men who, although highly paid, did not attend to their work. For these reasons, if his hon. Friend divided the Committee on his Amendment, he should certainly support him.

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR) said, there was one point in the statement of the hon. Member for Glasgow which he could not pass over without reply. His hon. Friend had quoted the observation of counsel in a trial which had taken place, and which observation he was afraid was used with forensic licence, to the effect that the Register House was rotten from top to bottom. That was a statement well known to all acquainted with the Office to be entirely unfounded. It was made in the course of the trial of certain clerks who had been guilty of certain frauds in connection with the charges they made for copying. It appeared, in the course of the inquiry, that in the lower department there was a deficiency of check with regard to the counting of the number of words in each page of work, and the result was that safeguards were introduced for checking the amount of work done. The suggestion that the head of the Department, or the large number of clerks in the Office who had their responsible duties to discharge, should count the words in the copy, was really too extravagant to be seriously treated in the House of Commons. Everyone in the Office was responsible, according to his degree, for the work which he had to do, and for seeing that those below him did their duty.

MR. RAMSAY said, he had been in expectation that the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Lord Advocate would have been able to favour the Committee with some proofs that the Department was in all respects efficient. The right hon. and learned Gentleman had simply referred to some complaint that had been made with regard to the condition of the work in one of the Departments of the Office; but he had not shown that the Office was in a state of efficiency. It was to have been expected that the Government would take into their consideration the complaints which had been made, and not alone the complaints with regard to the position of the clerks; because his hon. Friend had, in bringing that matter forward, other objects in view than the mere raising of salaries. He agreed with the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury that for a number of men to enter an office upon well-understood conditions, and then to make complaints with regard to the salaries they received, was not just. He thought that the fair market value of their services, which the taxpayers of the country were willing to pay, was the proper pay of persons employed in the Public Service; and that, he believed, was the rule which should guide the Treasury when they were dealing with questions of this kind. But he was not satisfied that this establishment was as efficient as it might be made; and, therefore, he agreed that a thorough investigation should take place at no distant period. He considered, also, that there should be no undue distinction with regard to the clerks—that their case should be considered and justice done. He trusted, therefore, that there would be an official investigation which would satisfy those in the Public Service that they were being cared for, and that they were receiving what was a proper return for their services.

MR. BIGGAR thought that, as a general rule, Government employés in Edinburgh or Dublin were not entitled to as much remuneration as if they were employed in London. It was well known that rents were higher in London than in Dublin or in Edinburgh. ["No!"] An hon. Member said "No!" but he had seen houses in London let at much higher rents than those of the same quality and size in Dublin and Edinburgh. There was not the least doubt about that point; and, besides, many things were sold at a higher rate of profit in London than in other cities. Therefore, he said, no argument could be established on that ground for reconsidering these salaries. Again, no account seemed to be taken by hon. Members of the difference of cost of land and building so far as concerned the premises in which the work of these Departments was carried on.

THE CHAIRMAN (MR. RAIKES): I would point out to the hon. Member that the Question now before the Committee is that of the expenses of the Register House, Edinburgh.

MR. BIGGAR said, he merely wished to point out that the value of the premises in which these Departments were placed was an important factor in the calculation. It was argued that the fees exceeded in amount the outlay in payment of officials; and he was drawing attention to the fact that the hon. Gentleman who used that argument lost sight of the value of the houses in which the business was carried on.

MR. FRASER-MACKINTOSH said, as the Government had held out no hope that an inquiry would be held, he felt it his duty to move the reduction of the Vote by the sum of £500.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

COLONEL NOLAN contended that the only true principle to apply in matters of this kind was that the Civil Service employés should be paid the same in the Three Kingdoms. His hon. Friend the Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar) was, of course, entitled to his opinion on the subject of the relative cost of living in Dublin and London; but he (Colonel Nolan) was also able to form some opinion on that matter, and the conclusion he had arrived at was that there was no difference. It was true that owing to the fact of the Union a large number of old houses in Dublin were let at low rents.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 19; Noes 64; Majority 45.—(Div. List, No. 186.)

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(6.) £79,897, to complete the sum for Prisons (Scotland).

DR. CAMERON said, there was one item in this Vote to which he wished to call attention—attention, he believed, never having been called to it before. He would ask his right hon. Friend the Lord Advocate and the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury to look into the matter. In the list of prisons there was the prison of Jedburgh, which was almost entirely useless—that was to say, it would be useless were it not for the number of persons imprisoned in it under the Tweed Fisheries Acts. These were most iniquitous Acts, which enabled persons to be imprisoned on the evidence of a single witness. There was nothing analogous to them in Scotland. Only the other day several persons had been imprisoned on perjured evidence. It was true that when the circumstances were represented to the Home Secretary he instantly had the men released. He need not say, however, that no action had been taken against the perjurers. It was preposterous that this prison should be retained and kept up at the public expense merely for the benefit of the proprietors of the Tweed fisheries, and the maintenance of an iniquitous law. He hoped the matter would be remedied, or, at any rate, that the fishery proprietors would not be allowed to conduct these prosecutions under an entirely exceptional system of law. He trusted the right hon. and learned Gentleman would look into the subject, at least, to the extent of seeing that persons confined in Jedburgh Gaol were confined on the same evidence as was required in the case of any other criminals.

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR) promised to look into the matter.

MR. RAMSAY asked the right hon. and learned Gentleman to give instructions to the Commissioners to separate the Criminal Lunacy Department from the other Departments. They had had separate accounts prepared for some years, but had not this year; and that he felt to be a defect. The system of separate accounts had enabled them to contrast the expenditure on criminal lunatics at Perth with the charge made for persons of the same class at Broadmoor, and other Criminal Lunatic Asylums. He did not wish to delay the Committee by proposing any reduction of the Vote; but he thought it would be satisfactory to have these separate accounts, and regretted that they were not shown in the present Estimate.

MR. HIBBERT said, he quite agreed that it was better to have the accounts separated; but there was some difficulty in the way of the arrangement. He would see what could be done in the matter in the future.

MR. HARRINGTON said, he saw an item of £648 for the maintenance of prisoners in police cells. He would like to ask the hon. Gentleman for what time, on an average, were prisoners kept in police cells? They saw no such charge in the Irish Prison Estimates. He mentioned this matter, as he wished to ascertain whether prisoners were detained in prison a very long time before being brought to trial. £648 seemed a very large item, and it must either represent a very large number of prisoners detained for a short time in police cells, or a small number detained for a long time.

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR) said, the charge covered the entire country. There were some places where there were no gaols, but only a certain number of police cells, licensed for giving short terms of imprisonment—terms of 14 days. Licences were given to these places for the detention of prisoners for short periods, so as to avoid the trouble and expense of having to remove them to the more important places of detention, which might be some distance away.

MR. HARRINGTON asked whether he was to understand that these so-called "police cells" included not only ordinary barrack cells, but also special places of confinement?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR): We have no "barrack cells" in Scotland. I cannot say whether the Scotch prison system is in any way similar to the Irish.

MR. HARRINGTON said, he desired to put a question on another subject—namely, the grants to the Discharged Prisoners' Aid Society. The item was a very small one, and it would seem that it had reference to some one particular prisoner—it would seem that some one prisoner had been aided in a particular town. If the item covered aid to more than one prisoner the amount given in each case must be very small. He (Mr. Harrington) did not wish to be understood as taking exception to the Vote. To his mind it was a Vote for a most laudable purpose, and his desire would be rather to extend the assistance under such a Vote than anything else. Could the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Lord Advocate tell him how the Vote was disposed of—whether it was given to one prisoner or more, and where it was given?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR) said, the item covered several grants, no one of them exceeding £2 in amount. He had the details with him if the hon. Member desired to have them. The grants were distributed very widely. With regard to the other subject mentioned just now by the hon. Member, he found, from the details as to the detention of prisoners in Scotland, that the detentions in the police cells varied from one to seven days. In some places the average was four days, in others only one; but nowhere was there a longer detention than seven days.

Vote agreed to.

(7.) £60,066, to complete the sum for the Supreme Court of Judicature in Ireland.

(8.) £785, to complete the sum for the Admiralty Court Registry, Ireland.

(9.) £1,513, to complete the sum for the Registry of Judgments, Ireland.

The Lord Advocate

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £99,980, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1885, for the Expenses of the General Prisons Board in Ireland, and of the Prisons under their control; and of the Registration of Habitual Criminals."

MR. HEALY: No, no!

MR. SEXTON: I must ask the Government to postpone this Vote, as several matters which will have to be discussed arise upon it.

MR. HEALY: I move that the Chairman do report Progress.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Healy.)

MR. COURTNEY: I am afraid if we persevered with this it would lead to some difficulty. I would propose not to go on with it if the Motion for Progress is withdrawn.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

COLONEL NOLAN said, he did not wish to detain the Committee very long on this Vote; but there was just one matter to which he desired to call the attention of the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant.

MR. HEALY: Postpone the Vote.

COLONEL NOLAN said, he only desired to draw the attention of the Chief Secretary to the desirability of having an industrial school for boys at Clifden, in Connemara. There was a school for girls, and it was very necessary that there should be one for boys also. The nearest boys' industrial school to the Clifden district at the present time was a long way off, and he, therefore, trusted the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary would bear this appeal in mind.

MR. SEXTON said, he had an objection to the Vote being taken at all to-night. He had been in communication with some of the Irish officials as to the state of the schools in the Province of Connaught; but as yet had not received all the information he desired. He was now waiting for an answer, and, therefore, would ask for the postponement of the Vote.

MR. TREVELYAN: Does the hon. Member say he has been in communication with the Irish Government?

MR. SEXTON: No; not with the right hon. Gentleman, but with some of the local officials.

MR. HEALY: We have given several Irish Votes without discussion, and I think the right hon. Gentleman ought in fairness to postpone this one.

MR. COURTNEY said, it would not take the Committee very long to dispose of this Vote. The rest might be adjourned.

MR. HEALY: To Monday?

MR. COURTNEY: No; he was afraid the Army Estimates would have to be taken on Monday. The present Vote it would be well to consider to-night, and the Votes postponed now would have a better chance of full discussion if deferred until to-morrow; because, if deferred until any other day, several important Votes already postponed would have to be considered before them.

MR. SEXTON said, it was impossible for Irish Members to assent to the discussion of the Vote for Industrial and Reformatory Schools now. He thought the Irish Members had acted in the matter most reasonably, and that the Government were most unreasonable in now seeking to press the Vote. As he had already stated, he was in communication with certain local officials in Ireland, but had not yet received the full explanation he desired.

MR. MOORE said, he hoped the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary would not press the Vote to-night. He looked upon the policy of the Government on this subject as most questionable, and did not see what object the right hon. Gentleman could have in desiring to embarrass the working of these institutions in Ireland. He (Mr. Moore) found it necessary to make frequent complaints as to the working of these institutions; and he certainly thought a little time should be allowed to enable them to go thoroughly into the matter. He earnestly hoped the Government would not expect or ask them to go on with the Vote at this hour. If the Government insisted, it would be necessary for the Irish Members to resist them.

MR. COURTNEY said, he thought he had given a very reasonable argument when he said that if the Vote were postponed it would only come on some other day after a number of other deferred Votes, when the opportunity for discussion might not be so good as to-day. However, if hon. Gentlemen opposite did not agree with him, he would withdraw the Vote.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

(10.) £4,066, to complete the sum for the Dundrum Criminal Lunatic Asylum, Ireland.

MR. COURTNEY: We will go on with Class IV. now.

MR. HEALY: No, no!

Vote agreed to.

CLASS IV.—EDUCATION, SCIENCE, AND ART.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

MR. WARTON said, he would move that the Chairman do report Progress. This was Friday night, at the end of a long week of hard work, and he thought the least the Government could do would be to report Progress.

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again.”—(Mr. Warton.)

MR. HEALY said, the Irish Members had been under the fond delusion that if they allowed the last Class to pass they would no longer be kept there; at any rate, that they would not be kept, as they were yesterday, until 4 o'clock in the morning. The Irish Members had allowed several Irish Votes which they might have discussed to pass—Votes the very reasonable discussion of which would have occupied at least an hour and a-half. The Government themselves had felt the inconvenience of the long night they had had yesterday—they had shown how oppressed they were by being unable to attend in their places at 4 o'clock this afternoon.

They had got a big bunch of Votes to-night; but yet they desired, in the most gluttonous manner possible, to go on still further.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. CHILDERS): I think there is something in what the hon. Gentleman says; therefore, we will not press more Votes to-night. The House, however, ought to be aware that it will be very hard work to get the Votes through in good time.

MR. SEXTON: Are we to understand that the Irish Votes in Class III. will be taken on Tuesday?

MR. COURTNEY: Yes.

MR. WARTON: Will the Irish Vote No. 22 in Class I.—which was struck out for some unaccountable reason—be taken then? Why was that Vote kept out?

MR. COURTNEY: Yes; that Vote will be taken. As hon. Gentlemen acquainted with the matter are aware, there was great difficulty in going on with the Vote in question.

Resolutions to be reported upon Monday next.

Committee also report Progress; to sit again upon Monday next.

PUBLIC WORKS LOANS BILL.

(Mr. Courtney, Mr. Herbert Gladstone.)

[BILL 299.] COMMITTEE.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

MR. MARJORIBANKS said, he rose for the purpose of moving a new clause, to come in after Clause 2. The clause ran in this way—

(Advances to be made at three and a-half per cent.)

"Notwithstanding anything in the Public Works Loans Act, 1879 (42 & 43 Vic. c. 77), the rate of interest on loans granted by the Public Works Loan Commissioners under the authorisation of the Harbours and Passing Tolls Act 1861 (24 & 25 Vic. c. 47) shall not exceed the rate of £3 10s. per annum on each £100 where the aggregate amount of principal money due to the said Commissioners from any one harbour authority, in pursuance of the said Harbour and Passing Tolls Act, does not exceed £100,000."

The object of this clause was simply to place the conditions under which Harbour Authorities could obtain loans on exactly the same footing as they were prior to 1879, with this one exception—that the rate of interest he now proposed was $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent instead of $3\frac{1}{4}$. He thought it quite possible that $3\frac{1}{4}$ per cent might not leave sufficient margin to enable the Treasury to recoup itself for expenses of management or losses; but he was perfectly certain that $3\frac{1}{2}$ would leave quite sufficient margin, and that no loss could possibly accrue to the Treasury. His contention was that loans for harbours should not be treated as ordinary loans. The Harbours and Passing Tolls Act was passed in order to relieve the country from making large grants for the purpose of harbour construction. The Act was to enable works to be carried out by means of loans which were going to be of national use and profit; and it was a hard thing that faith should be broken with Harbour Authorities, and that they should be treated on the same footing as borrowers for purposes of much less national importance in regard to the rate of interest they had to pay. He was quite aware that a very considerable loss had accrued from these various loans which had been made by the State. These figures had been given. In 1879 the amount of interest receivable at 3 per cent on all the loans which had been granted up to that time was £10,095,000, whereas the actual amount received was only £9,361,000, being a loss, on the whole, of £734,000; but no such loss had occurred with regard to harbour loans. The amount of interest received on loans under the Harbours and Passing Tolls Act since 1861 was £897,381; the amount that would have been receivable at $3\frac{1}{4}$ per cent was £890,964, being £6,427 less than the sum actually received, whereas, if the rate of interest had been calculated at 3 per cent, there was a balance of £75,000. Therefore, so far as interest was concerned, there had been no loss on these harbour loans; so that, in all probability, were a uniform rate of $3\frac{1}{4}$ per cent charged, there would be enough margin to enable the Treasury to recoup itself for expenses of management or such losses as might possibly occur. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer would show some pity towards the harbours, and would accept the small proposal he was venturing to make.

New Clause (Advances to be made at three and a-half per cent.)—(Mr. Marjoribanks.)—brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed.
 "That the Clause be now read a second time."

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. CHILDERS): My hon. Friend has taken a course which I think is without precedent, and which very nearly approaches to a violation of the Rule under which our financial Business is conducted. I do not think there has been, on any previous occasion, a proposal made by a private Member to introduce into a Bill of this kind, which does not deal with questions of interest at all, a clause amending, for the purpose of this Act, the Act of 1879, and thereby imposing a charge on the public. If my hon. Friend's clause is passed, the consequence will be that in future there will be a diminution of interest on these loans, which will thereby become an additional charge on the taxpayers. At the same time, I cannot say that, although that is the effect of my hon. Friend's proposal, it is distinctly a breach of the Standing Order; so I do not take exception to it on that ground. But, whether it is so or not, it is undoubtedly opposed to the spirit and the custom which regulates our financial transactions; and I hope that on that account it will not receive the support of the Committee. Under the Act of 1861, these loans below £100,000 paid 3½ per cent; but it soon became evident that those loans did not leave such a margin as would relieve the Government and the taxpayer from loss, and the result was that in 1879 the right hon. Baronet the Member for North Devon, who was then Chancellor of the Exchequer, introduced a general Act fixing the rates of interest to be paid on loans of all kinds, but giving, at the same time, to the Treasury a relaxing power with reference to them. That proposal cannot be said to have been lightly discussed in this House, for it raised considerable debate, and no little difference of opinion. [Mr. SEXTON: What was the rate you first mentioned?] The rate was 3½ per cent for sums under £100,000, and for sums above £100,000 a rate not exceeding £5 per cent. The right hon. Gentleman the then Chancellor of the Exchequer introduced, therefore, into the Act of 1879 a provision putting all loans upon the same footing, assigning a scale of from 3½ to 4½ per cent with reference to the duration of the loan. I was saying that that proposal was fully discussed in this House; and although there was much difference of opinion upon certain questions, I remember that the House was distinctly in favour of the proposal laying down a general rule, and giving the Treasury a relaxing power; and now my hon. Friend proposes to take loans for harbours out of the general category, to take away the power of the Treasury under the Act of 1879, and to lay down a hard-and-fast line for all loans made with regard to harbours.

MR. MARJORIBANKS: Under £100,000.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. CHILDERS): Under £100,000, whatever their duration may be.

MR. MARJORIBANKS: That only refers to loans under the Harbours and Passing Tolls Act, and they cannot be for a longer period than 50 years; therefore, it is not for any undefined period whatever.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. CHILDERS): My hon. Friend has not looked at the construction of his clause. He proposes that 3½ per cent should be charged, whether the term is 25, 30, or 40 years. Before I come to the manner in which I propose to deal with my hon. Friend's proposal, let me put to the Committee what are the facts in reference to the risks which the taxpayer runs in making these loans to harbours. Up to the present time, we have advanced to harbours, under the Act of 1861, the sum of £2,600,000, roughly. Of that amount £84,000 have been written off, and about £70,000 of principal are in arrear at the present moment, so that, instead of receiving 3½ per cent interest, we have actually been paid £25,00 to £30,000 less on the amounts advanced. The House must thus remember that there is a considerable amount of money, in connection with these loans, either lost, or in danger of being lost. Now, my hon. Friend seems to think that there is something peculiar in harbours, which makes advances for harbours more secure than advances for other purposes. I am bound to say that the fact is just the reverse. The operations of the sea are so uncertain and so destructive that these works are subject to great and perilous influences to which other works are not exposed; and I find that at the present time harbour loans are by no means secure; for instance, at Wick and Port Erin; and, therefore, so far from making special exceptions in favour of harbour loans, if any exception were to be made at all, I think it should be in an opposite direction. Under these circumstances, I think that the Committee would do very unwisely to run counter to the position which was taken by the late Government in 1879, when the scale of rates was fixed by the Bill brought in by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for North Devon (Sir Stafford Northcote), when he was Chancellor of the Exchequer. But my hon. Friend would expect something more from me than that. I have said that I think it would be unwise to take from the Treasury the power they have under this Act of 1879; and I think I can give reasons why that should not be done, and why a hard-and-fast line of $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent, whatever may be the duration of the loan, would not be wise; and I will state to the Committee how I should propose to deal with this question, if the matter is still left, as I hope the House will allow it to be, to the discretion of the Treasury. What I would ask of the House is not to disturb the discretion of the Treasury in dealing with these loans, and not to take from the general category of the Act of 1879 these particular loans, but to allow the Treasury to retain their powers under that Act. But I will state, at the same time, what, if that is the case, we hope to do before the House meets in 1885, in dealing, not with these loans only, but with the whole of the loans made by the Public Works Loans Commissioners. The present scale, under the Act of 1879, is that interest shall be calculated for a period not exceeding 20 years at $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent; for a period not exceeding 30 years, at $3\frac{3}{4}$ per cent; and for a period not exceeding 40 years, at 4 per cent, or, exceeding 40 years, $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. What we hope to do is this. Whenever collateral security is offered, as will be the case with respect to many of these works, we will deduct something from these rates—I do not say how much. Then, in addition to that, I think the time has come when we may revise the basis of the rate at which the Government can advance money; so that the scale now in force under the Act of 1879 would be subject to two deductions—one in respect to the cheaper rate of interest, and one in respect to the rate at which, when there is collateral security, these loans should be made to Local Authorities. The effect of this would be perceptibly to reduce the rate of interest charged for these loans. What I will promise my hon. Friend and the Committee is that during the Recess I will take this question into consideration, not only with regard to harbours, but with regard to other advances which should receive attention. I will undertake to apply the two modifications of the scale which I have explained; and I will undertake, before the Session of 1885, that special arrangements shall be completed, and that the new scales shall come into operation. I hope that after that promise the Committee will not adopt the clause fixing one single line as to interest.

MR. SOLATER-BOOTH said, that, of course, the House was anxious that these public works should be carried out, if with public money, at a moderate rate of interest. Parliament had committed itself to the view that a considerable risk should be run; but, from the manner in which he had spoken, it would seem that the right hon. Gentleman thought the whole House was in favour of a reduction of the rates of interest on public loans. All that Members wished was that the interest should be moderate, and that the loans should be safe. He thought the right hon. Gentleman might have gone a step further, and explained that this Motion had been made without Notice. He had never heard of a question of so much importance being raised at 2 o'clock in the morning without Notice. When public finances were in question, it was only reasonable that proper Notice should be given of the terms of the proposal. Certainly, many Members would have left the House but for the fact that, by the accident of a mere question, they had learnt from the Chancellor of the Exchequer that the Vote was to be brought on. He should, therefore, support the Chancellor of the Exchequer in resisting this Motion; and, indeed, he should hope that, after what had occurred, the hon. Member would not divide upon the Motion. By this Motion the hon. Member came very near violating the wholesome principle that private Members could not be allowed to propose Motions of this kind.

THE CHAIRMAN (Mr. RAIKES): I understood from the hon. Member that this proposition was intended to apply only to future loans; but the clause appears to me to be retrospective, and to apply to existing loans. The hon. Member must put himself in Order by making the clause apply to future loans.

MR. MARJORIBANKS said, he only intended the clause to apply to future loans.

THE CHAIRMAN (Mr. RAIKES): The hon. Member must make that clear. In my opinion, the clause as it stands is retrospective.

MR. MARJORIBANKS said, he would amend the clause by inserting before the word "granted," in line 2, the words "to be."

Question, "That those words be there inserted," put, and agreed to.

MR. ARTHUR ARNOLD said, his hon. Friend had presided over a Committee of this House of which he had been a Member, and every Member of the House must be indebted to him for his labours. But after the frank and conciliatory statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, he hoped the hon. Member would see fit not to proceed with his Motion, but would wait for a future debate on the subject, when the Report of the Committee on Harbours had been presented.

MR. SEXTON said, that this subject had come under the consideration of, and had given rise to some unsatisfactory remarks by, the Secretary to the Treasury. The hon. Member for Berwickshire was entitled to speak with some authority on this subject. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had mentioned a sum of £600,000, of which he said £30,000 had been written off, so that in a quarter of a century there had been a very heavy loss on the capital sum. It was too early to assume anything as to the remainder; but the right hon. Gentleman had said that the Treasury were now able to borrow money at $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent, so that their position had improved something like $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. As to harbour loans being particularly perilous, he thought the argument was as much in favour of the hon. Member as of the Government; because, considering the national utility and value of these harbours and the great difficulty of prosecuting them to a successful conclusion, if the Government pursued a generous policy, the very fact that these harbours were perilous investments showed that they were entitled to special attention from the Government. What was the difference between the hon. Member and the Government? The right hon. Gentleman acknowledged that the Government had power to do what the hon. Member asked. They had a maximum scale, so that they could do what the hon. Member asked. Between the letter of the Act of Parliament and the discretion of the Treasury, he preferred the letter of the Act, so far as Ireland was concerned, because they had always found in Ireland that where the discretion of the Treasury operated, a harsh, rather than a generous, system was applied. The discretion of the Treasury meant a harsh policy towards Ireland, and he should prefer to have a rate of $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent under the clause proposed by the hon. Member, than $3\frac{1}{4}$ or $4\frac{1}{4}$ per cent under the Treasury. In the County Sligo the Harbour Authorities laboured under great difficulties; and he would recommend the Government not to pursue a stingy policy, but to advance these loans at as low a rate as they could. He considered that the hon. Member had taken a proper course, for this was a Bill dealing with public loans, and he simply proposed a clause fixing the rate of interest. A more proper occasion could not have been taken for bringing this matter before the House, and he was surprised at any objection being raised by a Radical Cabinet. He would conclude with one remark—namely, that they had reduced the rate of interest by 1 per cent on railway loans.

MR. MARJORIBANKS said, Harbour Trusts did not need to come to the Government at all to borrow money at $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent, because they could raise it at that rate in the open market. In order to carry out the Act of 1861, they should be able to borrow money at the lowest possible rate of interest—not more than $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. He much regretted that he should have to trouble the Committee to divide on his Motion.

MR. DAWSON said, that the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had argued that the danger to which the works were exposed was a reason why the Committee should support him in opposing the Motion of the hon. Member for Berwick; but he would remind the right hon. Gentleman that these works were not constructed for individual benefit, but in the interest of the nation. The right hon. Gentleman must be aware of what the Colonial Governments had done in matters of this kind; they had carried out the works knowing that, owing to the great peril to which they were exposed, private persons could not undertake them. That, he said, was a reason a fortiori why the Government should come forward and assist in the construction of harbours in the three Kingdoms. But there was this difference between the Government and the hon. Member for Berwickshire—if the Motion of the hon. Member were carried, the reduction of the rates of interest would be effected by Act of Parliament at once, instead of remaining dependent upon the chances referred to by the right hon. Gentleman. He trusted the Committee would support the Motion for the second reading of the clause.

Bill reported, without Amendment; to be read the third time upon Monday next.

ULSTER CANAL AND TYRONE NAVIGATION [COST OF REPAIRS].

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That it is expedient to authorise the payment, out of moneys to be provided by Parliament, of the Costs of Repairs of the Canals, which may become payable under the provisions of any Act of the present Session to transfer the Ulster Canal and the Tyrone Navigation to the Lagan Navigation Company."

COLONEL NOLAN wished to know whether the Government intended to bring in a Bill to provide compensation for the lowering of the value of the land which might be flooded in consequence of the canals not being efficiently kept up? He was prepared to draw up and submit a clause to the Government, which he would ask them to insert in the present Bill.

Mr. Dawson

Mr. COURTNEY said, he was not in a position to give any promise of the kind asked for by the hon. and gallant Member for Galway. In the present case there was nothing before the Committee but a Resolution. Another opportunity would present itself for discussing the question to which the hon. and gallant Member referred.

Mr. HEALY said, they were anxious that no power should be given to the Company taking over this canal that would have the effect of damaging the interests of the district.

Question put, and agreed to.

Resolved, That it is expedient to authorise the payment, out of moneys to be provided by Parliament, of the Costs of Repairs of the Canals, which may become payable under the provisions of any Act of the present Session to transfer the Ulster Canal and the Tyrone Navigation to the Lagan Navigation Company.

Resolution to be reported upon Monday next.

MAGISTRATES (IRELAND) SALARIES BILL.—[BILL 292.]

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Second Reading be deferred."—(Mr. Courtney.)

Mr. SEXTON asked when the Government intended to proceed with the Bill?

Mr. COURTNEY said, the Bill would be taken after the Army and Navy Estimates had been disposed of on Monday next. He was afraid it would come forward at a late hour.

Mr. SEXTON: Not after midnight, I hope.

Mr. COURTNEY: I cannot say that at this period of the Session.

Question put, and agreed to.

Second Reading deferred till Monday next.

[BILL 287.] SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Courtney.)

Digitized by Google

MR. WARTON said, he had brought forward a series of Amendments to the Municipal Elections (Corrupt and Illegal Practices) Bill on the occasion of its passing the third reading, which would be suitably introduced in this Bill also—namely, to substitute the words “Solicitor to the Treasury” for the words “Public Prosecutor.” It was quite clear that the Government accepted the principle of those Amendments. His object in drawing attention to this was to point out that if the Government proceeded with reasonable speed, both these Acts might be made consistent with each other.

MR. COURTNEY said, he was afraid that the course suggested by the hon. and learned Member for Bridport was not a convenient one. The Bill considered last night was not the only other Bill in which the Public Prosecutor was mentioned.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Monday next.

REVENUE, &c. BILL.—[BILL 300.]

(Mr. Courtney, Mr. Herbert Gladstone.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question, “That the Bill be now read a second time,”—(Mr. Courtney),—put, and agreed to.

MR. COURTNEY said, he proposed to put down the Committee stage for Tuesday next. The Bill had now been before the House for some time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That this House will, upon Tuesday next, resolve itself into Committee on the Bill.”—(Mr. Courtney.)

MR. WARTON said, it was, in his opinion, wrong to put down the Committee stage of a Bill of this nature so soon after the second reading. There was a great virtue in the “&c.” included in the title of the Bill; and, as he thought hon. Members should have more time to consider what Amendments were necessary, he hoped it would not be brought forward before Thursday next.

MR. WHITLEY said, he thought that Clause 6, which made great alterations in the law, should be further explained.

MR. COURTNEY said, he was compelled to put down the Bill for Tuesday; but if there was difficulty in the way he might be able to reconsider the matter.

MR. WARTON said, there were four or five distinct matters to be considered. The House had no time to go into them at that hour (2.5 A.M.), and the Secretary to the Treasury had moved the second reading of the Bill without a word of explanation. He moved that “Thursday” be substituted for “Tuesday” in the Motion of the hon. Gentleman.

Amendment proposed, to leave out “Tuesday,” and insert “Thursday,”—(Mr. Warton),—instead thereof.

Question put, “That ‘Tuesday’ stand part of the Question.”

The House divided:—Ayes 53; Noes 2: Majority 51.—(Div. List, No. 188.)

Committee upon Tuesday next.

INFANTS BILL.—[BILL 14.]

(Mr. Bryce, Mr. Davey, Mr. Anderson, Mr. Staveley Hill.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 22nd July.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 3 (Surviving parent to be guardian).

DR. FARQUHARSON said, he begged to move the first Amendment on the Paper—an Amendment depending merely on what would come later on.

Amendment proposed,

In page 1, line 12, at end, add “either alone or jointly with any guardian to be appointed as hereinafter provided.”—(Dr. Farquharson.)

Question proposed, “That those words be there inserted.”

MR. INCE said, he proposed to move an Amendment to this Amendment—a merely formal one to improve the Bill. It was to insert before the word “either” the words “and in the event of the mother being such survivor.”

Amendment proposed to the proposed Amendment, before the word “either,” to insert the words “and in the event of the mother being such survivor.”—(Mr. Ince.)

Question proposed, “That those words be there inserted.”

MR. BRYCE said, he did not see any objection in point of substance to this Amendment to the proposed Amendment; but, as a matter of drafting, he thought the words were unnecessary. The Amendment was governed by the last three words "as hereinafter provided," and the provision there referred to—which was to be moved in place of Clause 4—dealt with the case of the survivors. The Amendment to be presently moved by the hon. Member for West Aberdeenshire (Dr. Farquharson) said the father of any infant might appoint "a guardian or guardians to act jointly with the mother of such infant," &c.

MR. INCE said, the hon. Member might think the words unnecessary; but he had not so much observed the capacity of the Courts to make mistakes as he (Mr. Ince) had. It seemed desirable to put these words in to prevent the possibility of a mistake.

MR. HORACE DAVEY said, he quite agreed with the last speaker as to the capacity of the Courts to go wrong; but he should think that if they put these words into the clause Courts would be entrapped into going wrong. There did not seem to be any necessity for an addition to the Amendment. The proposal, it was admitted, would not alter the substance of the Amendment; and as the substance appeared quite clear enough, and as it would only tend to obscurity to add anything, he hoped the original Amendment would be accepted without alteration.

MR. WARTON said, he was certainly decidedly in favour of the addition proposed, and for the reason that it would be a safeguard. This Bill was brought in through the influence of strong-minded women over weak-minded men. He would not go into the argument that God had established a distinct inequality between men and women; but he would say that if this Amendment were not inserted the contention of fanatics that men and women were considered in the clause as equal would prevail. This Amendment would show that woman was not in the same position as man.

Question put, and negatived.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill."

MR. WARTON said, the Amendment they had just agreed to was very good so far as it went; but the clause was wrong altogether, being a material part of a very bad Bill. He, therefore, moved its rejection altogether. It was very hard that, at this period of the Session, they should be engaged in discussing a Bill of such importance—a measure for altogether revolutionizing our domestic relations. Besides, all these discussions were useless—a sheer waste of time—as the Bill was certain to be thrown out in the House of Lords.

Question put, and agreed to.

Clause 4 (Parents, or survivor of them, may appoint guardians).

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause stand part of the Bill."

MR. WARTON rose to Order. He said there was an Amendment lower down on the Paper in the name of the hon. Gentleman the Member for West Aberdeenshire (Dr. Farquharson) commencing in this way—"Page 1, leave out Clause 4, and insert the following Clause." He (Mr. Warton) wished to know whether, if they passed Clause 4 now, it would be competent for the hon. Member, later on, to move his clause? They would have passed Clause 4 before the hon. Member's proposal came before them. A similar question would arise on Clause 5; therefore, he asked at once for the decision of the Chairman to settle both questions.

THE CHAIRMAN: It will be competent for the hon. Member for West Aberdeenshire to negative this clause. If he does so he can then move the clause standing in his name when it is reached.

Question put, and negatived.

Clauses 5 to 7, inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 8 (Interpretation of terms).

MR. BRYCE said, he had several Amendments to propose to Clause 8. The first three were—page 2, line 15, after "justice," insert "or the County Court of the district in which either of the parents resides;" line 16, after "justice," insert "or the County Court of the district in which either of the parents resides;" line 17, after "Session," insert "or the Sheriff Court within whose jurisdiction either of the spouses resides."

These Amendments were all, practically, the embodiment of the same principle, which was that jurisdiction under the Act should be given not only to the High Court of Justice in England and Ireland, and to the Court of Session in Scotland, but also to the inferior Courts—that was to say, to the County Courts and Sheriff Courts. The object of the Amendments was to meet the case of poor persons who would be unable to afford the expense and time necessary to make application to the Superior Courts. The benefits of the Bill would be confined to well-to-do persons if these Amendments were not agreed to. In moving the second reading of the Bill, he had intimated that such an extension of the powers conferred by it on the Court would probably be desirable, and what he had heard since had strongly confirmed him in the belief that this ought to be done.

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, line 15, after "justice," insert "or the County Court of the district in which either of the parents resides."—(Mr. Bryce.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir FARRER HERSCHELL) must say he thought the proposed Amendment suggested some new terrors, because, though his hon. Friend had said it was to meet the case of poor persons, it could not be limited to that case. Every father under the Bill might be dealt with by the County Court in the district in which he resided. This was one of the most delicate jurisdictions one could possibly establish; and he owned he did not himself think it right that the County Court Judges, who, certainly, were not appointed for the discharge of any such function, should be intrusted with it compulsorily as against any person. If the hon. Member were to provide means of appeal from the County Court to a Superior Court the case would be different. In some cases, no doubt, it would be better to have a case heard in the County Court; but, in other cases, it would be necessary to resort to a much higher tribunal.

Mr. BRYCE: The hon. and learned Gentleman will see the Amendment says "or the County Court." He will mark the word "or."

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir FARRER HERSCHELL): But if the County Court is resorted to a person would be bound to submit to the jurisdiction of the Judge presiding over the district in which he resides. Some people might hesitate about submitting themselves voluntarily to the County Court; and I, therefore, think the County Court Judge should have authority to give power to move, on the application of either party.

Mr. ANDERSON said, he thought this a most valuable Amendment, and hoped the hon. Member (Mr. Bryce) would persevere with it. The Solicitor General, when he spoke about the County Court Judges, forgot the difference between the County Court Judges in England and the Sheriffs in Scotland. The Sheriff's Court had a much larger jurisdiction.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir FARRER HERSCHELL): There is no question as to the Sheriff's Court before the Committee. I am speaking of the English case, and not of the Scotch.

Mr. HEALY thought there was a great deal in what the Solicitor General had said. An option should certainly be given to enable persons to go either to a Superior Court or a County Court. In religious cases, especially in Ireland, decisions would not have by any means the same weight, and actions would in no way attract the same amount of attention, if tried before some little local Court, as they would if tried before a Superior Court. The mothers would not have the same amount of protection, nor would the fathers, in cases in which religious differences occurred, in the County Court as they would in a Superior Court. He was content to have the County Courts in the Bill, but thought it necessary that any party, at his or her option, should be able to apply to a Superior Court.

Mr. HORACE DAVEY said, the Solicitor General would see at once the necessity of providing for the County Court being a Court within the meaning of the Act, as it would apply to persons without means who could not bear the expense of going to the High Court. He quite agreed that there would be some difficulty in giving jurisdiction to the County Court in every case. It was, unfortunately, impossible to put a limit to the cases to be heard by a County Court Judge by fixing a certain sum, as was done in ordinary mercantile affairs. The hon. Gentleman the Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Bryce) and himself had discussed this question, and had come to the conclusion that some words might be devised, and brought up on Report, to meet the objection of the Solicitor General. Such a provision as "Provided always that either party can apply to the Judge of the County Court to remove the case to the High Court," might meet the objection.

Question put, and agreed to.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill."

Mr. WARTON said, that on this clause he wished to make one observation. One of the Acts repealed was the Act of Charles II.; but in that matter the section conflicted with Section 6, which had reference to the old Act. If the old Act was repealed here, it should be struck out from Section 6. The whole of the section remained in force in one place, and only part of it in another. He only pointed this out in a friendly way.

Question put, and agreed to.

Clauses 9 and 10 agreed to.

Mr. INCE said, the next Amendment stood in his name in the following terms:—

"Page 1, leave out Clause 4, and insert the following clause:—

(Surviving parents may appoint guardians.)

"It shall be lawful for the surviving parent of an unmarried infant by deed or will to appoint a guardian or guardians of such infant after the death of such survivor."

After what had taken place he proposed to waive his right to move this clause.

On the Motion of Dr. FARQUHARSON, the following new clause was inserted in lieu of Clause 4:—

(Each parent may appoint guardian.)

"1. Each of the parents of any infant may by deed or will appoint any person or persons to be guardian or guardians of such infant after the death of the survivor of such parents (if such infant be then unmarried), and the guardian or guardians so appointed shall act jointly with the guardian or guardians (if any) appointed by the other of such parents.

"2. The father of any infant may appoint a guardian or guardians to act jointly with the mother of such infant in the event of her surviving him.

"3. The mother of any infant may apply to the court for the appointment of some fit person or persons to act as guardian or guardians of such infant after her death jointly with the father of such infant, and the court, if satisfied that, having regard to the character or habits of the father or other grave cause, such appointment is desirable in the interests of such infant, may appoint such guardian or guardians so to act as aforesaid.

"4. In the event of guardians being unable to agree upon a question affecting the welfare of an infant, any of them may apply to the court for its directions, and the court may make such order or orders regarding the matters in difference as it shall think proper in the interest of the infant."

Mr. BRYCE said, he wished to propose a new clause in substitution for the 5th clause, which had been struck out, and to enlarge the powers of the Court to some extent. The Court at present had power, to some degree, to give effect to the wishes of the father unless his conduct had been bad. It was proposed by this new clause to admit the wishes of the mother, and the conduct of the parents, as considerations which would affect the Court's discretion, and in that way it was hoped that the more serious existing evils would be removed. The clause practically embodied what was the practice of the English Court, except that it would enable the Court to have regard more than hitherto to the conduct of the parents and the wishes of the mother. In Scotland the Court of Session did not seem to consider itself to have this power.

New Clause—

(Court may make order as to custody of infant.)

"The court may, upon the application of the mother of any infant (who may apply without next friend), make such order as it may think fit regarding the custody of such infant, or the religion in which it is to be brought up, having regard in the first place to the interests of the infant, and then to the conduct of the parents, and to the wishes as well of the mother as of the father."—(Mr. Bryce.)

—brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause be read a second time."

Mr. WARTON said, he could not understand what was meant by the "interests" of the child. How would the matter stand if the child's father was a Protestant owning a family living, and he had the child educated for the Church in order to take that living; but the mother who brought the child up was a Roman Catholic? This Bill would revolutionize society, and some day its supporters would blush for having passed it. The Court of Chancery had exercised the very jurisdiction embodied in this clause for centuries, and had had no difficulty in determining questions of this kind as to the interests of a child.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir FARRER HERSCHELL) said he viewed this clause with considerable misgiving. In certain cases the Courts had had to consider the question of the religion in which a child had been brought up; and they had had a guide which it was now proposed to take away from them. Hitherto the religion of the father had been the primary rule as to the children, and when it was a question of Protestant or Roman Catholic there was that guide. The Court had followed that guide; but now it was proposed to take away all guide in the matter, and the mother or the father being alive could apply to the Court to determine in what religion the child should be brought up. If the mother applied to the Court and asked that the child should be brought up in a particular religion, what test had the Court to adopt in order to determine what was the interest of the child? It was not, it appeared, to be the worldly interest of the child. That might be one test; but in many instances it would be an unsatisfactory one. Then, if religion was to be taken, what was the guide? He confessed he could not see how this clause was to be worked out. This was a matter subject to extreme differences of view. There might be a difference between Protestants themselves—a difference on ecclesiastical points. How was the Court to determine that, if it was to have regard, in the first place, to the interests of the infant? He did not propose to say what was to be the guide in this matter; but he should look with considerable doubt upon this clause. He did, however, quite agree with one part of the clause, for he thought there should be a greater power in the Court than there now was if an application was made by the mother to the Court with reference to the conduct of the father, because there were, no doubt, cases in which a proper check was put upon the action of the father when he had shown himself unfit to have control. He was quite willing to see some steps taken in that direction; but when it came to dealing with the religion in which the child was to be brought up, having regard, in the first place, to the interests of the child, he felt they were on the horns of a dilemma. If they looked to the temporal interests of the child they would be disregarding what many people considered higher interests; but if they looked to those higher interests, two Judges might determine in exactly opposite directions. He feared that without any such guide as was now provided it would be impossible to work this clause.

MR. BRYCE said, he thought it would not be possible to avoid dealing with religion at all; because, as they all knew, serious grievances had arisen, and might arise, through forcing a child to follow the religion which was the religion of the father. But this clause would not make the difficulty any greater than it was already; it would rather diminish it by preventing the Court from becoming, in extreme cases, the unwilling agent of cruelty. It must be remembered, in the first place, that no application could be made except upon some ground being shown for the change desired. There must be some ground shown to justify the application; and, in the next place, the striking out of Clause 2 of the present Bill made the Bill leave the Common Law right where it was before—that was to say, in the father. There was nothing in the construction of this new 5th clause to negative or extinguish the permanent Common Law right of the father, and all that was said in this clause with regard to the wishes and conduct of the parents must be taken to be subject to that Common Law right; and, therefore, prima facie the child would be brought up in the religion of its father. The Court would have that Common Law rule as a guide; and it was only where that rule failed to throw light on the subject that it would, in respect to religion, be empowered to have peculiar regard to the interests of the child and wishes of the mother.

MR. HARRINGTON said, the speech of the hon. Member had strengthened his opposition to the Bill. If there was anything at all that might be taken as consolation for the speech of the Solicitor General, the hon. Member opposite had completely demolished it. There was nothing to guide the Court except the Judge's own discretion; and, looking at the wording of this clause, he failed to see how the Judge could rule otherwise than in accordance with his own view as to what was best in the interests of the child. He could not see how the Judge could say that it would be better for the spiritual interests of the child, having regard to this section, which established no standard whatever, to be brought up in any other religion than that of the parents.

MR. HEALY said, this was a very important matter; and, in his view, the arguments of the Solicitor General had not been answered at all. It would be better to leave the law as it was at present; at least, so far as the religion was concerned. There did exist some guarantee at the present time, and it was needless to enforce the arguments of the Solicitor General; but he thought, at least, they should omit the words—"or the religion in which it is to be brought up." They must have regard to the interests of the child; but "infants" were sometimes of a very mature age, and it would be necessary to consider their wishes also.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (SIR FARRER HERSCHELL) suggested that the best course would be to report Progress now, and then they could consider what should be done. This was a most delicate question, and it ought not to be dealt with hastily.

MR. BRYOE said, he thought it might be well to pass by this clause now, and deal with it on the report, going on with the rest of the Bill in the meantime. He was reluctant to report Progress yet.

MR. HEALY proposed that the Bill should be allowed to pass now, and afterwards should be recommitted in respect to clauses that were contentious.

MR. HARRINGTON said, he fully recognized the desire of the hon. Member in bringing forward this measure, and quite believed that the hon. Member was animated by the best intentions; but the best intentions might sometimes lead people astray. A proposal of this kind was likely to considerably affect existing statutes and raise grave and serious complications; and he felt that this was not a time of morning at which to discuss a subject of this nature. He, therefore, hoped that Progress would be reported.

Mr. Harrington

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (SIR FARRER HERSCHELL) said, the hon. Member was, no doubt, anxious to get this Bill through Committee; and he would advise his hon. Friend to allow the Bill, as amended, to be reported, and then put down this or a similar clause for consideration on Report.

MR. HEALY asked if the Bill would be recommitted?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (SIR FARRER HERSCHELL) replied that it would not.

MR. HEALY said, he thought that in such a matter as this it would be very unsatisfactory to bring up a clause on the Report stage, especially at 2 or 3 o'clock in the morning, before which it could not be brought on.

COLONEL NOLAN said, he believed this clause would be most dangerous to the members of any religious community who were in a minority. The clause, if insisted upon, would lead to a question of endurance, and if it was pressed, he should begin at the commencement of the Bill, and put down as many Amendments as he could.

Motion made, and Question put, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Warton.)

The Committee divided:—Ayes 10; Noes 42: Majority 32.—(Div. List, No. 189.)

Original Question again proposed.

MR. BRYOE said, he would agree to report Progress now, and bring up his amended clause on Report, and so have this question settled.

COLONEL NOLAN said, he objected to this course being adopted. He had understood that the clause would be altogether withdrawn, or so shaped that those who were in a minority in England and a minority on the Bench in Ireland would be able to obtain guarantees. If that was done, then he should be content to have the clause withdrawn.

MR. BRYOE said, that that was what he intended to do.

COLONEL NOLAN said, he objected to allowing the Bill to go on without some assurance from the Government that they would not consent to a clause like this being passed. If that was given, he should then be satisfied; but if that assurance was not given, he should simply take means to place on the Paper Amendments to every clause in the Bill.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir FARRER HERSCHELL) said, he could not give any pledge that the Government would oppose this clause; but he thought he had given indications that he would oppose any clause involving the objections which had been pointed out to this clause.

Mr. HARRINGTON said, he could not assent to the proposal of the hon. Member (Mr. Bryce), for it would deprive hon. Members of an opportunity of speaking in the debate. If they had been able to express their views, this miserable and mischievous clause would have been disposed of. In Ireland this clause would give power to a number of County Court Judges to administer the law. It would invest them with an entirely new power; and, from what they knew in Ireland, they could not have the slightest confidence in those Judges. Only a few days ago he had endeavoured to bring before the House the conduct of one of the officials intrusted with the administration of such measures as this. That official had induced Roman Catholic children to join in an excursion given to the inmates of the Protestant Orphans' Home, and he took that opportunity of preaching to the Catholic children. Every member of his family was identified with that Home. This clause would give to that Judge and others of the same kind absolute discretion as to the best interests of the child in regard to its religion; and he and his hon. Friends would, therefore, offer the strongest opposition to the clause.

Mr. BRYCE pointed out that the hon. Member would have every opportunity of rejecting this clause, and it was quite clear, from what had been said, that he could not carry this clause in face of the opposition of the Solicitor General. Therefore, hon. Members were perfectly safe; and, for his part, he should be quite willing to omit all reference to religion, if the House preferred that.

Mr. HEALY said, he recognized the fact that the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets had no intention to impose a disability upon Members in this matter; but what they wanted was that when this clause was put down, the Bill should be recommitted in reference to this clause. So far, they had no guarantee as to that; but he thought it was a perfectly reasonable proposition, and such a course need not delay the Bill at all.

COLONEL NOLAN said, he wanted something more than the hon. Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy) wanted. He wanted to have this clause left out altogether. He did not object to the Bill, except for that clause; but with that clause, he looked on the Bill with the greatest fear, and knew that he should be found fault with if he allowed it to pass without offering it the strongest opposition at this period of the year. The clause would change the whole position of the minority, and unless he could get some assurance, he should oppose the Bill to the utmost.

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; Committee counted, and 40 Members being found present,

Mr. WARTON said, the objections to taking up this clause again on Report were very strong. If this was an ordinary Bill of only trifling importance, that course might be pursued; but it was too important a matter to be slurred over. It involved a complete change of the rights of husbands and wives, and there could be no greater example of recklessness in regard to Business than the way in which it was proposed to pass this Bill. This Bill was not in accordance with the real sentiment of the House, and it was the duty of those present to protest, in the interests of parents, against this irreligious and immoral proposition.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE appealed to his hon. Friend to accept the suggestion of the hon. Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy).

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause withdrawn.

Bill reported; as amended, to be considered upon Tuesday next, and to be printed. [Bill 308.]

THE WELLINGTON STATUE.

QUESTION.

LORD DENMAN desired to ask the Government a Question, of which he had given Notice some weeks ago, but which, being out of town, he was unable to put at the time—namely, Whether permission might be given for a photographer, at private expense, to obtain a photograph of the head of the statue of the late Duke of Wellington, removed from Hyde Park Corner? He did so, if possible, to prove that the head of the colossal statue was a strong, but coarse, likeness of the late Duke of Wellington—and more fitted to remain in London, according to the wish of a majority of the House of Lords, which, if the Government had not been too late, might have prevented the removal of the head at all, and have proved that the statue was suitable for its former elevated place, while a refined statue on a smaller scale might be more appropriate for Aldershot.

LORD SUDELEY: In reply to the noble Lord, I have to state that if he had asked this Question three or four weeks ago, when he first placed it on the Paper, the First Commissioner would have been most happy to have considered the matter to see if it could have been carried out. It is now, however, too late in the day, and a photograph of the head could not be made without delaying the removal of the statue to Aldershot, and, therefore, the First Commissioner regrets that he cannot consent to it.

PUBLIC BUSINESS—BURGH POLICE AND HEALTH (SCOTLAND) BILL.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

LORD BALFOUR said, he wished to ask Whether the Government could name a day after which they would not ask this House to give a Second Reading to the Burgh Police and Health (Scotland) Bill? He knew it would not be in Order to discuss the Bill on this occasion; but in order to make his Question intelligible, he would like to say that the Bill had been printed on the 3rd of April; that it was a Bill of 558 clauses, with 40 pages of Schedules, there being altogether 234 pages. It had been referred to a Select Committee, who, considering it in private, had taken 57 Divisions upon it, had expunged nearly 50 clauses, added a considerable number, and amended 209. They were coming to a period of the Session when there was not likely to be much time for the discussion and consideration of measures; and he wished to ask how it was possible to give adequate consideration to a complicated Bill of this kind unless a reasonable time was allowed? He certainly thought the Bill had been considered for so long a period in the other House that they should not lightly refuse to proceed with it; but the procedure in regard to it showed that it was by no means a Bill about which there was no contention. He therefore hoped that at least a week or 10 days would be allowed to elapse between the second reading and the Committee stage in this House if the Bill was to be persevered with.

THE EARL OF DALHOUSIE said, it was quite true that this was a complicated Bill, and that it had been long delayed in the other House; but it would be premature to say what steps the Government might take with regard to it, because, although it was generally understood that the Prorogation was not far off, still the day was not yet fixed, and he thought it was altogether too soon to decide what course might be taken by the Government with regard to this measure.

EGYPT—THE CONFERENCE.

QUESTION.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: I wish to ask Whether the noble Earl the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs has any information to communicate to the House with regard to the Conference? I understood that something passed in the other House as to the day on which a statement would be made.

EARL GRANVILLE: I do not understand that any pledge was given upon the matter; but I am quite ready to give the noble Marquess what information I possess. The Conference met again to-day. An important point arose, which required reference to the Powers. We meet again to-morrow, in the hope of the Plenipotentiaries having received their instructions. This, however, is not certain; but I can assure the noble Marquess that we are making every effort in the Conference to lose no time.

ARMY—ORDNANCE DEPARTMENT— NEW SMALL-BORE RIFLE.

OBSERVATIONS.

THE EARL OF WEMYSS, in calling attention to the proposed manufacture of a new small-bore rifle for the Army, and to the consequent evils of a break of gauge, said, he would ask their Lordships to consider what was the fresh arm, whether it was a good and efficient soldier's weapon, what were its supposed advantages, and whether these outweighed what might be said in favour of the existing arm. By the evidence that they had they had proved distinctly that the Martini-Henry had showed itself to be in all respects a trustworthy and most serviceable weapon. It had been tried in all parts of the world, and the opinions of soldiers proved that it had shown itself a most valuable and effective arm. Mr. Martin Smith, one of the best shots in the world, and for many years a member of the English Eight, had said of it that it possessed a very long range, good trajectory, and moderate recoil. In the Russo-Turkish War it had inflicted losses at so great a distance as two miles, and at 2,000 yards it would penetrate 9 inches of sand. Up to the present time it was far in advance of the men who had to use it; and what possible advantage could there be in giving the soldiers a slightly improved arm at an enormous cost? It was said that the trajectory of the new small-bore rifle proposed to be manufactured would be lower than that of the Martini-Henry. He ventured to think that this question of trajectory might be met in the present arm. The real question was whether they were for the sake of a slight increase in range and accuracy to cast the whole thing adrift again and establish a break of gauge. That, in his opinion, would be an evil so great as to outweigh an increase in these directions. The day might come when the Reserve Forces and the Regulars would be called upon to act together, and the danger of a difference in ammunition would be seriously felt. As to the Reserve Forces, it was said that they must give the Army the best arm, and the inferior arm would do for the inferior troops. He ventured to think that the argument was the other way. In what he had said about this old question he was not giving what was merely his own opinion, but also that of experienced officers, such as Sir Henry Wilmot. This new arm was to be about half-a-pound heavier than the existing arm. Now, anyone who had carried a rifle, either for military purposes or for deer stalking, would know what a difference a few ounces would make. Having himself been for many years Chairman of the National Rifle Association, and having done all in his power to encourage rifle shooting, he was anxious that the Army and the nation should have the best possible weapon; and he would not advocate, he would not say a retrograde step, but a resistance to further advance, if he did not in his conscience believe that the present arm was all that was necessary for the efficiency of the Army.

THE EARL OF MORLEY remarked, that the noble Earl had made a very strong appeal to the House, or rather to the Government; not to adopt a change in the present arm. He might say that a conclusion had not as yet been arrived at. A very strong Committee, consisting of officers and civilians, had been sitting for the last three years, and had finally come to the conclusion to recommend to the Secretary of State for War the weapon to which the noble Earl had called attention. The noble Earl had alluded to the extreme accuracy attained by the present Martini-Henry. He had no desire or reason to controvert the statement. For certain purposes, as compared with other European rifles, the Martini-Henry did not stand badly, especially at long ranges. But since 1871 great improvements had been made in the manufacture of rifles; and yet the whole argument of the noble Earl had been that they were never to make any improvement, because, if they did, they would be obliged to have a certain portion of their whole Forces for a time armed with one rifle, while the rest had another. He quite agreed with the noble Earl that, as far as possible, the whole Force of the country should be armed with the best possible weapon; but the Regular troops had got the Martini-Henry because, unfortunately, they were constantly obliged to use their weapons in actual warfare, and, therefore, it was the obvious duty of the Government to arm them first. As he had said, the matter was still sub judice; but he would like to mention a few points in connection with this new weapon. The bore was to be slightly reduced, and a corresponding reduction made in the weight of the bullet. The result of this would be that in a range of 500 yards the trajectory of the new weapon would, at its highest point, be 2 feet lower than that of the present Martini-Henry, with a corresponding difference at longer ranges. With respect to lowness of trajectory, it was not merely of importance at long ranges, but was of even greater importance at short ranges. The great reduction in the height of trajectory was of enormous importance, not only in the case of good shots, but also with regard to the less skilful ones. Another point to which the noble Earl had referred was the increase of weight in the new weapon. It was true that owing to some additions—that of a guard, to prevent the hand from being burnt by the heat, and of an increase of metal in the barrel—the new rifle was heavier than the present one, but the ammunition was lighter; so that taking the new rifle with 60 rounds of its ammunition, a man would only have a few ounces more to carry than with the present rifle and 60 of its rounds. The real argument of the noble Earl, however, had been that it was inadvisable to effect another break of gauge. It was absolutely necessary, to some extent, to go gradually to work. There would, no doubt, be a considerable number of rifles required in a very short period; and it was hoped, if the new rifle was adopted, that all the Infantry of the Line would be at once armed with it. Therefore, the only break of gauge would be between the Regular and the Auxiliary Forces. He agreed that no change should be made unless it were necessary; but the inconvenience of which the noble Lord complained was a temporary one. If, however, his advice were followed, it would render other inconveniences permanent. His noble Friend had suggested that it would be possible to obtain all the results that were sought to be obtained by the new rifle by using the rifle they now possessed with a smaller bullet. That matter was discussed in 1871 by a Committee over which his noble Friend on the Cross Benches presided, and the Committee rejected the proposal made by his noble Friend, which would involve the very great inconvenience of having two kinds of ammunition for the Army. It was necessary to keep pace with other countries in having the best possible weapons for modern warfare; and the questions for consideration were whether the improvements in the new weapon were sufficiently important to justify the temporary inconvenience which might, to a slight extent, arise from the break of gauge which the noble Lord deprecated.

LORD CHELMSFORD said, he was glad to hear from the noble Earl the Under Secretary of State for War that the question was still sub judice, because, although the proposed new rifle might be a superior weapon in firing power to the Martini-Henry, a weapon could easily be produced which would be of the same gauge as the Martini-Henry whilst possessing all the improvements contained in the new one; and thus the disadvantages of having two rifles requiring separate ammunition would be prevented. His experience in South Africa showed that it was necessary to have a half-cock weapon; otherwise the men had either to go with their rifles unloaded, and were therefore unprepared for sudden emergencies, or when their rifles were loaded there was always the danger of some nervous man letting his weapon go off and shooting his comrades. Upon sentry and outpost duty it was desirable that the men should always have their weapons loaded.

THE EARL OF WEMYSS, in reply, said, that this new rifle was to be introduced as a "temporary arrangement." The Martini-Henry rifle was brought in as a "temporary arrangement" 15 years ago, and was still in use. He hoped that the result of that discussion would be that the Government would turn their attention to improving the Martini-Henry rifle in every way, and avoid, if possible, the very serious evil of a break of gauge.

ARMY (OFFICERS)—VOLUNTARY RETIREMENTS—THE NEW WARRANT.

MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS.

THE EARL OF POWIS rose to call attention to the new Warrant suspending voluntary retirements for captains and majors of the line; and to move for number of first appointments to cavalry and infantry of the line respectively (excluding household cavalry, foot guards, and colonial corps) in 1880, 1881, 1882, 1883; number of lieutenants promoted captains in cavalry and infantry of the line, respectively, in each of those years; with number of cavalry regiments and line battalions on establishment. The noble Earl said, that at the time when the system of purchase in the Army was abolished, and when objection was made to the introduction of compulsory retirement in the lower ranks of the Service, the War Office laid great stress on the existence of voluntary retirement, and stated over and over again that voluntary retirement would make compulsory retirement a mere fiction. Those declarations answered their purpose at the time; but now within two years they were being considerably modified. He thought it would have been much more simple if so important a change as this, and one which affected so severely the individuals concerned, had been mentioned by the Secretary of State for War when moving the Army Estimates. The plan must have been all digested then, and an explanation of the cause which had led to its adoption would have obviated any apprehensions as to its probable effect. In 1883, excluding Guards, Household Cavalry, and Colonial Corps, in 28 regiments there had only been 24 promotions from lieutenant to captain. In 141 battalions of Infantry, having 15 subalterns each, there had only been 159 promotions. Surely, neither of these rates could be called extravagant. If there were a special run of vacancies in any particular regiment, there were plenty of old subalterns who might be promoted from other regiments. Hart's Army List showed that there were enough subalterns of nine years' standing to supply nearly a year's vacancies; and if eight years were taken there would be an infinite number. There was not even the miserable excuse of a money saving, because a series of officers retiring in succession upon gratuities would receive less money than a series retiring upon £200 a-year for the same period, the average duration of such an annuity at 40 years of age being 13 or 14 years by the War Office Tables. The treatment of the majors was still more unjust. An officer, if a captain, was turned out of the Army by the War Office for its own convenience at 40; but if he had the luck to be a major, he was to be kept compulsorily till he was 48, when his health might be failing. While every military doctrinaire denounced long service for the soldier as an atrocity, the officer was to be chained to the oar like a Venetian galley-slave. The reservation in the Warrant of a power of suspension was intended only for emergencies — such as an Indian Mutiny, or threat of invasion.

Moved for—

Return of number of first appointments to cavalry and infantry of line respectively (excluding household cavalry, foot guards, and colonial corps) in 1880, 1881, 1882, 1883; number of lieutenants promoted captains in cavalry and infantry of the line, respectively, in each of those years; and number of cavalry regiments and line battalions on establishment.—(The Earl of Powis.)

THE EARL OF MORLEY, who was very indistinctly heard, said, that the Secretary of State for War had answered a similar Question fully a few days ago, and had sent a copy of his answer to all the newspapers. The Government would have no objection to granting the Return which the noble Earl asked for. The Warrant, however, to which the noble Earl referred was not a Warrant at all; it was merely an explanatory Regulation under the Warrant long ago issued. The noble Earl accused the War Office of gratuitously and without sufficient reason making changes, and he seemed to blame the War Office for the present system of promotion in the Army. The present system of Army promotion was based on the Report of a Royal Commission presided over by Lord Penzance. In the Report of the Commissioners the following passage occurred in reference to the voluntary retirements with pension or gratuity which they recommended:—

“The above system, then, is intended as a flexible one, under which the actual rate of promotion can be controlled. It is an inevitable result of the regimental system and of promotions taking place within the regiment that the officers of any one regiment may from time to time go forward quicker than those of another by reason of more frequent deaths or other causes of vacancy. This inequality may to some extent be rectified in the granting or withholding voluntary retirements in each individual case according to the state of promotion in the particular regiment. By the exercise of a like discretion the general rate of promotion may be held in check on the one hand or stimulated on the other throughout the Army. And, further, we may remark that a system of this kind, capable of expansion or contraction, in the hands of those who are to administer it will readily adapt itself to the changes by way of augmentation of the higher ranks or otherwise which the future development of military organization may render necessary.”

The Earl of Powis

This recommendation was given effect to by Article 94 of the Royal Warrant, which was as follows:—

The Secretary of State pointed out, in the answer to which he referred, that he should deal with every individual case, and not allow the retirement of a major unless the vacancy was to be filled by the promotion of a captain, who must have seen at least 18 years' service, and not to allow the retirement of a captain unless the lieutenant to be appointed had seen nine years' service. Therefore, taking into consideration the recommendation of the Royal Commission, and the fact that the Warrant distinctly laid down that voluntary retirement should be regulated by the Secretary of State, he thought that the Regulations made were fair and reasonable, and that officers had no just grounds of complaint. As a matter of fact, he believed these Regulations would affect them very little.

THE EARL OF LONGFORD said, the noble Earl's explanation was very satisfactory, except to those affected by it. He had before now called attention to the inconvenience caused to officers by the uncertainty that prevailed as to the War Office Warrants and Regulations.

Motion agreed to—

CANAL BOATS ACT (1877) AMENDMENT

BILL.—(No. 198.)

(The Lord Carrington)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

LORD CARRINGTON, in moving the second reading of this Bill, said, it was merely for the purpose of amending certain slight defects in the Act of 1877, and incorporating into it certain definitions.

Moved, “That the Bill be now read 2^d.”
—(The Lord Carrington.)

THE EARL OF WEMYSS thought the Bill unnecessary, and said he would explain his reasons on the Motion to go into Committee.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2^d accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Thursday next.

LANDED ESTATES (IRELAND).

MOTION FOR RETURNS.

THE MARQUESS OF WATERFORD, in moving for Returns with regard to the number of Irish estates in the hands of Receivers, said, that Mr. Trevelyan, in introducing the Land Purchase Bill, which had unfortunately been dropped, made a statement pointing out that they were in Ireland rapidly approaching to that condition of affairs which resulted in the Encumbered Estates Court Act being passed in 1849. At that time there was a rental in the hands of Receivers of £750,000 a-year, and there were 1,000 Chancery suits, in which the rights of the parties had been ascertained, but where it was impossible to realize the property. At the present time, owing to various circumstances, Receivers were collecting a rental of £440,000 a-year, and there were 750 properties ripening for sale, and which at present had no chance of being sold. This was Mr. Trevelyan's statement. He was not prepared to say how this state of affairs might be obviated. It was desirable the expenses should be cut down as low as possible. The reason why he was moving for these Returns was that the expenses were much larger than necessary, and that the work might be done at a much less cost. A great deal of the present expense was needless extravagance. No doubt, it was necessary, after the money was paid into Court, that parties should appear before the Judge to claim the proportions due to them; but the costs in the previous part of the transaction might be materially cut down, and thus relieve those encumbered estates which of all in Ireland were least able to bear this excessive expense. If the Returns were granted, they should see clearly what the expenses under the present system were; and he trusted that Her Majesty's Government would, if he were right in his contention, take measures, by the appointment of a Royal Commission, to inquire into the present system, and see whether a great deal of this official work which at present came before a Judge, thus entailing all the necessary expense of judicial procedure, could not be transferred to an officer of the Court acting under the Judge, who could carry out the work in an equally efficacious but far simpler and less expensive manner; while the Judge's undivided attention could then be given to purely judicial work. The noble Lord concluded by moving for the Returns.

Moved, That there be laid before the House—

"I. Return showing the number of estates under the management of receivers in the High Court of Justice in Ireland—(a.) At the close of the year 1877 (seven); (b.) At the close of the year 1883 (three); (c.) The total gross annual rental of such estates.

"II. Return of—(a.) Total amount of the costs of passing receivers accounts taxed in the year 1883; (b.) Total amount of receivers miscellaneous costs taxed in the year 1883; (c.) Total amount of costs of the petitioner or other the person having carriage of the proceedings in receiving matters taxed in the year 1883."—(The Marquess of Waterford.)

LORD CARLINGFORD (LORD PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL) said, the Returns would not be opposed, and he should reserve what he had to say until the figures were before the House.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he should not be surprised to hear that the noble Marquess had been on some points misinformed about the details of the expenses supposed to be necessary to be incurred in these proceedings. It appeared to him that much of the work referred to which was supposed to involve the expense of application to the Court ought to be done in Chambers. He did not think a Royal Commission would be a proper way of proceeding, and he was afraid the Returns would throw no light on the matter, as it did not go into details.

THE EARL OF LONGFORD said, he was afraid the noble Marquess was not misinformed at all, as he had frequently heard the matter represented in the same terms in Ireland. He hoped the machinery was capable of considerable expansion, as in the present state of the country there would be a great deal more of this work for the Courts to do.

Motion agreed to.

Returns ordered to be laid before the House.

LAW AND POLICE (METROPOLIS)— THE REFORM DEMONSTRATION.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

LORD STRATHEDEN AND CAMPBELL: My Lords, I have a Notice on the Paper to ask Her Majesty's Government, On what ground the different routes to Parliament were blocked up or prohibited on July 21st? To guard myself against misapprehension, let me say that, as a supporter of the Franchise Bill on its second reading, I give no opinion against the demonstration which occurred. I even join in the eulogies which have been rather prodigally lavished on its good organization, and its law-respecting character. Glad should I be if even now it led to a transaction between rival Parties in the State by which excitement in the autumn would be obviated. The Question bears exclusively on the conduct of the Government. To show that it is a proper and a necessary Question, I must refer—however trivial in itself—to my experience on Monday. At 4 o'clock, I left the neighbourhood of Berkeley Square to be here at the time of Public Business. The police turned me from Berkeley Street, and again from Grafton Street—which were not the route of the procession—while they declared St. James's Street to be impassable, and recommended Regent Street, which really was so. By choosing my own path I was able to reach Bridge Street, and there had to remain an hour, as there was no access to Palace Yard except by crossing the procession. To bring the procession at all into that quarter was most superfluous, as it involved a detour, and was not their nearest way to Piccadilly. It was a quarter past 6 before I could join your Lordships. On my part, there is no personal complaint, no personal annoyance. It happened to be immaterial whether I reached the House at one time or another. It is an advantage in some respects to be forced to contemplate at leisure a remarkable display of banners and of bands which may affect the history of the country. But what ought to strike your Lordships, and probably will do so, is that if on an occasion of this kind streets are barred at the discretion of a Government, they may exclude from the two Houses the individuals they desire to exclude, they may rush through the measures they are anxious to precipitate, or negative the Motions they do not wish to be adopted. Now, if a matter of this kind is unnoticed, it is nearly sure to be repeated. If attention is directed to it, it is not likely to become a precedent. It is, therefore, a public duty to address the Question to Her Majesty's Government.

THE EARL OF DALHOUSIE: All I can state, on behalf of the Government, is that they did not arrange the route of the procession. They issued directions to the police so to regulate the traffic as to prevent disorder and to insure that as little confusion and obstruction as possible should arise from the procession. It is, I suppose, impossible for a procession of this magnitude to take place in the City of London without some inconvenience; but I do not see how the Government could have given other orders than they did on this occasion. If the police had failed in their duty, or made their arrangements without any foresight, then, no doubt, the police would be to blame, and the noble Lord would be justified in complaining of the Government; but I am not prepared to admit any failure on the part of the police. Therefore, I have to say that the Government do not consider they have any reason to apologize for what has happened.

THE EARL OF REDESDALE (CHAIRMAN OF COMMITTEES): I should like to ask whether the route the procession intended taking was made known to the Government before it actually took place?

THE EARL OF DALHOUSIE: I cannot answer the Question positively; but I have reason to believe that the route was communicated beforehand to the Secretary of State, who gave his directions accordingly. The police, I believe, consulted with the right hon. and learned Gentleman, and he made such modifications in regard to the arrangements as he thought desirable.

THE EARL OF REDESDALE (CHAIRMAN OF COMMITTEES): The point I meant was, why the procession was allowed to come by Parliament Street? It met on the Embankment, and its destination was Hyde Park. What earthly reason could the processionists have for going all round the end of Parliament Street, and up that street to Charing Cross, thus making a much longer route, and stopping up a great number of streets?

THE EARL OF DALHOUSIE: That is a Question which should rather be addressed to the leaders of the procession than to the Government. The Government maintain it was not their duty in any way to say what route the procession should take.

THE EARL OF REDESDALE (CHAIRMAN of COMMITTEES): The Government, at any rate, might have told the processionists what route they should not take.

THE MARQUESS OF LOTHIAN: It is generally understood that these processions should not come within some distance of the Houses of Parliament. On this occasion the Government were in communication with the police, and could they not have said that they did not wish the procession to come by Westminster? I am rather sorry the question has been raised; but as it has been put, I agree as to the character of the procession, though I do not think it is likely to have any effect upon anyone. I wish, however, to take this opportunity of asking the Under Secretary for War whether the statement which I have seen in the papers of Volunteer and Yeomanry Cavalry bands being in uniform and taking part in the procession is correct? I am not certain whether the War Office Regulations forbid men to appear in uniform on such occasions; but, if they do, some remonstrance ought, I think, to be addressed to the officers to whose battalions the men belong.

THE EARL OF DALHOUSIE: There is an Act of Parliament in force that processions shall not come within a mile of the Houses of Parliament if they intend to present a Petition; but this procession did not propose to do anything of that kind, and, consequently, there was nothing illegal in what they did.

THE EARL OF LONGFORD: As the matter has been referred to, I would like to know what will be done in the future? If the Government intends to patronize these demonstrations, and looking at what occurred lately, I would suggest that, on similar occasions hereafter, practicable routes should be publicly indicated for Members of Parliament, so that loss of time in gaining access to the two Houses may be obviated.

THE EARL OF MORLEY: I am glad to have the opportunity of denying that any Yeomanry, Volunteers, or Militia bands in uniform took part in the demonstration.

THE EARL OF MILLTOWN: It is clear that a procession can not come within a mile of the Houses of Parliament when a Petition has to be presented to Parliament; but I wish to ask who arranged this procession, for an unfortunate impression has got abroad that the leaders are to be found in the ranks of Her Majesty's Government?

YORKSHIRE REGISTRIES BILL.

(The Lord Wenlock.)

(NO. 192.) COMMITTEE.

House in Committee (according to order).

Clauses 1 to 36, inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 37 (Appointment of officers, &c.).

THE EARL OF FEVERSHAM moved, as an Amendment, to strike out the words limiting the appointment of Registrar to a barrister or solicitor of seven years' standing.

Amendment moved,

In page 19, lines 14 and 15, to leave out the words ("of not less than seven years' standing.")—(The Earl of Feversham.)

LORD WENLOCK said, that he was unable to accept the Amendment. The duties of the Registrar would now be more technical and would cause more responsibility than before, and it was necessary that he should have legal knowledge. Strong representations had been made to him by solicitors that they would have more confidence in the Office if the head of it were properly qualified by a knowledge of the law. He hoped that his noble Friend would withdraw his Amendment.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR remarked that it would be impossible for anyone without some qualification of this kind to discharge personally the duties of his office.

Amendment negatived.

Remaining Clauses agreed to, with Amendments.

The Report of the Amendments to be received To-morrow; and Bill to be printed as amended. (No. 219.)

PARLIAMENT — PALACE OF WESTMINSTER—WESTMINSTER HALL.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

LORD NORTON asked Her Majesty's Government, Whether the designs now exhibited in the Library of the House of Commons for battlemented buildings blocking up again the buttresses of Westminster Hall were decided on? He wished to know whether their Lordships would have any opportunity of expressing or even forming an opinion upon those designs before they were decided upon? At present he believed they were exhibited in the Library of the House of Commons, and he did not know whether that was meant to be sufficient for their Lordships intuitively to form an opinion upon them. Duplicates of the designs might have been put in their Lordships' Library, or, at all events, the plans might have been put in a place to which the Members of both Houses had access. The Report of Mr. Pearson, the very eminent architect, had only just been put into his hands, and had not been circulated—it was a most historical and critical document—and upon it they would have to form their judgment.

LORD SUDELEY: In reply to the noble Lord, I have to state that when the designs and plans for carrying out Mr. Pearson's proposals for the reconstruction of the west side of Westminster Hall were placed three weeks ago in the Library of the House of Commons, the First Commissioner stated that unless there was serious opposition to them the Government would submit a Vote for carrying out the works. As regards these plans, it was so late in the Session that it was not thought desirable to make duplicate plans; but I am sure the First Commissioner will endeavour to place them so that your Lordships may be able to inspect them with greater convenience than you are able to do now in the Library of the House of Commons. The Report of Mr. Pearson has been communicated to this House, and will be printed and distributed forthwith. The cloister which Mr. Pearson suggests is a restoration of that which undoubtedly existed from the time of Richard II. till the beginning of the present century. He worked out on evidence which seems unanswerable, the curious fact that a wall ran between the upright buttresses so as with the roof, which it certainly carried, to compose a cloister. This was removed to make way for the Law Courts, which have now been taken down. The buttresses will not be blocked up, but will be still visible to a very great extent above the cloister, and will stand out 8 feet. Mr. Pearson is confident from old drawings that the parapet of the wall was embattled. So far as can be ascertained these plans have met with general approval, and the Government therefore propose to ask for a Vote to carry out the restoration.

THE MARQUESS OF LOTHIAN expressed a hope that in future some means would be found of exhibiting proposed plans and designs connected with public buildings of interest, in places where they could conveniently be seen by the Members of both Houses of Parliament. He did not complain of the plans themselves.

LORD SUDELEY said, he was sure the First Commissioner would endeavour to carry out the suggestion, so that in future any plans of that nature would be placed in some chamber which would be convenient to the Members of both Houses wishing to inspect them.

CHESTER IMPROVEMENT BILL [Lords].

CONSIDERATION.

Order for Consideration, as amended, read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now considered."

Message to attend the Lords Commissioners;—

The House went;—and being returned;—

MR. SPEAKER reported the Royal Assent to several Bills.

CHESTER IMPROVEMENT BILL [Lords].

Question again proposed, "That the Bill be now considered."

MR. COURTNEY said, that one of the objects of this Bill was to transfer certain property and tolls to the Corporation under the 11th and other clauses of it. Now, as a rule, the right of transferring property could only be carried out under the general law by affixing a stamp, frequently very costly, to the instrument by which the transfer was effected. Such stamp formed part of the receipts of the Inland Revenue Office. It appeared, however, that an Act for the erection of an additional bridge over the River Dee at Chester, and for the construction of convenient roads and approaches, was authorized in the 6th year of the Reign of Geo. IV. c. 124, and by that Act, subsequently extended by an Act 2 Will. IV. c. 41, certain tolls were authorized for the purpose of maintaining the bridge, and of defraying the interest and repaying the principal of any debt that might be contracted; and after satisfaction of these purposes the tolls were to cease and determine. The Act thus created a public trust, and did not establish any private undertaking with a possibility of surplus revenue and profit. By the present Bill, the Corporation were empowered to purchase the Dee Bridges Undertaking for £15,000; but this was, in fact, the amount of the existing debt, and the real effect of the Bill was simply to transfer the trust from one public body to another without any conveyance of a beneficial interest. The stamp on such a transfer was nominal, and might be neglected; but he had felt it necessary to direct attention to the matter, because there had been other instances in which the Inland Revenue had suffered materially from non-compliance with the law in cases of transfer of property under the authority of an Act of Parliament. He was, therefore, anxious that the present instance should not be passed over sub silentio, and an inconvenient precedent established for the future. Some five or six years ago, a bridge which belonged to a certain Company, and from which a revenue, in the shape of tolls, was derived, was transferred by Act of Parliament without the Treasury knowing anything of the matter, and the consequence was that the obligation imposed by the Stamp Duties was evaded. In order to prevent that unfortunate occurrence from being drawn into a precedent he had considered it desirable to trouble the House with these observations.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill considered; to be read the third time.

QUESTIONS.

POOR LAW (IRELAND)—ELY DISPENSARY, DERRYGONNELLY—USE OF BUILDING FOR PARTY PURPOSES.

MR. HEALY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether anything has been done in reference to the use of the Ely Dispensary, Derrygonnelly, as an Orange Lodge?

MR. TREVELYAN: The Guardians, at their meeting on the 8th instant, appointed some of their number as a Committee to meet the Dispensary Committee, and consider the subject and report to the Board. The 23rd of this month was appointed as the day of meeting; but I am informed that the Guardians selected did not attend on that day. The Board have again been requested by the Local Government Board to give their attention to the matter. If the Guardians do not at their next meeting afford satisfactory information on the subject, the Local Government Board will direct their Inspector to ascertain how the matter stands.

INDIA (MADRAS)—DIRECTOR OF PUBLIC INSTRUCTION.

MR. GIBSON asked the Under Secretary of State for India, When is the appointment of Director of Public Instruction, Madras, expected to be vacant; will the Government, on the occasion of such vacancy, recognise the preferential claims of officers of the Educational Department, as promised by former Secretaries of State; and, does the Madras Educational Department include graduates in first class honours of the Universities of Oxford, Cambridge, Dublin, and Edinburgh, who have efficiently discharged the duties of their office?

MR. J. K. CROSS: The India Office has no information as to when this office will be vacant. The appointment rests with the Governor of Madras, by whom, I have no doubt, when a vacancy occurs, the claims of the members of the Education Department will be fully considered. The rule laid down is that preference is to be given to members of the Department if they are competent to discharge the duties of the office. The Department contains various officers who have taken good University degrees, and who have efficiently discharged the duties of such offices as they have held.

POST OFFICE—THE PARCEL POST—THE EASTERN DISTRICT OF LONDON.

MR. RITCHIE asked the Postmaster General, Whether it is a fact that the letter carriers of the Eastern District are compelled to collect and deliver parcels, regardless of size, weight, and number, and that, owing to this duty having to be performed by them, a serious delay is frequently caused to public correspondence?

MR. FAWCETT: The postmen in this district are not required to collect and deliver parcels regardless of size, weight, and number. The postmen deliver only the smaller parcels; and strict instructions have been given that when parcels from their size, weight, and number are likely to hinder the proper performance of the Letter Service, they are to be specially collected and delivered. I am assured that these instructions are carefully attended to, and that no complaint of delay has arisen from the public.

AUSTRALIAN COLONIES (NEW SOUTH WALES)—IMPORTATION OF FRENCH RECIDIVISTS FROM NOUMEA.

MR. ERRINGTON asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether the attention of the Secretary of State has been called to the fact that, in addition to the influx into our Australian Colonies of casually escaped convicts from the French penal settlements, against which the Colonists are constantly protesting, in April last the French Messageries Steamer Dupleix landed openly at Sydney nine ex-convicts, the nature of whose sentence imported that they were only released from Noumea conditionally on their never returning to France; whether any, and what, steps are being taken to remonstrate with the French Government against the deliberate importation into the Territories of a friendly Power of a class of criminals whom their own Country will not receive, and among whom according to the Colonial authorities—and, whether, to put a stop to this practice, Her Majesty's Government will approve or recommend to the Colonial Governments legislation making it penal for the captain of any vessel, Home or Foreign, to land released convicts in any of the Australian Colonies?

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY: The attention of the Colonial Office has been called to the incident mentioned. Her Majesty's Government have been for many months in communication with the French Government on the general subject, and have reason to believe that their earnest representations are receiving serious consideration. It is, therefore, hoped that the necessity for legislation in the Colonies may not arise; but Her Majesty's Government would not interfere with any reasonable measure that they might feel compelled to take for their own protection.

PREVENTION OF CRIME (IRELAND) ACT, 1882—EXTRA POLICE, CO. TYRONE.

VISCOUNT CRICHTON (for Mr. MACARTNEY) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether fifty police, a District Inspector, and a Resident Magistrate were sent to Coagh, county Tyrone, and a similar number of police to Cookstown, in the same county and neighbourhood, on the 12th July last; whether such police were sent in opposition to the strongly expressed and unanimous opinion of the local magistrates; whether both these districts are, and have been for some time, peaceful, and entirely free from Party disturbances; and, whether the Government will consent to relieve the county from the heavy charge thus imposed upon it?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, the extra police were not sent to both places in opposition to the wishes of the magistrates, but at the express request of the District Inspector, who consulted with the magistrates at Cookstown, and they confirmed the recommendation that 50 men be sent; but at the other place they did not think so many were required. Party feeling was very strong in the district, and there were serious disturbances there on a former occasion. Party feeling runs very high in the district, and there is no intention to depart from the usual practice in this matter.

THE MAGISTRACY (IRELAND)—ENNIS QUARTERSESSIONS—MR. C. KELLY, Q.C., CHAIRMAN.

MR. KENNY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If the Irish Government has had under its consideration a Petition from Mr. H. B. Harris, of Ennis, complaining of insulting and violent language used towards him in Court by Mr. Charles Kelly, Q.C., Chairman of Quarter Sessions; if Mr. Harris, acting as juror in a larceny case, stated that—and thereupon Mr. Kelly interfered, and told the juror to keep silent; if Mr. Harris claimed a right to make such an observation, and that Mr. Kelly immediately threatened to send him to prison if he spoke another word; if Mr. Harris in his Petition also states that—

“Unfortunately for all who have to attend the Quarter Sessions Court, they are obliged to submit to the insulting and disparaging remarks Mr. Kelly makes, and to witness the scenes that are enacted in Court from day to day, which it is painful for a nervous person to be an observer of, while another would consider the Court a burlesque;”

if, upon another occasion on which Mr. Harris was witness in a case, Mr. Kelly told him that he did not believe a word he swore, and if this expression is constantly being used by Mr. Kelly towards witnesses, from the most respectable to the most humble; if he is aware that Mr. Harris is a gentleman occupying a most respectable and valuable commercial position in Ennis; and, if the Lords Justices have the power to interfere to prevent the recurrence of painful scenes in a Court of Justice, or to inquire into Mr. Kelly's fitness to discharge the duties of a County Court Judge; and, if not, what course is open to aggrieved persons to obtain redress?

MR. TREVELYAN: The Irish Government have had before them a Memorial from Mr. Harris to the effect stated, and informed him that the Lords Justices have no power to interfere with a Judge in the discharge of his judicial duties. But although a Judge is only accountable to Parliament for his conduct, yet, as it was in his capacity as a juror that Mr. Harris complained, the Lords Justices considered that they might reasonably and properly ask the Judge for any explanation he might wish to offer in this matter, and a letter in this sense was accordingly sent to Mr. Kelly on Saturday last. His reply has not been received.

CONFEDERATION OF THE COLONIES (AUSTRALIA)—THE SYDNEY CON-VENTION.

SIR HERBERT MAXWELL asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether it is true that the Legislative Assembly of Queensland has unanimously passed the Convention in favour of the Confederation of the Colonies, of the Annexation of New Guinea and other Western Pacific Islands, and of combined legislation against criminal aliens; and, if so, what is the attitude of Her Majesty's Government towards this policy?

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY: The facts are as stated in the hon. Member's Question. Her Majesty's Government have already signified their readiness to confirm and carry out by any necessary Imperial legislation the Confederation Scheme of the Sydney Convention, if, and when, it is adopted by the different Colonial Legislatures, and Her Majesty's Government would not interpose should they combine in any well-considered legislation to protect themselves against criminal aliens. As to the other questions, all I can say at present is general, and that is that the whole matter is being considered by the Cabinet.

ATTORNEYS AND SOLICITORS (IRELAND) ACT, 1866—MR. ROBERT D. O'BRIEN.

MR. HEALY asked Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland, Whether Mr. Attorney General will give the necessary sanction, under "The Attorneys and Solicitors (Ireland) Act, 1866," to the Incorporated Law Society to recover the penalty of £50 incurred by Robert D. O'Brien, 2, Lower Glentworth Street, Limerick, for having, without professional status, on the 21st July, conducted an eviction case before the Rathkeale Bench, in absence of plaintiff or solicitor; and, whether the conduct of the magistrates, in allowing a non-professional person to appear in the case, in spite of the protest of a solicitor in court, will be brought under the notice of the Lord Chancellor?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER): No application to sanction any proceeding has been received by the Attorney General for Ireland from the Incorporated Law Society. He will carefully consider any such application if made. Mr. Robert O'Brien is the brother of the complainant, and, as such, might come within the definition of his "agent" in the Petty Sessions Act, 1882; and, if authorized by his brother, he might, with leave of the Court, appear and be heard. There seems no ground for imputing misconduct to the magistrates if they took another view.

MR. HEALY: Might I ask if the hon. and learned Gentleman is aware that the Attorney General for Ireland has given an opinion that the word "agent" signifies either a solicitor or barrister, and no one else?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER): I am not aware of any such decision?

MR. HEALY: Then, I may tell the hon. and learned Gentleman that a written opinion to that effect by the right hon. and learned Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Naish) exists.

LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)—THE MAGHERAFELT PRISONERS.

MR. HEALY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, What is the cause of the delay in replying to the memorial of the people of Magherafelt, county Derry, forwarded on 24th June to His Excellency, for a remission of sentence on three prisoners; whether the memorial is signed by two local magistrates, by the parish priest, the Protestant rector, the Presbyterian minister, and many respectable inhabitants; and, whether, as the men's sentences must expire at a comparatively near period, the Executive will give it consideration without further delay?

MR. TREVELYAN: A Memorial was received on the 1st of July, and was laid before the Recorder. His Report has not yet been received, though asked for; and until this Report is received the Lords Justices cannot decide upon it.

COMMITTEE OF PUBLIC ACCOUNTS—THE SECRET SERVICE FUND.

MR. GRAY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether his attention has been called to the Letter of the Exchequer and Audit Department to the Secretary to the Treasury, dated March 22nd last, and printed on page 169 of the Appendix to the Report from the Committee of Public Accounts, wherein complaint is made that, amongst others, the Chief Secretary for Ireland does not vouch the expenditure of that portion of the Secret Service Fund expended by him, "by the solemn declaration which the statute prescribes;" and, whether he is prepared to make this declaration in future?

MR. TREVELYAN: I understand that on receipt of the letter in question the Treasury took the opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown upon the points raised in it, the Audit Office letter being set out in extenso in the case. The opinion has been communicated to the Comptroller and Auditor General, and is now under his consideration.

MR. GRAY: I may point out to the right hon. Gentleman that he has not answered my Question.

MR. GRAY asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been called to the Letter of the Exchequer and Audit Department to the Secretary of the Treasury, dated 22nd March last, and printed on page 169 of the Appendix to the Report from the Committee of Public Accounts, wherein complaint is made that, amongst others, the Secretary of State for the Home Department does not vouch the expenditure in that portion of the Secret Service Fund expended by him, "by the solemn declaration which the statute prescribes;" and, whether he is prepared to make this declaration in future?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: Although I believe and am advised that, as regards the money disposed of under my authority, I am not called upon to make a statutory declaration, I always like to be on the safe side; and, therefore, I did make a statutory declaration two months before the letter of the Comptroller and Auditor General was written.

MR. GRAY asked the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether he is prepared to act for the future on the recommendation of the Exchequer and Audit Department contained in the following paragraph of the letter addressed to him by the Chief Clerk of that Department on March the 22nd last, and printed on page 170 of the Appendix to the Report from the Committee of Public Accounts:—

"I am to take this opportunity of calling their Lordships attention to the sum of £10,000 charged upon the Consolidated Fund, under the authority of Act 1 Vic. chap. 2, sec. 16, for Secret Service, but at present admitted to the account of the Consolidated Fund upon the simple receipt of the Parliamentary Secretary to the Treasury, and I am to state that in the Comptroller's and Auditor General's opinion there should be in this case, as in the case of voted money, a certificate of actual expenditure within the year, and surrender of any unexpended balance, and the declaration before the High Court of Justice required under the Act."

MR. COURTNEY: The point was included in a case laid before the Law Officers of the Crown, and their opinion upon it has been communicated to the Comptroller and Auditor General, and is still under his consideration. The matter will necessarily come before the Public Accounts Committee next year, and it is not for me to say what view they will take of it. In the meanwhile, it would be premature to suggest any alteration in the existing practice, which is, I believe, of long standing.

MR. GRAY asked the Parliamentary Secretary to the Treasury, Whether he is prepared in future to vouch by solemn declaration before the High Court of Justice, as required under the Act, the Secret Service money received by him, as recommended by the Auditor General in his letter to the Secretary to the Treasury, printed on page 170 of the Appendix to the Report from the Committee on Public Accounts, and to surrender any unexpected balance, as recommended in the same letter?

LORD RICHARD GROSVENOR: I cannot give any more definite answer than has been given by my Colleagues. I think the answer that has just been given by the Secretary to the Treasury covers the ground.

MR. GRAY asked whether the Secretary to the Treasury was prepared to make the statutory declaration if required?

[No reply.]

CENTRAL ASIA — DELIMITATION OF THE AFGHAN FRONTIER.

MR. ONSLOW asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether he can now give full particulars regarding the arrangements made by Her Majesty's Government for the fixing of the boundaries of Afghanistan and the neighbouring Countries; and, whether the officers appointed for this duty are to have any escort during the time they are so employed?

MR. J. K. CROSS: The communications between Her Majesty's Government and the Government of Russia, and between the Viceroy and the Ameer of Afghanistan, on the subject of the proposed delimitation of the Afghan Frontier, are not yet complete; and, therefore, it is not possible to give the full particulars for which the hon. Member asks. I may say, however, that Major General Sir Peter Lumsden has been appointed British Commissioner to examine and report on the boundaries in question, in association with a Russian colleague, and it is hoped that the Commission will begin work in October next. The party will be accompanied by a moderate escort, the details of which are under consideration.

MR. BOURKE asked if the escort was to be provided by the Ameer of Afghanistan, or was it to be a British escort?

MR. J. K. CROSS replied, that he had stated that these details were under consideration. He could not state the exact numbers or the composition of the escort.

MR. BOURKE asked if the Commission had received the assent of the Ameer of Afghanistan?

MR. J. K. CROSS said, it had received the assent of the Ameer; but the Afghan representatives had not yet been appointed.

MR. ONSLOW: Considering the great importance of this subject, I will, on this day week, put the following and, perhaps, other Questions:—Under whose protection the Commission recently appointed to fix the Afghan Boundaries will be; will the Ameer be represented; if so, by how many officers; what will be the duties of the Commission, and what orders have been given to them; in case of difference of opinion between our officers and the Russian officers, or those of the Ameer, to what Government will our officers refer; is the escort to be provided to consist entirely of Native Troops; and, what arrangements have been made for constant communication between our officers and either the Home Government or the Government of India?

MR. BOURKE: In consequence of the answer of the hon. Gentleman, I wish to give Notice that, on going into Committee of Supply, I will move—

"That it is inexpedient for Her Majesty's Government to incur such obligations as those which the proposed arrangement for fixing the boundaries of Afghanistan must necessarily impose upon this Country."

Subsequently,

MR. ONSLOW: I beg to ask the Prime Minister a Question, of which I have not been able to give him private Notice, Whether, before the Prorogation of Parliament, the Government will give the House and the country full opportunity of discussing the contemplated mission of British officers for the delimitation of the Afghan frontier?

MR. GLADSTONE: That is a Question of great importance, and one upon which the House will be glad to be informed; but I am not able to say, without Notice, whether particulars can be communicated in advance.

MR. ONSLOW: I will put the Question down for Monday.

ARMY (ORDNANCE DEPARTMENT) — COLONEL MONCRIEFF'S GUN-CARRIAGE.

COLONEL KING-HARMAN asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether it is true that the experiments lately made at Woolwich with the Moncrieff hydro-pneumatic disappearing carriage-gun were carried on without the inventor having had any notice or any opportunity of being present?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: The War Department has not obtained any hydro-pneumatic carriages for permanent works from Colonel Moncrieff himself. They purchased a hydro-pneumatic carriage from Messrs. Easton and Anderson, Colonel Moncrieff's engineers, which was delivered in September last year; and it is believed that this carriage was manufactured by Messrs. Easton and Anderson upon designs furnished by Colonel Moncrieff. A representative of Messrs. Easton and Anderson attended the trial on January 9, 1884, and again on May 20, 1884. Messrs. Easton and Anderson had had notice of every trial, and might, if they had so desired, have secured the attendance of their client, the inventor, on every occasion.

In reply to Sir WALTER B. BARTLEOT,

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, he believed the Committee was the Ordnance Committee; it was not a Constructive Committee, but only a Judicial Committee.

GRAND JURY ACT—COUNTY CESS—

MR. DOWLING, CAPPAWHITE.

MR. MAYNE asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is true that County Cess for a period of two or more years remain due of Mr. Dowling, Inchiquillip, Cappawhite; and, have the Poor Rates been regularly collected off this property during that time by another collector; and, if so, why is it that the County Cess has not been regularly collected?

MR. TRÉVELYAN, the Secretary of the Grand Jury reports that he is not aware that there are any arrears of county cess due on Mr. Dowling's property, as the barony collector has paid up the amount of his warrant regularly. The Clerk of the Union reports that there is a balance of about £10 of poor rates outstanding, which has been transferred to this year's rate.

INLAND REVENUE OFFICE, DUBLIN—SALARIES.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether it is true that the Collector of Inland Revenue for Dublin, and Receiver General of Stamp Duties for Ireland, and who ranks as the principal Inland Revenue official in that country, has a salary of only £700, by annual increments to £800, whilst the Chief Clerk of the Stamp and Tax Branch of the same Department, really a subordinate, receives £750; whether it is a fact that the maximum salary and duty pay attainable by a Chief Clerk in the Excise Branch, Custom House, Dublin,* is only £250, though a lower division clerk in the Stamps and Taxes may reach £300; whether the superintending clerk, Excise Branch, in the same office, receives only £300, though the ordinary clerks in the Stamps and Taxes, in the next room, are paid at the rate of £450; whether third-class surveyors of Customs are paid maximum salaries of £420 and overtime allowances, whilst second-class supervisors of Inland Revenue, performing more numerous and important duties, receive only a maximum of £270, and are paid nothing for overtime or even when doing double duty; whether examining officers of Customs are paid a maximum salary of £300 and overtime pay, though division officers of Inland Revenue of corresponding official rank and duties, and who are in addition accountants and book-keepers for their respective stations, are only granted a maximum of £200 and no overtime pay; and, whether, if such are the facts, the Chancellor of the Exchequer will take steps to place these officers on a more equal scale of salaries?

MR. COURTNEY (for the CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER) said: The maximum salary of the Collector of Inland Revenue in Dublin is £800; that of the Chief Clerk of the Stamp and Tax Department is £650, and he also receives £50 for special duties. These two Departments are quite distinct, the Head of the latter being the Controller of Stamps and Taxes. The normal maxima for a Chief Clerk in the Excise branch and Lower Division clerk in the Stamps and Taxes are the same—namely, £250; and each has a chance of rising to £300, by promotion and duty-pay respectively. The only clerks at £450 in the Stamps and Taxes are redundants, who will be replaced on vacancies by Lower Division clerks. Third class Surveyors of Customs, except in London and Liverpool, rise to £340 only. It is true that second class Supervisors of Excise rise to £270 only, and the fluctuating nature of their work does not admit of a system of overtime payments; but I do not know on what ground the hon. Member says their duties are more important than those of the Surveyors of Customs. It is true that Examining Officers get £300 and also overtime for work additional to their regular hours of attendance, while Division Officers rise to £200 only, and could not get overtime allowances, owing to the fluctuating nature of their duties. I do not think it is possible to compare the relative importance of different classes of officers in two services, whose duties are performed under very different conditions; and I may say that each Board would maintain that its service was more economical than the other; but if there be any real inequality, the proper method of correcting it would appear to be a reduction in the cost of the more highly-paid Department.

EVICTIIONS (IRELAND)—BARONY OF CASTLEA, CO. LIMERICK.

MR. O'SULLIVAN asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If he is aware that the three tenants, Messrs. O'Connell, Murphy, and the widow Casey (who were lately evicted off the property of C. John Coote, in the barony of Castlea and county of Limerick), have written to the landlord within the past two months, offering to accept their former farms at whatever terms the Land Court may fix for rent and arrears; and, if he is aware that there are no other farms in that district from which tenants have been evicted but those on Mr. Coote's property; and, if so, under those circumstances, whether it is just to the public taxpayers to continue six police in charge of those farms?

MR. TREVELYAN: The alleged communications of the evicted tenants to their landlord are not matters of which any official record would exist; and in the absence of the landlord and his agent the police have not been able to make any inquiry. I may mention, however, that the number of police on these farms is two, not six, as stated in the Question.

MR. O'SULLIVAN: May I ask whether any crimes have ever been committed in the county to render the police necessary?

[No reply.]

RAILWAY REGULATION ACT AMENDMENT—LEGISLATION.

MR. CRAIG-SELLAR asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether he intends to re-introduce the Railway Regulation Act Amendment Bill next Session; and, if so, whether he will consider the expediency of extending the functions of the Superior Court of Record under that Bill, so as to enable it to relieve the Committees of this and the other House of Parliament of the duty now imposed upon them of investigating and dealing with questions of fact relating to Railway Bills?

MR. CHAMBERLAIN, in reply, said, he was afraid he could not give his hon. Friend any definite reply to his Question. In his judgment, the matter his hon. Friend suggested for consideration was hardly one that would come properly within the scope of the Bill introduced this Session. His hon. Friend asked whether that Bill would be reintroduced next Session. If by that he meant the Autumn Session, certainly not. If he meant the Session of next year, all he could say was that it would be quite premature at present to consider what legislation would be proposed for that Session.

GRAND JURY ACTS—COLLECTION OF COUNTY CESS—CO. KERRY.

MR. HARRINGTON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether his attention has been directed to the following passages in the report of the auditor presented to the Grand Jury of the county of Kerry at the present assizes:—

"In previous reports I have drawn attention to the delay on the part of some of the barony constables in collecting the amount of Cess, for which they are respectively responsible. Not only, however, has no improvement taken place, but the position of affairs has been getting from bad to worse, and all of which would have been avoided if the provisions of the 148th section of the Grand Jury Act had been enforced—that section requiring each barony constable to pay the entire amount of his warrant to the treasurer two days before the first day of the next Assizes, in default of which he should, according to the 7th section of the Act, Geo. 4, c. 33, lose and forfeit all poundage claimed by him.

"The result of this serious omission, in not carrying out the Law, is accordingly the accumulation of arrears of county cess up to March last, amounting to the large sum of over £4,600.

"Another grave circumstance is the delay which continues to take place on the part of some of the barony constables in the lodgment of their respective collections, the gentlemen referred to persistently acting as if in total disregard both of the terms of the Order in Council and of the Grand Jury Acts, by which they are required to make regular lodgments to the credit of the county, and are prohibited from at any time retaining in hand more than £100.

"The collectors to whom I refer are Messrs. C. E. Leahy, Arthur Hutchins, and F. M'G. Denny. With the exception of £65, lodged by Mr. Leahy in December last, no other sum was paid into the credit of the county by any of the gentlemen named from the time they got their warrants, in September last, until within a few days of the Assizes in March;"

and, what steps he proposes should be taken to remedy this state of things?

MR. TREVELYAN: It is a fact that the auditor reported to the Local Government Board to the effect described, and the Board sent a copy of the Report to the Secretary of the Grand Jury, and have no power to interfere further in the matter. The county cess collectors are appointed at each Assizes by the Grand Jury. They are entirely the officers of the Grand Jury, and the Government have no control over them. It was, therefore, for the Grand Jury to take such action as they might deem necessary in the circumstances brought to their knowledge; and I understand that at the late Assizes they appointed a Committee to inquire into the matter, and received an explanation from the Inspectors which they deemed satisfactory.

STATE OF IRELAND—ORANGEMEN AT LISBURN.

MR. GRAY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether complaints have been made to the police that Orange drumming parties at Lisburn systematically annoy Catholics by playing outside or near the chapel on Saturday nights at the hour when Catholics are at confession therein; whether the police paid any attention to these complaints; and, whether the police permitted Orange arches to be erected in the Catholic quarter in such positions as to render it impossible for Catholics to attend their places of worship without passing under these arches?

MR. TREVELYAN: I am informed that some of the Roman Catholic clergy at Lisburn have complained of drumming parties passing the chapel. It has been the practice for many years past for drumming parties to pass up and down the streets of Lisburn on Saturday nights, and the practice does not appear to have caused any ill-feeling. The drumming parties never interfere with their Roman Catholic neighbours; and as they are peaceable and commit no offence, the police have not thought it prudent, in the interest of the peace of the town, to attempt to stop them. On the occasion of the recent anniversaries Orange arches were erected in several places; but they cannot be said to have been placed in a Catholic quarter, as there is no Catholic quarter in the town. Catholics and Protestants live in every part of it, and on good terms with each other.

MR. GRAY: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman if he is aware whether it is a fact that the Catholics could not go to their church on Sunday without passing under them?

MR. TREVELYAN: As the Catholics and Protestants live indiscriminately about the town, I am afraid that that would be the case.

LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)—PETTY SESSIONS COURT AT CASTLEWELLAN, CO. DOWN.

MR. GRAY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether the same room is used at Castlewellan, county Down, for an Orange Hall, a Freemasons' Hall, for Protestant religious instruction, and for Petty Sessions and Road Sessions?

MR. TREVELYAN: I am informed that the fact is as stated in the Question. I think the hon. Member will have to ask me more particular Questions on this point, as I do not know enough of the state of the case at present. I do not quite see what the objection is. The cost of a hall would be heavy, and, besides, it would be difficult to get a convenient place, whilst this place is hired for various purposes. In this case the rent of £10 a-year is paid for this matter.

PUBLIC HEALTH (IRELAND)—THE PROTESTANT EPISCOPAL GRAVEYARD AT DROMORE.

MR. GRAY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, as President of the Local Government Board, Whether he is aware that in hot weather there is an objectionable effluvia from the Protestant Episcopal Graveyard at Dromore; whether it is a fact that coffins interred there are sometimes only covered with a few inches of earth; whether it is true that a large business is done in this graveyard by cheap interments of persons dying in Belfast, sometimes four or five in a day; and, whether there was a serious epidemic last year in the town?

MR. TREVELYAN: The Executive Sanitary Officer of the district reports that there is not the slightest evidence of any effluvia from the graveyard, and that it is not the fact that interments are carried out in the objectionable manner described. He states that the interments which take place are few in number, and take place only in cases where rights of sepulture exist. The epidemic which occurred last year was scarlatina, and the Medical Officer of Health, who himself lives within 50 yards of the graveyard, states that there was not the remotest connection between the two. Scarlatina was at the same time prevalent in adjoining towns.

THE MAGISTRACY (IRELAND)—KILDYSART PETTY SESSIONS, CO. CLARE.

MR. KENNY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, How many magistrates usually attend the Kildysart, county Clare, Petty Sessions Court; if some time ago the board of guardians of the Kildysart Union recommended the names of two gentlemen for appointment to the Commission of the Peace; if the valuation of one was about £500 per annum, and the other over £200; if he will state how many of the magistrates have been appointed in Clare by the present Lord Chancellor, and how many of them are Catholics, and how many recommendations have been forwarded by the Lord Lieutenant of the county; and, whether it is proposed to give effect to the recommendations of the Kildysart Board of Guardians?

MR. TREVELYAN: I am informed that the usual attendance is one, or sometimes two. There are three or four local Justices in the neighbourhood, one or other of whom occasionally attends, with the Resident Magistrate of the district. The Board of Guardians did send a Memorial to the Lord Chancellor, naming two gentlemen for appointment to the Commission of the Peace. Their valuation was given in the Memorial as £454 and £123 respectively. The Lord Chancellor has the recommendation in their behalf under his consideration. Five gentlemen have been recommended by the Lord Lieutenant of the county.

of Clare. Two have been placed in the Commission. They are believed to be Protestants. The other recommendations have not yet been disposed of.

THE MAGISTRACY (IRELAND)—MR. CLIFFORD LLOYD.

MR. SMALL asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether Mr. Clifford Lloyd is at present in receipt of £125 per annum service pay, or of any other sum out of the Revenues of the United Kingdom; and, if not, up to what time was the last payment of any kind made to him?

MR. TREVELYAN: Mr. Lloyd is not at present in receipt of any sum from any Irish Vote, nor, so far as I am aware, from the Revenues of the United Kingdom. The last payment made to him from the Vote, out of which the salaries of Resident Magistrates are provided, was up to the 15th of September last.

EGYPT (RE-ORGANIZATION)—THE POLICE LAW.

MR. HEALY asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Is it true that Mr. Clifford Lloyd initiated the Police Law in Egypt without even submitting it to the Egyptian Legislative Council, in accordance with the Constitution accorded by Lord Dufferin; if not, why did the Chamber cause a protest to be inserted in The Journal Officiel; is it the case that Mr. Clifford Lloyd threw every obstacle in the way of the working of the Native tribunals instituted by Lord Dufferin; and, is it the case that, although no formal order was issued by him suppressing the Conseil d'Etat, it ceased to meet after Mr. Lloyd's arrival?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: Mr. Clifford Lloyd drew up a Minute for the organization of the police. This Minute was issued in the form of a Decree by the Egyptian Ministry, who appeared to have considered that it was not necessary to submit it to the Legislative Council. The responsibility lay with them. I have no reason whatever to suppose that Mr. Clifford Lloyd threw any obstacle in the way of the work of the Native Tribunals. The circumstances relating to the suspension of the functions of the Council of State are given in Egypt, No. 12, 1884, pages 24 and 103. Mr. Clifford Lloyd had nothing to do with the matter. I have not seen in The Journal Officiel any protest from the Chamber respecting the Police Law; but I understand that there was some expression of opinion. Whether it took an official shape or not I cannot say.

ARMY (INDIA)—GENERAL LIST OF INDIAN OFFICERS.

SIR EARDLEY WILMOT asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether his attention has been drawn to Petitions recently presented to this Honourable House by officers of the General List of the Indian Army, complaining that they have been compulsorily placed on Staff Corps scale of promotion, while debarred from equal privileges as to retiring allowances; and, whether Her Majesty's Government will give favourable consideration to those Petitions, in order that General List Indian officers may be placed on an equal footing, as regards those allowances, with officers who joined the Staff Corps prior to September 1866?

MR. J. K. CROSS: The subject of these Petitions has been considered by the Secretary of State; but, in his opinion, there is no ground for extending to the Officers of the General List the actuarial scale of additional pensions awarded to those officers who joined the Staff Corps prior to 1866, and to whose special conditions of service this scale is alone applicable.

ROADS AND BRIDGES (IRELAND)—DRUMHERIFF BRIDGE, CO. LEITRIM.

COLONEL O'BEIRNE asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If he will give instructions to have the works now in progress in the construction of the piers and abutments of Drumheriff Bridge, county Leitrim, immediately stopped, in order to protect the interests of the cesspayers, as these works are not carried out in accordance with the specification, drawn up by the county Roscommon surveyor, and the late county surveyor of the county Leitrim, the stones not having the required dimensions, or laid in Portland cement and rubble stone, mortar being substituted for backing; and will an inspection of the above works be ordered by a county surveyor on behalf of the county Leitrim; and, if it is a fact that the assistant county surveyor for the county Leitrim refuses to certify that the work is being done in accordance with the specification, and has cautioned the contractor to discontinue building the piers and abutments of the Leitrim portion of the bridge with the materials he is at present using?

MR. TREVELYAN: The bridge is in course of construction between the counties of Leitrim and Roscommon, and the work is being carried on under the direction of a joint Committee appointed by the Grand Juries under the statutory powers vested in them. The Government have no power over the work, nor has any grant been made in aid of it. There is no power in the Government to have the works stopped, or to order an inspection by a County Surveyor on behalf of the county of Leitrim. I am informed that the estimate prepared was for an outlay of £1,900; and that as the presentment passed was only for £700 from each county, the plans had to be departed from in some particulars relating to masonry in order to keep within the estimate. There seems to be a difference of opinion between the officials of the two counties. The joint Committee of the Grand Juries already appointed is the proper tribunal to adjust them, and I hope this Question will have the effect of inducing them to take prompt action. I am aware that the matter has been specially brought to their notice by the Assistant County Surveyor, who raised the objection on the County Leitrim side.

ARMY (AUXILIARY FORCES)—MILITIA QUARTERMASTERS—RETIREMENTS.

COLONEL KING-HARMAN asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether, with reference to the Parliamentary Return respecting Retired Militia Quartermasters, dated on the back 15th March 1884, his attention has been drawn to the case of six retired officers of this rank now living who served 20 years as such, and were allowed on retirement in 1875, 1876, and 1877, a Militia pension less by a shilling a-day than what was allowed in 1817 for only 15 years' service; and also to the case of 13 officers of the same rank and longer service now living, who were compulsorily retired in 1878 on a pension of no higher rate than what was allowed in 1817 for less service; and, whether he intends to propose any arrangement by which these pensions will be in accordance with precedent, and with the position and requirements of these officers?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: The Warrant under which the Militia Quartermasters referred to were granted retirement was very carefully considered, and they received the full benefit of its provisions. Moreover, their claims have been repeatedly examined, and it has on each occasion been decided that they have no just cause for complaint. I am not prepared to revise the previous decisions.

NAVY—NAVAL OPERATIONS IN THE SOUDAN—EXTRA PAY.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL (for Sir H. DRUMMOND WOLFF) asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether the officers and men of the Navy employed in the late Soudan expedition are to receive the same batta as that given to the Army, for the exceptionally hard work imposed on them by recent operations?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I am not sure that the word "batta" can properly be applied in this case. But a gratuity on the same basis as that awarded for the operations in 1882 will shortly be payable to the Naval and Marine Forces employed in the operations during the spring of this year in the Soudan; the portion for the Navy being distributable according to the Navy prize scale, and that for the Marines under the Army scale.

SIR JOHN HAY: Will there be a Supplementary Estimate?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I cannot say what will be required; but certainly it is not necessary at present.

SIR JOHN HAY: Under what Vote will this be taken?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: Under Vote 1, Wages to Seamen and Marines.

EGYPT (EVENTS IN THE SOUDAN)—THE TREATY WITH ABYSSINIA.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If any guarantee has been taken by Her Majesty's Government that the cruel methods of savage warfare will not be practised by the Abyssinians in their invasion of the Soudan as the allies of the English, under the Treaty with the Negoosa Negust of Ethiopia?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: There is no question of an "invasion" of the Soudan by the Abyssinians as the allies of this country; and I may add, what I have already stated in this House, that Her Majesty's Government have no reason to suppose that King John intends to ravish and lay waste the country.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON: Do I understand that the Abyssinians are not about to occupy Kassala?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: That is a totally distinct Question, of which Notice has not been given.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON: Is there any understanding that King John is not to invade the Soudan?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: The Abyssinian Papers are before the House. The agreement with the King of Abyssinia is that he is to assist the withdrawal of the Egyptian garrisons from the three places mentioned, of which Kassala is one.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON: Then, Sir, I repeat, have any guarantees been taken that in this invasion of the Soudan by the Abyssinians the cruel methods of savage warfare will not be practised?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: I have just stated that Her Majesty's Government have no reason to suppose that what the hon. Member calls "cruel methods of warfare" are going to be pursued.

POOR LAW (IRELAND)—MR. R. MOORE, CLERK OF INNISHOWEN UNION, COUNTY DONEGAL.

MR. DEASY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether Mr. Robert Moore, Returning Officer and Clerk of the Innishowen Union, county Donegal, is also agent for several landlords holding property within the Union; and, whether, if that be so, the Local Government Board will take steps to compel Mr. Moore either to give up his agencies or to resign his office as Clerk of the Union?

MR. TREVELYAN: The Clerk of the Innishowen Union states that he receives rent for four landlords in the Union, and that he has acted in that capacity for the last 30 years. The Local Government Board see no reason to require him to give up this employment, unless it is shown that it causes him to neglect his duties. There is nothing recorded against this officer in the Local Government Board's Department.

Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice

POOR LAW (IRELAND)—ELECTION OF GUARDIANS, BANDON UNION.

MR. DEASY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether a sworn inquiry into the late election for Poor Law Guardian in the Innishannon Electoral Division, in the Bandon Union, county Cork, was demanded on the ground that Mr. George Stanley, the candidate declared elected by the returning officer, was guilty of bribery; whether the Local Government Board have decided to grant such an inquiry; whether the said Mr. Stanley has been elected to the office of rate collector in the Bandon Union at a poundage of sixpence, though a Mr. Dineen tendered to collect the rates at fourpence in the pound; and, whether the Local Government Board approve of Mr. Stanley's appointment; and, if not, what steps they propose to take in reference to it?

MR. TREVELYAN: A resolution requesting a sworn inquiry into the conduct of a collector named Edward Stanley in connection with the election of Mr. George Stanley was proposed at the Guardians' meeting on the 28th of May—but was not passed. The complainants applied to the Local Government Board for a sworn inquiry, and the collector was called on for an explanation; but he died before the matter was disposed of. Mr. George Stanley, having previously resigned his office of Guardian, was elected Poor Rate Collector on the 9th of this month; but, protests having been lodged against his appointment by the majority of the Guardians, the Local Government Board have the matter now under consideration.

PREVENTION OF CRIME (IRELAND) ACT, 1882—EXTRA POLICE AT LIMERICK.

MR. SYNAN asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether Mr. Felix M'Carthy, resident magistrate for the city of Limerick in 1880, 1881, and 1882, applied for an extra police force in those years; whether Mr. Forster, then Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant, visited the city of Limerick in the year 1882; whether he then saw or was permitted to see Mr. M'Carthy; and, whether Mr. Cliford Lloyd was then at Limerick, as resident magistrate for the province of Munster?

Google

MR. TREVELYAN: On various special occasions in the years mentioned Mr. M'Carthy applied to have the Police Force of the city temporarily strengthened. In May, 1882, he signed a requisition for 25 extra men, which he considered wanted at the time. I understand from my right hon. Friend the Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster) that he paid no special visit to Limerick; but that on his way to the county of Clare, and again, a few days later, when returning, he spent an hour or two in the city. Mr. M'Carthy, R.M., had no interview with him, nor did he seek one. The suggestion that any hindrance was placed in the way of such a meeting is without foundation. Mr. Clifford Lloyd was then at Limerick, in charge of the counties of Limerick and Clare.

POST OFFICE—NEWSPAPERS.

MR. GRAY asked the Postmaster General, Whether for years the Post Office made an extra charge for newspapers that were "stitched;" whether, after a long agitation, this charge was abandoned; whether it is true, as stated in a Letter of Mr. H. Trueman Wood to The Times of the 22nd instant, that the Department still charges extra for a supplement to a newspaper, if stitched; and, whether, in the case mentioned, the Department made a demand for five pounds on account of its forbearance in not surcharging all copies of last week's Journal of the Society of Arts, because it had a stitched supplement?

MR. FAWCETT, in reply, said, that the regulation with regard to not allowing supplements to be stitched was maintained with the view of placing some limitation on the size and weight of supplements. With regard to the particular journal referred to by the hon. Member, an insufficient amount of postage had been paid; and, in order to obviate the inconvenience of making a separate charge to all the persons to whom copies had been sent, it was arranged that the sender of the journal should pay the insufficient postage, which amounted to exactly £5.

POST OFFICE (IRELAND)—GENERAL POST OFFICE, DUBLIN—FEMALE SUPERVISORS.

COLONEL KING-HARMAN asked the Postmaster General, If it is true that female "supervisors" are appointed on the Telegraph staffs of the Leeds, Edinburgh, Glasgow, Newcastle on Tyne, Liverpool, and Manchester Post Offices; why such appointments have not been made on the Dublin Telegraph staff; and, whether there are not three such supervisors appointed at Edinburgh, the female staff of that office numbering 53, whilst, although 70 females are employed in the Dublin Post Office, there are no supervisors appointed?

MR. FAWCETT, in reply, said, he would inquire whether a better system than that which at present prevailed could be found for the appointment of supervisors.

PUBLIC HEALTH—ALLEGED DEATH FROM VACCINATION.

MR. HOPWOOD asked the Secretary to the Local Government Board, Whether it be the fact that a child named Horace Best was vaccinated at Hull on June the 9th, and died on the 30th of June after great suffering, and that the cause of death was certified as "erysipelas;" whether there was any cause but vaccination; whether any other case of injurious effects from the same vaccine matter occurred at the same time; whether the parents have requested an inquiry to be conducted by some other person independent of the doctor who operated; and, whether any order has been given in consequence?

MR. GEORGE RUSSELL: We learn that the child was vaccinated on June 9, and that in the course of the second week after vaccination it contracted erysipelas, which began on the child's neck and extended down the unvaccinated arm and side, affecting the vaccinated arm last and least. This information was communicated to Dr. Walton, the public vaccinator, by the medical attendant, Mr. Cooper, who saw the child until its death on the 30th. He saw no special connection between the erysipelas and the vaccination, and told the parents so. We learn that erysipelas was the cause of death; that it appears to have been certified by Mr. Cooper as "general erysipelas;" that there is no reason for believing that vaccination had anything to do with the production of it; and that the other children vaccinated from the same lymph as the child Best had nothing (beyond regular vaccination) the matter with them. The parents asked for an inquiry as to the death of the child; but at present no action has been taken.

BANKRUPTCY ACT, 1869—WINDING-UP OF PROCEEDINGS.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether he proposes to take any steps, in accordance with the suggestion of the Acting Controller in Bankruptcy, to enforce the prompt winding up of old bankruptcy proceedings under the Act of 1869?

MR. CHAMBERLAIN, in reply, said, he was inclined to agree with the official referred to; but he had been advised that it would require fresh legislation to effect the object, and, of course, fresh legislation on the subject at the present time could not succeed.

EGYPT (FINANCE, &c.)—ARREARS OF TAXES.

MR. M'COAN asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether there is any, and what, truth in the following statement, telegraphed from Alexandria to a morning paper:—

"The Minister of Finance, directed by the English Government, has just issued a circular insisting on immediate payment of arrears of taxes. This measure forces the cultivators to sell their crops standing—in the case of cotton, three months before the harvest—to speculators, who take advantage of the scarcity of money to pay only about 60 per cent. of the normal value. The circular is disapproved by all the authorities here, and will vastly increase the misery and embarrassment of the fellahen."

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: No, Sir; Her Majesty's Government has not directed Mr. Egerton to issue any Circular to the above effect, and I am not aware that any such Circular has been issued.

BANKRUPTCY ACT, 1883—BANKRUPTCY OF R. B. SCARBOROUGH.

MR. DIXON-HARTLAND asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether, at a meeting held at the Official Receiver's (Mr. Cecil Mercer) under the bankruptcy of R. B. Scarborough (Receiving Order, 25th May 1884, Greenwich) the following facts were elicited from the bankrupt—namely, that he had not handed over his books and papers to the Official Receiver, nor disclosed a mortgage he had executed on his property; and whether the chairman of such meeting did express his opinion that it was a case that required the fullest investigation; whether, notwithstanding, the Official Receiver declined to examine the bankrupt when he came up for public examination; and whether the solicitor of one of the creditors specially sent for the purpose was refused permission to do so upon the ground that he had no written authority from his client; whether the Incorporated Law Society, on the 30th day of June last, obtained a Rule Nisi calling upon the Registrar to show cause why the solicitor should not be allowed to examine the bankrupt on behalf of his client; and, whether, notwithstanding the Rule is still pending, the Official Receiver has not consented to the bankrupt passing his public examination without being publicly examined as to his affairs; whether the attention of the Board of Trade has been called to the fact that the words "or his representative authorised in writing," in sub-section four of section seventeen of the Act, are being applied to barristers and solicitors; and, what steps he proposes, under the circumstances, to take?

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: I have made inquiries with respect to the Question of the hon. Member, and have received the following Report:—

"In the bankruptcy of R. B. Scarborough in the County Court of Greenwich.—It is not the fact, as implied in the Question, that the bankrupt's books and papers had not been handed over to the Official Receiver at the date of the meeting referred to; but it is quite true that the representative of the Official Receiver who presided at the meeting did express his opinion that it was a case requiring investigation. The Official Receiver did accordingly institute a full investigation into the debtor's affairs prior to the public examination, and having satisfied himself regarding them, he did not decline to examine the bankrupt, but limited such examination mainly to a verification upon oath of certain questions and answers which had previously been reduced to writing and signed by the bankrupt. It is understood that the Court refused to allow a solicitor, who professed to be acting for a creditor, to take part in the examination, because he was not authorized in writing as required by the Act. The Board of Trade have no knowledge of the action of the Incorporated Law Society in the matter. The passing of the public examination and the declaring it concluded is a matter entirely within the jurisdiction of the Court, which the Official Receiver can neither interfere with nor prevent. The attention of the Board of Trade has not been called to the fact referred to in the last clause of the Question. No steps appear to be either necessary or desirable."

Mr. George Russell

The Board of Trade are extremely desirous, as the hon. Member is aware, to have the fullest inquiry made into the conduct of the debtor in all cases.

INDIA—THE POST OFFICE (MADRAS).

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether he has noticed the assertions repeatedly made of late in the Madras newspapers that the Government of Madras have opened in the post office letters addressed to private individuals; whether he has noticed the fact that one gentleman has officially informed the postal authorities that he has evidence that his letters are regularly copied while in the Post; and, whether it is true that the members of the Governor's Staff, Madras, are allowed by the Governor to send letters Home at soldiers' rates of postage in a special bag from Government House?

MR. J. K. CROSS: The India Office has no official information on this subject, and I have been unable to find in recent numbers of the Madras papers the assertions to which the hon. Gentleman called my attention. It would save great trouble if hon. Members asking Questions about newspaper statements would give the references. As regards the last paragraph of the Question, I have to say that the Governor General and the Governors of Madras and Bombay have the privilege of franking a special bag.

EGYPT—MR. BLUNT.

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the Government intend to make any amends to Mr. Blunt for the treatment he received from Egyptian officials and English officials in Egypt?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: No, Sir; I am not aware that Mr. Blunt has undergone any treatment which would entitle him to receive amends.

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY gave Notice that he would call attention to the subject on the Foreign Office Vote.

INDIA (MADRAS)—SETTLEMENT OF TAXATION.

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether the Secretary of State will cause inquiries to be made into the complaints made by the Badaga and other native cultivators of lands on the Nilgiri Hills, Madras, against the settlement of taxation now being effected in their district; and, whether this settlement, dating from 1882, is of a novel character?

MR. J. K. CROSS: The settlement in question is not of a novel character. Its object is to ascertain titles, to demarcate forest reserves, and to define areas available for sale under the Waste Lands Rules. The Settlement Officer has reported that the definition of village boundaries is not popular with the some of the people, who have long been at feud with their neighbours as to grazing and other rights; but that they will soon become accustomed to it, especially as all the rights and privileges they have hitherto enjoyed are secured to them. In these circumstances, the Secretary of State sees no necessity for ordering an inquiry.

EMIGRATION (IRELAND)—THE TUKE EMIGRATION FUND.

MR. HEALY asked, Whether any Government officials audited or vouched the expenditure of the £46,000 of public money granted to the Tuke Emigration Fund; where can the accounts be seen; upon whose recommendation was this large sum given; and, will the Government explain who Mr. Tuke is, or on what grounds he was entrusted with such a disbursement, and if there is any precedent for it?

MR. TREVELYAN: The lists of persons sent out by Mr. Tuke's Committee have always been submitted to a member of the Emigration Committee acting under the Local Government Board, and the Government grant was never recommended until he was satisfied that the emigration had been carried out. There is no other audit of the actual disbursement of each grant, nor has it been considered necessary. The cost of emigration is considerably in excess of the grant, and proof of each emigrant having left the country is sufficient evidence of the fact that the Government grant has been properly appropriated. The Government made their grants under the provisions of Section 20 of the Arrears Act, which provided that grants for emigration purposes might be made to such body or persons as the Lord Lieutenant might approve. The Lord Lieutenant had every confidence in the gentlemen forming Mr. Tuke's Committee.

Grants have in the same manner been made to four other Committees formed in Ireland under the provisions of the section referred to.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR asked whether the attention of the right hon. Gentleman had been called to the list of paupers at Castle Garden sent out by Mr. Tuke's Committee?

MR. TREVELYAN: I have seen a notice in the newspapers about it. I will make inquiries on the subject.

MR. HEALY: Would the right hon. Gentleman answer that part of the Question as to who Mr. Tuke is?

MR. TREVELYAN: Mr. Tuke is a man of great benevolence, who has done great service.

LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)—THE DUBLIN SCANDALS.

MR. HEALY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If there is any foundation for the following statement of The Freeman in regard to the French-Cornwall case:—

"It is stated that Chief Superintendent Mallon has been relieved from the duties of Chief Superintendent of the Dublin Metropolitan Police pending the termination of the present inquiries and probable trials. His duties will be temporarily carried out by Superintendent Laracy, of the B Division ;"

if so, on what grounds and by whose orders was Mr. Mallon suspended; and, have the Government made any inquiry into the charges of neglect brought against Colonel Bruce, Inspector General, in regard to the French case?

MR. TREVELYAN: The statement quoted has no foundation beyond the fact that Mr. Mallon's time is so much occupied at present that it has been found necessary to give him some assistance in his ordinary duties; and by the desire of the Commissioner of Police this assistance is afforded by Superintendent Laracy. The Government see no ground for reviewing the conduct of Colonel Bruce.

RAILWAYS—CHEAP TRAINS ACT, 1883—THE MIDLAND RAILWAY.

MR. THOROLD ROGERS asked the President of the Board of Trade, On what principle the fares on the Midland Railway from Kentish Town to Upper Holloway are charged a Passenger Tax of five per cent, although the line has on both sides masses of houses, and although there is a street Railway (called a Tramway) from Kentish Town to Upper Holloway which pays no Passenger Duty, and therefore competes unfairly with this part of the Midland Railway?

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: According to the recommendation of the officer appointed to report on the applications under the Cheap Trains Act, 1883, the district to which the hon. Member refers is stated not to be one which in the opinion of that officer complies with the conditions specified in Clause 2, sub-sections 2 and 3, of that Act. If, however, the Railway Company consider themselves aggrieved by this decision, I shall be very happy, on receiving further application, to reconsider the matter.

LAW AND POLICE—COUNTY OF WATERFORD.

MR. O'DONNELL asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, How many police form the regular free force in the county of Waterford; how many of this force have been on service outside the county during the past six months; and, how many police have been charged as extra police to the county of Waterford in the same period?

MR. TREVELYAN: The free force is 219. The present extra force is 66. Without time for inquiry, I cannot say how many men, if any, have been sent out of the county during six months. If the hon. Member will repeat his Question on a later day I shall be happy to answer it.

STRAITS SETTLEMENTS—THE RAJAH OF TENOM—CREW OF THE "NISERO."

MR. STOREY asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the Dutch have yet given a definite reply to Earl Granville's Despatch of July 19th, so as to obviate further delay in the active operations for the release of the crew of the Nisero?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: Yes, Sir. Identical instructions have been agreed upon and despatched telegraphically, both by Her Majesty's Government and the Netherlands Government. They will be laid before the House.

MR. PULESTON asked if the noble Lord was aware that the Paper presented to Parliament on this subject was published in Holland four or five days before it was given to the Members of that House?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: I do not know what Paper the hon. Member alludes to, because the Blue Books published here and in Holland were at short intervals.

MR. PULESTON: The last Blue Book.

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: I do not think that is possible. The last Papers published are up to date.

MR. STOREY asked whether our officials on the spot have altered their oft-expressed opinion that action through or with the Dutch Government, for securing the release of the crew of the Nisero, is calculated to insure failure; and whether our officials on the spot have been consulted as to the proposed joint action of the British and Dutch Governments for the release of the crew of the Nisero?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: The action to which the officials on the spot expressed an adverse opinion was not the present plan, which contemplates the use of joint action by the two Powers should the Rajah refuse to release the crew. There have been frequent communications with the Governor of the Straits Settlements and the Acting Governor on the whole subject; and if the hon. Member will refer to page 68 of the Papers recently laid (Netherlands, No. 3) he will see that the plan now about to be carried out was communicated on July 12 to the Acting Governor, who has offered no objection to it.

MR. SLAGG: May I ask whether any further information has been received as to the condition of the crew?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: No; not since the last statement I made.

MR. STOREY: The noble Lord states that our officials on the spot have not objected to the present procedure. Tomorrow I will refer him to page 53 of the Blue Book, where the Acting Commissioner states that unless some compromise were effected between the Dutch and the Natives the lives of the crew would be sacrificed; and I will ask whether our Representatives in those parts have not consistently held to the opinion that action through the Dutch is sure to result in the death of the men?

POOR LAW (SCOTLAND)—APPOINTMENTS UNDER THE BOARD OF SUPERVISION—MESSRS. A. M'KINNON AND A. MARTIN.

DR. CAMERON asked the Lord Advocate, Whether it is true that Mr. Angus M'Kinnon has been appointed Inspector of Poor for the parish of Snizort, in Skye; whether it is true that Mr. M'Kinnon is also Inspector of Poor for the parish of Kilmuir, and lives at a distance of twenty-two miles from one district of the parish of Snizort, and seven miles from the nearest district; whether the Mr. Alexander Martin, who has been appointed collector of poor and school rates for the same parish, is correctly described as a boy of fifteen; and, whether the attention of the Board of Supervision has been called to these appointments?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR): It is true that Mr. Angus M'Kinnon has been appointed Inspector of Poor for the parish of Snizort. He is also Inspector of Poor for the parish of Kilmuir; but it was arranged at the time of his appointment that he should for the future reside at Uig, which is a place in the parish of Snizort, and is, in the opinion of the Board of Supervision, a convenient centre from which the two parishes can be worked. The Board of Supervision do not discourage the appointment of the same Inspector for two parishes, as it is often possible by this means to secure the services of a better class of Inspectors than could be obtained for the salary which one parish could afford to give. Mr. M'Kinnon's salary for his recent appointment is £31 10s. In such cases, however, the Board of Supervision require that the Parochial Board should appoint some person to receive applications in the parish where the Inspector does not reside; and, on receiving notice of Mr. M'Kinnon's appointment, the Board of Supervision called the attention of the Parochial Board to this rule. I am informed that Mr. Alexander Martin is a youth of 16 years of age; that he has been unanimously appointed by the Parochial Board as collector of rates in succession to his deceased father, for whom he had been doing work for some time past, and he has found security for his intromissions. Mr. Martin's appointment was not intimated to the Board of Supervision, the collector being exclusively the officer of the Parochial Board, removable at their pleasure.

PUBLIC HEALTH—CONDITION OF THE THAMES.

MR. THOROLD ROGERS asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he can inform the House as to the communications which have passed between him and the Metropolitan Board of Works as to the present condition of the Thames between London Bridge and Erith or thereabouts; and, whether he will be willing to lay upon the Table of the House the Correspondence which has passed between the parties who have called and paid attention to the facts, and the Metropolitan Board of Works and himself?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I have been for more than two years in communication with the Metropolitan Board of Works as to the very serious injury caused by the pollution of the Thames through the outfall of the London sewage. I have addressed several letters to the Board on the subject, and have received replies from them. If my hon. Friend will move next week I should be very happy to present the Correspondence to the House.

PARLIAMENT—PUBLIC BUSINESS—IRISH BILLS IN THE HOUSE OF LORDS.

MR. PARNELL asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether his attention has been called to the fact that five Bills, relating exclusively to Ireland, have been rejected during the present Parliament by the House of Lords after having passed the House of Commons, viz. the Limitation of Costs Bill, the Registration of Voters Bill, and the Compensation for Disturbance Bill in the Session of 1880; in the Session of 1883 the Registration of Voters Bill, and, in the present Session, the Poor Law Guardians Elections Bill; that, during the same period, only one Bill relating exclusively to Great Britain, viz. the Local Government Board (Scotland) Bill, was rejected by the Lords under similar circumstances; that, during the same period, the only Irish Bills of a contentious nature, other than Coercion Bills, which have received the Royal Assent, were the Land Act and Arrears Act, passed in the Sessions of 1881 and 1882;

and, whether, in view of these facts, and that five Irish Bills have been thus rejected to one Scotch and no English Bill, he will introduce the Poor Law Guardians Bill as a Government measure during the Autumn Session, or send it back to the Lords by tacking it to the Appropriation Bill this Session.

MR. O'DONNELL: I beg to supplement the Question of the hon. Member by asking the right hon. Gentleman whether his attention has been called to the fact that during the present Parliament upwards of 20 measures of reform for Ireland, introduced by Irish Members, have been rejected by Government majorities in the House of Commons; whether he has taken into consideration the fact that in the present Session alone two most important measures—one amending the Land Law Act, and the other amending the Labourers' Dwellings Act—were summarily rejected on second readings in this House; and that a third measure—the Purchase of Land (Ireland) Bill—was withdrawn by the Government, merely, I believe, to produce some political scenic effect; and, whether there is any possibility of the Irish people being relieved from the constant obstruction to Irish domestic interests by both Houses of the Imperial Parliament?

MR. GLADSTONE: I assure the hon. Member, who has put his Question for the purpose of what he calls scenic effect, if he wishes to call my attention to any matter, I must request that some Notice shall be given to enable me to give my attention to the very elaborate query such as that he has now framed. With respect to the Question on the Paper, I have no doubt that the recitals of the hon. Member are accurately made; but I have not had them under consideration except in connection with this particular subject. As regards the last paragraph of the Question, I regret extremely, in company with my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary for Ireland, the loss of the Bill to which the hon. Member for the City of Cork refers. The Question divides itself into three parts—one whether the Bill can be introduced as a Government measure; another, whether it can be introduced at the Autumn Session as a Government measure; and a third, whether it can be tacked on to the Appropriation Bill? Now, taking these in the reverse order, it cannot be tacked on to the Appropriation Bill; that is a practice contrary to Parliamentary usage.

Mr. ARTHUR O'CONNOR: The Paper Duties Bill.

Mr. GLADSTONE: I cannot undertake it. Moreover, if it were open to us to tack anything to the Appropriation Bill I am not sure that another measure would not take precedence over this. However, we cannot entertain that subject at all. Neither, at the present moment, can the Government entertain a proposal for the re-introduction of the Bill during the Autumn Session. The House, of course, will exercise its own discretion as to what it shall entertain during the Session; but if the Government were to go beyond this particular Bill—setting aside the case of urgent necessity—with reference to which they have advised Her Majesty to call Parliament together, it is quite evident that they would find it very difficult to stop the addition of other measures. There is one, for instance, to which the hon. Member (Mr. O'Donnell) just referred. The most important practical part of the Question of the hon. Member for the City of Cork I conceive to be whether it will be a Government measure. I cannot give a positive answer to that at the present moment. No doubt the hon. Member heard the reply of the Chief Secretary for Ireland the other day as to the keen regret with which he viewed the rejection of the Bill; and certainly we shall carefully consider whether it can be made a Government measure. A Bill of this kind, as Parliamentary Business used to be conducted—a Bill which was not opposed—not very seriously opposed in this House—

Mr. GIBSON: The conduct of the Chief Secretary compelled opposition.

Mr. HEALY: It was not divided against at any stage.

Mr. GLADSTONE: I believe it was passed without occupying a very great deal of the time of the House. In former times it was practicable to send Bills of this kind to the House of Lords within two or three weeks at the beginning of the Session; but they are now occupied by the debate on the Address. Supply has then to be taken, and the opportunities of discussing such a Bill as this are indefinitely postponed. All I can say is that the Government will take into their careful consideration the question whether the Bill can be made a Government measure; and, if so, it will be put forward in that light.

TOWNS IMPROVEMENT (IRELAND) ACT—THE ENNIS TOWN COMMISSIONERS.

Mr. KENNY asked Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland, If his attention has been directed to the fact that the Towns Improvement Act has ceased to be in force in Ennis consequent upon the lapse of the Town Commissioners; if a Resolution of the Ennis Board of Guardians, dated April 9th, was sent to the Local Government Board asking for instructions how to act under the new duty thrown upon them as Sanitary Authority, desiring to know if it was competent for them to take over the waterworks and to undertake the lighting of the town, and to levy the necessary taxation; if the questions sent were submitted to the Law Officers, and when will the answer of the Law Officers be given; if, under the Public Health Act, it is provided (see Clauses 80 and 232) that the lighting and cleansing of the town may be carried on by the Sanitary Authority; upon what grounds it is stated that the waterworks under existing circumstances vest in the Crown; and, if it is not perfectly legal for the Local Government Board to direct the Board of Guardians to assume control of them?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. WALKER): Sir, my attention has been drawn to the fact that the Towns Improvement Act has ceased to apply to Ennis, by reason of the Town Commissioners ceasing by their own default to exist as a Corporate Body. A case was submitted to the Law Officers, and they have advised that on the Town Commissioners ceasing to exist the waterworks vested in the Crown as bona vacantia. I think the lighting cannot be carried on by the Guardians under Clauses 80 and 232, nor a rate be levied by them for the purpose; nor is it competent for the Local Government Board to direct the Guardians to assume control over the lighting and existing waterworks. The case does not appear to have been contemplated by the Public Health Act; and I have brought in a short Bill to meet this and similar cases.

POOR LAW (IRELAND)—COLLECTOR OF POOR RATES, RATHKEALE
UNION, CO. LIMERICK.

MR. JOHN REDMOND asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether his attention has been called to the election of Mr. Michael Slattery as collector of poor rates for No. 1 District of Rathkeale Union, county Limerick; whether, on June 25th, the Poor Law Board fixed July 9th as date for holding the election; whether, on July 2nd, a meeting of the said Board, largely composed of ex-officio Guardians, passed a resolution postponing said election until 23rd July; whether resolutions negating former decisions of the Board are not illegal, according to the Articles provided for guidance of Boards of Guardians by the Commissioners of the Local Government Board without fourteen days' notice, and, consequently, whether the adjournment of said election was not illegal; whether, on the original date fixed for the election, namely, July 9th, a quorum of Guardians assembled and elected Mr. Michael Slattery poor rate collector for the district; and, whether such election was not perfectly legal?

MR. TREVELYAN: The original date fixed for the election of a collector was the 9th of July, as stated; and on the 2nd of July a resolution was unanimously adopted postponing it to the 23rd, on the ground that the majority of the Guardians would be unable to attend on account of the Assizes and the Coleraine Horse Fair. On the postponed date 32 Guardians attended, and a collector was appointed. It is true that Article 13 of the General Regulations as to proceedings of Boards of Guardians provides that no resolution previously adopted shall be rescinded without 14 days' notice; but the Local Government Board do not consider that that was ever intended to apply to a case such as this, in which a Board of Guardians, finding that circumstances would make it inconvenient to hold an election on the day fixed, unanimously adjourned it to another, serving notice on every member, and advertising accordingly. It would, no doubt, have been more strictly regular if the Guardians had received the applications on the date originally fixed, and then postponed the election. With regard to the election of Mr. Slattery, there is no doubt that it was not valid, as he was a sitting Guardian at the time, and therefore ineligible. The circumstances of his election were as follows:—Notwithstanding the fact that all the Guardians were aware of the postponement, four of them—of whom Mr. Slattery was one—attended on the date originally fixed. He handed in his resignation of the office of Guardian to the other three, who proceeded to elect him to the position of collector. The Guardians have no power to accept the resignation of one of their number, and Mr. Slattery was, therefore, still a Guardian until his resignation was accepted by the Local Government Board, who did not receive it until eight days later.

PUBLIC HEALTH (METROPOLIS)—THE DEATH RATE IN LONDON.

MR. RITCHIE asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether he has received a letter from the medical officer of health of St. George's-in-the-East on the subject of his late comparison of the death rate in the sub-district of St. John's in that parish with the death rate of St. John's Paddington, to the effect that in St. John's, St. George's-in-the-East, 314 out of the total number of 480 deaths registered there occurred in the infirmary of the parish, which is situated in that sub-district, and that 65 acres out of a total area of 98 acres are occupied by the docks with a population estimated at 348 persons, thus making the density of the population, exclusive of the docks, 244 to an acre; and, whether he proposes to make further inquiry into the facts of the case with a view of correcting the statement made by him if he finds his previous statement was based on insufficient information?

MR. GLADSTONE, in reply, said, he had received the letter to which the Question referred; and he assumed that the gentleman who wrote it would take whatever steps he thought fit to give publicity to it. The statement he (Mr. Gladstone) had made was strictly accurate; but there were circumstances which the knowledge of the medical officer enabled him to supply that modified the inferences to be drawn from it.

EGYPT—THE CONFERENCE.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: I wish to ask the Prime Minister whether he is in a position to make any statement with regard to the Conference?

MR. GLADSTONE: The Conference met to-day, as I rather think I intimated would be the case when I was last questioned on the subject. A point of considerable importance arose in the course of the discussion to-day on which the Plenipotentiaries found it necessary to refer to their Governments. They all of them undertook to press for an immediate reply; and I should hope that most or all of them will obtain it, even in the short time in which they hope to obtain it—that is to say, by the hour of Business to-morrow. They intend to meet to-morrow, in the hope that they may be in possession of a reply. I cannot say it is quite certain they will be; but I feel perfectly assured they will use every effort to press the matter forward.

SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES— THE FOREIGN OFFICE VOTE.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL asked the First Lord of the Treasury, When the Vote for the Foreign Office would come on? It would be very convenient to Members if some day for it were fixed; because there were many points of detail which would have to be discussed.

MR. GLADSTONE, in reply, said, that he thought they were sufficiently provided with Business for that night and to-morrow night; but he did not know whether the Business for Wednesday was absolutely settled, and it was a question whether the House should not proceed with the consideration of the first Zulu Vote. To-morrow's Business would be the Civil Service Estimates, and, he believed, the Irish Law Charges.

PALACE OF WESTMINSTER — HOUSE OF COMMONS — VENTILATION OF THE HOUSE.

MR. THOROLD ROGERS: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether the rumour is correct that on a late occasion, when the Houses of Parliament were exceptionally full, and should have been supplied with pure air, sewage gas by some agency was pumped into both Houses by those admirable authorities who manage the Metropolis?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I believe a Committee has been appointed by you, Sir, to inquire into this matter, and therefore I need not make a statement on the subject.

EGYPT (EVENTS IN THE SOUDAN)— THE TREATY WITH ABYSSINIA.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON: With reference to the answer given by the noble Lord the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, I beg to ask, Whether, by Article 3 of the Abyssinian Treaty, by which the King of Abyssinia engages to facilitate the withdrawal of the Khedive's troops from the Soudan, he is to allow those troops to pass through his territory, or whether it contemplates the sending of an army to the Soudan?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: There is a Question on this subject on the Paper for to-morrow, and I shall answer the hon. Baronet's Question then.

NOTICE OF RESOLUTION.

PARLIAMENT—THE LORDS AND THE REPRESENTATION OF THE PEOPLE BILL.

MR. WILLIS: I beg to give Notice that at the earliest opportunity I shall move the following Resolution:—

“That it is necessary to declare that the House of Lords, in rejecting the Representation of the People Bill for the purpose of forcing the Ministers of the Crown to dissolve Parliament, has abused its authority, encroached upon the prerogative of the Crown, and assailed the independence of this House; and, in refusing its assent to the Second Reading of the said Bill because it did not contain provisions for the redistribution of Electoral Power, has violated the fundamental right and privilege of this House to determine in what order it will redress the grievances that happen within the realm.”

MR. NEWDEGATE: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether Her Majesty's Government will give any facilities for the consideration of the Notice which has just been given?

MR. GLADSTONE: No application has yet been made for the consideration of this subject by the hon. Member who has given Notice; and it is not usual to reply to an application from another Member, even from one so much respected as the hon. and learned Gentleman.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY—ARMY ESTIMATES.

SUPPLY—considered in Committee.

(1.) £31,600, Miscellaneous Effective Services.

MR. PULESTON said, that upon this Vote he wished to call attention to the subject of the suspension of the Compulsory Clauses of the Contagious Diseases Act. In the course of the Session he had been anxious to obtain an opportunity for saying something on the subject under a little more favourable circumstances than he could have now, at that late period of the Session. However, late as the period of the Session was, he felt it his duty not only to his constituents, but to the public generally, to bring the question forward. Last year the Resolution moved by his right hon. Friend the Member for Halifax (Mr. Stansfeld) was passed by what he would call a sort of snatch vote in the House; and he thought he might say, without his right hon. Friend venturing to contradict him, that the country entertained the confident hope that after the triumph obtained by the right hon. Gentleman, the Government would, as soon as possible, give effect to it by bringing in a Bill based on the lines of the Resolution; no one could have dreamt that the Resolution then passed would have immediate effect given to it by the Government by repealing the existing law. He thought he had a right to say that the course taken by the Government was altogether un-Parliamentary and un-Constitutional. What he had complained of, and what he still complained of, was not that the Compulsory Clauses of the Act should have been suspended, but that they should have been suspended before anything was put in their place. They were promised that a Bill should be introduced. A Bill was laid upon the Table late last Session; but it was afterwards practically withdrawn by the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Hartington), who promised another Bill with some alterations. That Bill was also introduced and withdrawn, and a third Bill promised this Session. Nothing, however, had been done, and they were now at the close of the second year since the Compulsory Clauses of the Act were suspended. A Return had been issued by the War Office, in which the figures strongly indicated the deplorable consequences which had resulted from the suspension of the Acts. It must be borne in mind that those who were in favour of the Acts had not raised an agitation upon the subject. They had no paid Committee, no paid agents, and no paid secretary. They had neither spent hundreds nor thousands of pounds, and therefore they had no opportunity of replying to the enormous quantity of literature which was issued upon this subject day after day, and distributed broadcast throughout the country. Their only course was to bring the matter under the attention of the House; and, although he regretted to occupy the time of the Committee, no other course was open to him. He had received the other day a somewhat important letter, which he was about to quote, from the paid secretary of the Association for the repeal of these Acts, who, condescendingly referring to the answer of the Home Secretary to a Question he (Mr. Puleston) had put, wrote as follows:—

"Apropos of the Home Secretary's prepared answer to your Question yesterday, I beg to call your attention to the inclosed. If, as a superintendent of the police in your borough says—'It is preposterous that the Home Secretary should be hoodwinked in such a manner with the cock-and-bull stories about the much worse state of Devonport; surely it is not only preposterous, but disgraceful, that persons should seek to hoodwink you in a similar manner.'"

Now, he (Mr. Puleston) did not think he was very much hoodwinked in the matter. When he first went to Devonport, he went without prejudice. As far as he knew anything about the working of the Acts, his prejudice was rather against than in favour of them; but having paid, as he considered himself bound to do, a great deal of attention to the subject, having been President of the Royal Albert Hospital, and having gone into the figures and the assumed facts of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Halifax (Mr. Stansfeld), time after time, he felt himself unable to come to any other conclusion, with due regard to common honesty, than that the Acts, objectionable as they were to some people, were necessary. The noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War had told the House, on more than one occasion, in answer to himself (Mr. Puleston) and other Members, that it was no part of the duty of the Government to protect the morals of the community among whom these Acts were enforced. Perhaps the noble Marquess would bear with him when he said that that was not altogether so, because, if an Imperial Government established barracks, naval depôts, and dockyards in particular localities, they certainly owed it to the community at large to protect the inhabitants of such districts from the consequences of placing large bodies of soldiers and sailors there. He thought that so much, at all events, ought to be readily conceded by the noble Marquess. In view of the statement contained in the letter of the Secretary to the Metropolitan Repeal Association which he had just read to the Committee, he (Mr. Puleston) had taken pains to inquire specially into the condition of the subject at this moment in order that he might not be accused of quoting ancient history. He had, therefore, written last week to friends at Plymouth, Devonport, and Stonehouse, asking them to let him know how the matter stood now. He had received a letter from the Mayor of Plymouth—a gentleman who was known to a good many Members of that House. At one time the Mayor was Chairman of the Liberal Committee in Plymouth, and he was a man very much respected in the borough. Well, the Mayor of Plymouth said—

“I was at one time strongly opposed to the Acts; but, having seen the uniformly judicious action of the Metropolitan Police, and the great improvement that was brought about in our town, I was compelled to admit the beneficial influence of the Acts. Since the Government have ceased to give effect to the Acts, I can only say there is a general testimony as to the sadly altered condition of our streets, and also as to the great increase in the extent and virulence of disease. The magistrates are unanimous in their desire to see the Acts again in operation, and, at the same time, they feel that the local police are not suitable agents to be employed for the purpose. I see much of the opposition comes from Members who are ignorant, or who represent constituents ignorant, of the real working of the Acts; and I believe if they knew something of the places where the Acts have been in operation, not only reducing disease, but lessening prostitution, and, in many cases, leading to reformation, their objections would be withdrawn.”

He considered it right to trouble the Committee with these matters, because it was the only way in which he could give an authoritative denial to the leaflets that were constantly issued by the Association of which the right hon. Member for Halifax (Mr. Stansfeld) was the distinguished head. Surely, when he stated in that House, on the evidence of gentlemen of all political Parties, and of the magistrates, that they were unanimous in desiring to see the Acts again in operation, he trusted that hon. Members would accept that statement in preference to the one which was contained in the letter written to him by the Secretary of the Association. He thought the right hon. Gentleman himself, and his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Stockport (Mr. Hopwood) who sat near him, and who took an equal interest in the matter, would feel inclined to repudiate any such authority as that which he had quoted. The ex-Mayor of Plymouth, also a gentleman very well known, and possessing great influence in that part of the country, said—

“The increase of disorder in the streets, the increase of juvenile prostitution, the increase of disease, and the loss of the opportunities for preventive and rescue work, which were afforded and made use of under the operation of the Acts, are now remarkably apparent.”

Mr. Shelly went on to say—

“Suspension has had its natural effect, and the streets are still more disorderly than they were when the Acts were in operation. The magistrates are very stern, and do everything they can in order to minimize the effect produced by the suspension of the Acts.”

He adds—

“We are greatly shocked and alarmed at the large proportion of very young girls now in the streets. What I may call irregular prostitution—by servant girls, dressmakers, and even by women in a higher position of life—is on the increase. The fear of registration under the Acts was a great deterrent to women of this class, and the police, acting under the Acts, were able to warn them, and to prevent many of them from going astray; but this influence being now removed, there is no check upon them. I have had brought under my notice specially, both in this way and as a magistrate, the great mischief which is done by the large liberty granted to the boys on board the training-ships. This is a matter which ought to be brought to the notice of the Admiralty.”

He (Mr. Puleston) had received a great many other letters, with which he would not trouble the Committee; but they brought the question right down to the present day. The letter he held in his hand was one from a very prominent member of his constituency, who was disposed, in the first instance, to look favourably upon the repeal of these Acts, and who had done everything to study the question from a conscientious point of view. He wrote as follows :—

"Notwithstanding these views, with which you are familiar, one thing is very certain, and I am obliged to confess it—namely, that the disease is worse now than it has been for some time; and I may say emphatically that the disease is more prevalent in other places than it was before, and the increased prevalence of the disease is a matter of general remark, but I speak of it as knowing it in my professional practice."

The Town Clerk of Devonport, also, who was not a gentleman who did him (Mr. Puleston) the honour of supporting him politically, but who occupied a very high position in that part of the country, and was not likely to err in any statement he made, because he was constantly on the spot, wrote as follows :—

"There is a general concurrence of opinion in our town that the virtual discontinuance of the operation of the Contagious Diseases Acts, as regards their compulsory powers, has brought about a most remarkable state of things, only too apparent in the condition of our streets, and in the condition and behaviour of women and young girls of loose character. Here, as in other towns, it is found to be practically impossible for the local police to act without the Compulsory Clauses."

He (Mr. Puleston) had taken the liberty of reading the evidence of some of the leading gentlemen in the three towns, and thoroughly well known; and he could not imagine that it was possible for any hon. Member to get up in that House and argue in support of the views enunciated in the leaflets issued and statements made by this Metropolitan Repeal Association, or whatever its name might be. An important Memorial to the Prime Minister from the Association had been placed in his hands that afternoon. It was addressed to the Prime Minister by working men, and was represented to be "The Memorial of the Working Men's National League for the Repeal of the Contagious Acts." There were several statements contained in it which were altogether unwarranted. One was that, under the operation of the Acts, women were set apart for immoral purposes. Of course, that was simply untrue; there was nothing of the kind, either direct or indirect; and it was a remarkable fact that serious men, or a serious Association, should allow themselves to make use of such language, for which there was not the least foundation whatever. Among the papers put in his hands was a translation from a speech by a well-known French Professor, in which the speaker gloated over the action taken in the House of Commons, because he believed that it would help them in France to do away with State-regulated vice. Now, he (Mr. Puleston) would be just as much opposed to State-regulated vice, if it were introduced into this country, as any hon. Member opposite, and he would join cordially with them in preventing the adoption of any such scheme of registration, or anything else in this country which might connect the operation of these Acts with the system now in vogue in France. To assert that there was anything in these Acts in the nature of the French system was simply to mislead the public of this country. He knew that it was a very easy thing indeed to go upon a platform in this country, and place before religious people the enormous evil of State-regulated vice; but the agitation was conducted under a false name by paid agents. The Memorial he held in his hand professed to be signed by working men; but, on looking over the signatures, he found that they were those of professors of literature, editors of newspapers, and so on. Nevertheless, it was called a Working Man's Association. Against that Memorial he had another which was signed by every magistrate in Plymouth, with the exception of three, and their signatures were not appended to it simply because they happened to be absent at the time the Memorial was drawn up; but they were in agreement with their colleagues. He saw several hon. Members in the House, among others hon. Gentlemen representing Cornwall, who were well acquainted with Plymouth and the three towns, who would be able to judge of the weight to be attached to a Memorial signed, as this was, almost unanimously by the magistrates, and by more than two-thirds of the clergy of all denominations, medical practitioners, and gentlemen belonging to all shades of political opinion. He was glad to mention that fact, because one of the misfortunes connected with the question was that the Resolution of his right hon. Friend the Member for Halifax (Mr. Stansfeld) was carried by the votes of hon. Members on the other side of the House, and, therefore, the appearance of a Party character had been given to the vote. If the right hon. Member for Halifax and his Friends would only visit the three towns, or any other place where these Acts had been in operation, they would find that there was a unanimous opinion against their suspension; and surely the right hon. Gentleman would give the inhabitants of the three towns credit for possessing ordinary intelligence, and for not allowing themselves to be unduly biassed on this important subject. No one desired, naturally, to have Acts like these in operation. He should like to know who could desire them. But he remembered very well his Predecessor, Mr. Delaware Lewis, who represented Devonport in the Parliament of 1868, saying, just before the last Election—

“If you happen to defeat me there is only one thing I want to say to you, and that is, consider and study well the operation of the Contagious Diseases Acts before you take any stand against them. When I first came here I felt very much disposed to think that they were wrong, but I have given them very careful consideration, and I can only say to you that so far as my opinion may be of any use to you I hope you will act upon it.”

He (Mr. Puleston) had gone into the subject as well as he could, and every step he had taken only strengthened his conviction as to the good the acts had done. A Committee of the House of Commons sat upon the subject for four Sessions. His right hon. and learned Friend the Judge Advocate General (Mr. Osborne Morgan) was a Member of that Committee. He had reason to think if the right hon. and learned Gentleman had a bias either one way or the other, it was distinctly against the Acts, and in favour of the views of the right hon. Member for Halifax (Mr. Stansfeld). The right hon. and learned Gentleman, however, signed the Report of the Committee. The right hon. and learned Gentleman was well known in the House, and hon. Members on both sides had a great personal regard for him and for his intelligence, and would not fail to give him credit for desiring to act to the best of his knowledge. Yet the right hon. and learned Gentleman came to the conclusion that these Acts were among the best upon the Statute Book, and that they ought to be retained. The whole of the evidence went to show—after sifting it for four Sessions, and a laborious work it was—that the Acts were necessary; and the Committee, by an overwhelming majority, came to the conclusion that they ought not to have been repealed. But, in the face of all that testimony, Her Majesty's Government, to the astonishment of everybody, upon a Resolution, which might be said to have been snatched in a Division, came down to the House and gave to it, to the amazement of everybody—friend and foe—the sanction of law. Such a thing had never been heard of before. If they had determined that a Bill should be brought forward, and that pending the passing of it the Acts should remain in operation, their course would have been understood. What was more remarkable than all was that the three Cabinet Ministers who alone had to do with the Acts—the First Lord of the Admiralty, the Home Secretary, and the noble Marquess at the head of the War Office—were personally very strongly in favour of the Acts. Why was that the case? It was owing to the fact that of all the Ministers of the Crown they were the three Representatives of the Cabinet who alone had had anything to do with the subject, and they were unanimously in favour of the Acts. The other Members of the Government who were in favour of the Acts were his right hon. and learned Friend the Judge Advocate General and the Secretary to the Admiralty. Only recently, a deputation, headed by the Earl of Mount-Edgumbe—a deputation composed of gentlemen of the highest character and standing in their respective districts, including the Mayors of every place where the Acts were in force, waited upon the Government in reference to these Acts. The Earl of Mount-Edgumbe lived in the neighbourhood of Plymouth, and was perfectly well able to understand the operation of the Acts. No one could accuse him of saying anything that was deliberately untrue, and yet the statement issued by the National Association for the repeal of these Acts, with which his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Stockport (Mr. Hopwood) was connected, deliberately denied the statement of the Earl of Mount-Edgumbe as the mouthpiece of the deputation. [Mr. Hopwood: Hear, hear!] His hon. and learned Friend said “Hear, hear!” but he had very little doubt the statements made by the Association were made by men who had no knowledge of the communities among which the Acts were in operation. Was it reasonable to suppose that any hon. Member, or any individual, who had never paid any attention to the working of the Acts, and who had never lived in the communities in which they were in operation, could be sufficiently good judges of the effects of their working to pronounce that all men were liars who lived in the districts affected, and who were as honourable and as respectable as themselves? He had read a letter from the Secretary of the Association.

MR. STANSFELD: I have called no one a liar.

MR. PULESTON said, that if the right hon. Gentleman imagined for a moment that he attributed such words to him, he might disabuse his mind at once. He might add that he was quite satisfied of the sincerity of the convictions of his right hon. Friend as well as of those of his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Stockport (Mr. Hopwood). The person he referred to was the paid officer and Secretary of the Association of which his right hon. and hon. and learned Friends were active members.

MR. HOPWOOD: I am not a member.

MR. PULESTON begged his hon. and learned Friend's pardon. He had been under the impression that he was a member of the Association; at any rate, he had taken an active part in the agitation for the repeal of the Acts. The right hon. Member for Halifax (Mr. Stansfeld) was, he believed, a member of the Association.

MR. STANSFELD: I am not a member; but, nevertheless, I endorse the acts of the Association.

MR. PULESTON said, this was what the right hon. Gentleman endorsed—that the Home Secretary was hoodwinked with “cock and bull” stories about the moral state of Devonport; and it was not only preposterous, but disgraceful, that other persons should seek to hoodwink him (Mr. Puleston) in a similar manner. His right hon. Friend deliberately endorsed that view after the evidence he (Mr. Puleston) had produced in reference to the feeling of men of the highest character and position in the communities among which the Acts were in operation. What was he obliged to say now, that his right hon. Friend endorsed this statement? He was afraid that he should be obliged to rescind his withdrawal of the expressions complained of. There was no other course left open to him, because those who objected to the compulsory suspension of the Acts had not suffered themselves to be hoodwinked at all. He had already referred to the Memorial to the Admiralty got up by the magistrates, medical practitioners, and others in the boroughs of Plymouth and Devonport, and the township of Stonehouse. In that Memorial was the following statement:—

“We believe that although, if extended, the usefulness of the Contagious Diseases Acts would soon be greatly increased, and more universally recognised, they have been the means of removing a great amount of physical suffering, while they have been the road to reformation to many fallen women, who, were it not for the existence of these Acts, would never have had an opportunity of returning to a respectable course of life.”

Therefore, the right hon. Gentleman endorsed a statement which was absolutely untrue. He should be very glad indeed not to have the opportunity of connecting his right hon. Friend with these matters; but if his right hon. Friend endorsed this statement, he gave the lie direct—it was as well to call things by their right names—to the opinion of the magistrates of Plymouth and Devonport, and a large body of clergymen and ministers of religion of every denomination. He (Mr. Puleston) had no hesitation in saying that he believed the Memorialists were thoroughly conscientious in what they did. He was sorry that no one of greater force and weight than himself had undertaken to bring the facts of the case out, because he was entirely convinced that the suspension of the Acts had led to a greatly increased amount of suffering and immorality; and the amount of seduction which had taken place among young girls, now that the powers of these Acts were gone, hon. Members had no notion of whatever. A gentleman in Plymouth, who had taken great interest in the question, had published a correspondence upon the subject. He was a magistrate—Mr. Luscombe—and in answer to statements made by friends of the right hon. Gentleman he quoted a passage from the Report of the Select Committee of the House of Commons—

“That they would call special attention to the fact that in the course of 16 years not a single case has been brought before your Committee in which any women, alleged to have been wrongfully brought under the operation of the Acts, have brought an action or taken legal proceedings against the police authorities in respect of any act done by them under the Contagious Diseases Act."

Mr. Luscombe added—

"It is only necessary to look over the evidence given by the opponents, to be convinced that the slightest chance given by the police would have instantly become the basis of proceedings hostile to particular legislation."

The noble Marquess, on more than one occasion, and only the other day the Home Secretary, had pointed out that the local police could themselves enforce the Acts. Mr. Luscombe said—

"I am ready to admit the possibility to some extent; but there are services rendered by the Crown police only, and necessarily so, from the peculiar sources of information open to them. It is not merely the minimizing of a foul disease, but there is a suppression of youthful depravity in the rescue of children from the snares of vice in its most deadly form, and in the assistance ever ready to be given by the parent or guardians when the unexpected and dreaded absence of one of the home group creates a suggestion or terror intelligent enough to those who are familiar with the temptations too rife in a large community."

That statement had been made several times in answer to the remark that other agencies could effect the good which had been going on under the instrumentality of the Metropolitan Police. The local police under the existing Acts did not possess the power necessary to carry out the Acts as they were carried out before the suspension of the compulsory powers. Even if they were a central body, the local police were not competent to deal with the matter on account of their unwillingness. The superintendent of the police at Devonport was deservedly respected, and performed his duty very well; but, surely the statements of the principal people of the town, and the large majority of the most respectable inhabitants, ought to be worth something against the statement of the superintendent of the police. The superintendent of police, however, only referred to the order in the streets. Everybody knew what the condition of the streets in the three towns was, and what the state of morality was before the Acts came into operation; and the fact was, that they had grown greatly and undeniably worse since the suspension of the Acts. No doubt, during the time the Acts had been in operation, now some 16 or 17 years, the state of things had improved; but they were rapidly falling again into their old state. He was sorry the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War had endorsed the view that it was the duty of the localities to look after their own morals. What had the Societies for the repeal of these Acts done for these poor women? They had spent their money in agitating and in printing; but had they ever done anything to help these poor women by the establishment of voluntary lock hospitals? If they would visit the Royal Albert Hospital in Devonport, they would find that there had been a cessation of voluntary admissions, except in the most severe cases, and the nature of those cases might be taken as a type of an immense mass of disease not under treatment outside the hospital. Was that what hon. Members opposite wanted to promote? [Cries of "Oh!"] Hon. Members said "Oh!" but he made this statement on the authority of the Secretary of the Royal Albert Hospital, and if hon. Members doubted it, let them go there and make inquiries. Let them appoint a Voluntary Committee to look into the matter, and sit during the Recess in the three towns. Let them go into the whole question carefully, and let them have all the ministers of every denomination, magistrates, and others before them to examine them for themselves. If they would do that, they would soon become convinced that the consequences of the withdrawal of the Compulsory Clauses of the Act had been deplorable in the extreme. He had no wish to occupy the time of the Committee. Although there was a great deal more which he should like to say in connection with the matter, he thought he had said enough. He hoped that other hon. Members on both sides of the House would advocate a cause like this which had been so neglected by the Government, and which, in spite of all their promises, they had failed to legislate upon. They had admitted that it was necessary to substitute something for what they had taken away; and, notwithstanding the admission, they had allowed, and were allowing, these deplorable consequences of their want of action to go on from month to month. It would be quite an intelligible policy on the part of the Government if they said that nothing was needed. But to suspend the Acts without providing something in their place, although they admitted that something was absolutely and essentially necessary, was a most misguided policy. Not only was it unwise, but in this case it was the most cruel and deplorable policy that could possibly have been pursued by the Government.

SIR EDWARD WATKIN said, he was anxious to say a few words, not because he had not much sympathy with the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Halifax (Mr. Stansfeld) in his notion of the cruelty which might be perpetrated under these Acts, but because what had been reported and proved to him in the borough he represented (Hythe) compelled him to bring the plain logic of facts to bear upon the question. The borough he represented contained the Shorncliffe Camp at one end of it, and the School of Musketry at the other, and the experience of the borough showed that the suspension of the Acts must be looked upon as an unmixed evil. Last year a deputation waited on the Home Secretary, consisting of the principal authorities of Folkestone, Sandgate, and Hythe. He had introduced the deputation to the right hon. and learned Gentleman. What did they say? Sadly enough they informed the right hon. Gentleman that juvenile prostitution was largely on the increase; that as regarded the minor point of disorder in the streets, it was plainly and unmistakably on the increase; that as regarded the increase of disease, lamentable as it was, it was undoubted, and as regarded the virulence of the disease there could be no possible mistake. They, therefore, contended that undoubtedly a curse had been inflicted upon the borough by the abolition of the Acts. He could not find out that there had been a single complaint of abuse on the part of those who had administered the provisions of the Acts in Hythe. There had been no complaint against any of those who had been charged with putting the Acts in operation; and therefore they found themselves in this position—that whereas before the suspension of the Acts they had order, comparative morality, and a very large amount of effort for the reclamation of these unfortunate women, all that had now been reversed. They, therefore, said to Parliament—“Why inflict upon us this evil, when previously, by the operation of these Acts, we were relieved from the evils of which we complain?” He was one of those who thought the question might probably be solved even to the satisfaction of the right hon. Member for Halifax (Mr. Stansfeld) by a simple alteration—namely, by requiring that the examination of women should be conducted by women. He thought that would do away with a great deal of the antagonism to the Acts, and he saw no reason why it should not be done. It was complained that women only were subjected to this treatment; but if that was an objection, why did not the right hon. Member for Halifax bring in a Bill to treat men in the same way? He wanted to know if Parliament had any concern whatever in the future of the rising generation; and, if so, whether they were justified in allowing poison to be spread wholesale? He contended that it was the duty of Parliament to prevent the sowing of the seeds of degradation and of death. He hoped the action of the Government would now be changed, and that they would not allow themselves to be swayed by different sets of opinion. They ought to make up their minds collectively as to what was best for the people of the country, and there would be no difficulty if they would act in accordance with the vast body of opinion before them. The question was a very serious one; and he asked again, why should Parliament or the Government persist in inflicting upon the population evils which were incalculable in their consequences? When he had introduced the deputation to the Home Secretary, the right hon. and learned Gentleman said he agreed with them. On being asked why he did not act, he said that it was because Parliament had of its own account passed a Resolution for the suspension of the Acts. When told that Parliament would yield if the Government took a decided attitude, he then pleaded the Cabinet. He was satisfied that if the right hon. and learned Gentleman, on his responsibility as a Cabinet Minister, supported by the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War and the First Lord of the Admiralty, were to advise Parliament to re-impose these powers, they would not meet with a refusal.

MR. ACLAND said, he did not know that the question was intended to be raised, or he would have fortified himself with facts. He would, however, mention one fact which he thought he had mentioned before—namely, that many of the clergy, and even the Non-conformist ministers in and about the neighbourhood of the three towns, had expressed a most earnest hope that if the Government were not able to reimpose the Acts as they were before, they would do something to remedy the evils which had been brought about by their suspension. He had been told by one of the leading gentlemen in the three towns that he himself knew the Acts had had the greatest influence in deterring young girls from commencing an immoral career. He had discussed the question carefully with residents in Plymouth, and he must say that he had modified his own opinion to a certain extent since the vote was taken which led to the suspension of the Acts, and he believed there was some ground for the answer given by the Government that it was a question now for the inhabitants of the affected districts. It was, no doubt, in the power of the locality to do a very great deal to remedy these evils, and Glasgow was instanced as a place in which a great deal had already been done. Glasgow, however, was not in the same position as three or four garrison towns like Devonport, Portsmouth, Dover, and others, where it was a matter of necessity to the Government that a large number of soldiers and sailors should be collected. Therefore, although Glasgow had been able to succeed, it did not at all follow that Plymouth, Dover, and other towns would have the same success. At any rate, he thought that if the Government were not prepared to retrace their steps, it was their duty in some way or other to help the inhabitants of the places affected in remedying the evils which were now produced. There were one or two points which he wished particularly to bring to the mind of the Committee; and, first, he would direct attention to the appeal which had been made by the right hon. Member for Halifax (Mr. Stansfeld), the hon. and learned Member for Stockport (Mr. Hopwood), and their friends, for the repeal of the Acts. That appeal had been backed up by opinion wholly outside the affected districts. It was not supported inside those districts, and yet the latter were the only localities which possessed any experience or knowledge of the matter. It might be incumbent on the affected districts to do something for themselves; but, at any rate, it was incumbent on the Government to assist them. In the course of the agitation promoted by the right hon. Member for Halifax it had been frequently urged that every town ought to look after its own immorality; but he would ask whether it was not a highly criminal act for individuals to be constantly spreading disease, knowing perfectly well what the consequences of their proceedings were? In some of the garrison towns cases of the most aggravated character had occurred; and he contended that for any individual knowingly to spread disease was a criminal act. He was of opinion, much as he respected the liberty of the subject, that the Government had a right to prevent the spread of disease by the strongest possible measures. All he wished now to urge upon the Government was that in the interests of the people they could not afford to neglect the inevitable results of the accumulating disease in the affected districts, not only on account of social and moral reasons, but for sanitary reasons also. He quite agreed with the right hon. Member for Halifax that the Government ought not to lend its sanction to the regulation of vice; but he thought that the ordinary laws of the country ought to be directed to a certain extent to the enforcement of those rules of morality which ought to guide the conduct of every individual. There was even more than that in the case now under consideration, and they had a right to appeal to the Government for help. At any rate, the agitation which the right hon. Member for Halifax led was not supported by the districts to which the Acts applied.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, that, as far as the discussion had already proceeded, hardly a word had been said upon the relation of the subject to the Army. A great deal, however, had been said about the effect of the Compulsory Clauses of these Acts upon the order and morality of the towns to which the Acts originally applied; and, although the hon. Member for Devonport (Mr. Puleston) had said in a general way that the statistics laid upon the Table showed the enormous increase of disease that had resulted, he had not used any figures to prove the position he had taken up. He (the Marquess of Hartington) had had to deal with this subject chiefly, of course, with regard to the effects of this legislation upon the health of the Army. He had very little indeed to say on the subject of the indirect benefits supposed to follow from the operation of the Acts. He had been very much confirmed in the opinion he had previously formed that the effects of these Acts on the health of the Army were, owing to the extremely partial character of their operation, very slight, and also extremely fluctuating. That opinion was borne out by a Return which had been laid on the Table since the suspension of the Compulsory Clauses of the Acts. There had been an increase in the amount of disease since the suspension of the Acts; but he thought he would be able to show that it was not a large increase, and that it was one which might be attributable to other causes. Between the first week after the Compulsory Clauses had been suspended and the last week included in the Returns, after the suspension had been in operation for rather more than six months, the difference in the number of men admitted into hospital for this disease was very small, being only 0·86 per 1,000—that was, in a strength of 1,000 men, there were about 8-10ths of a man more admitted after the suspension had been in operation six months. The number was 3·78 before the suspension, and 4·64 six months after the Act was suspended. A similar, though smaller, increase had been going on in the 14 unprotected stations, in which there had been an increase of 0·18; there was, therefore, an increase of 0·68 due to the suspension, or a little more than half a man per 1,000 per week. The same Return showed that, during the same period, in the number of men remaining in hospital there had been an increase of 2·24 per 1,000, or two and a-fourth of a man. While there had, no doubt, been an increase since the Acts had been suspended, there had been fluctuations during their continuance quite as great. In the 14 protected stations, on the 12th of May, 1882, the ratio per 1,000 was 2·73; but in the month of September in the same year, while the Acts were in full operation, that rate had risen to 5·98, or to a larger rate than even now existed. It was, therefore, very difficult to attribute to these Acts any remarkable effect upon the health of the Army. The hon. Member for Devonport (Mr. Puleston), conscious of the weakness of his case, had not gone into these figures, but had confined himself to the cases adduced by the hon. Member for Portsmouth (Sir H. Drummond Wolff). He (the Marquess of Hartington) thought it was probable that, in consequence of the suspension of these Acts, the severer form of disease had increased in a somewhat greater ratio, though it was not shown to be greater by any figures, and neither himself nor the hon. Member was justified in making use of problematical or hypothetical results if the information was not absolutely before them. The hon. Member had dwelt almost entirely upon the moral effects of the administration of the Acts; but, as the hon. Member himself admitted, he (the Marquess of Hartington) had already reminded the House that with that the War Department had nothing to do. The Acts were not passed for the purpose of improving the morals of the people. Any effect which the Acts might have had in that direction had been purely incidental, and were not within the intentions of those who passed them. The Acts were passed simply and solely in the hope of improving the health of the Army and Navy, and of increasing their efficiency. He did not in the slightest degree under-rate the importance of the moral considerations brought forward by the hon. Member and others, but the object of the Acts was what he had stated. If it were possible by any improvement or alteration of the law, or by granting increased powers, to secure morality, by all means let it be done, and that was the object of the Bill introduced in "another place;" but that Bill had shared the fate of a great many other measures which had been abandoned for the present Session. The moral aspect of the question could only be dealt with by special legislation; and he believed it was still the firm intention of the Home Secretary to endeavour to pass a Bill similar to that which had passed the House of Lords. Surely anything that was done in that direction ought to be done upon the responsibility of the Government, and with reference to the whole country. They discussed the question fully last year, and all he could do was to repeat the statement he had then made on behalf of the Government. He denied that the decision on the Resolution of last year was in any sense a "catch" vote; and he did not believe that if the House were to divide on the question of the Compulsory Clauses again the result would be different. He had done all in his power to warn hon. Gentlemen who were in favour of the Acts what the consequence would be. He had, therefore, felt it useless to propose a Vote for the continuance of the compulsory powers exercised by the Government under the Acts. He also believed, and, indeed, he had stated the view of the Government, that the powers conferred on the Government under the Acts were permissive, and not compulsory, and it was entirely within the discretion of Government whether they would ask Parliament to provide the necessary funds for the administration of the Acts, or allow them to remain in abeyance. As he had said before, under the powers of the Acts it was left to the local districts and the local police to exercise the powers if they thought fit. The powers of the Acts still remained, and the only thing that was in suspense was the employment of the Metropolitan Police, in regard to which it would require the action of the Government and the approval of the House in order to provide the necessary funds. He believed that the approval of the House would not be given; and, therefore, the Government had lost no time in acting upon that belief, and in withdrawing, to a great extent, the Metropolitan Police. The effect of the suspension of these Acts upon the health of the Army, as he had shown, had not been considerable, although that there had been a certain effect he did not deny. What was done last year was done with the full knowledge of Parliament—that the decision would, to a certain extent, lead to evils of this kind. Nevertheless, the House voted deliberately in favour of the Resolution of the right hon. Member for Halifax (Mr. Stansfeld), and he believed if the question were put now a majority of the House would be still of that opinion, and would remain of opinion, that even an improvement of the health of the Army was not to be accomplished at the cost of enforcing these unpopular Acts. He had not concealed, and he had not altered his opinion, that these Acts had been beneficial, and he was convinced that the moral objections which were taken to them by his right hon. Friend and those who acted with him had no solid foundation. What he had said, and what he repeated was, that so long as the operation of these Acts was partial, and was limited to a few districts, the effect must be small. It was in vain to suppose that by the limited operation of Acts such as these any considerable effect could be produced upon the health of the Army; and, looking at the question from that point of view, he must admit that he was not surprised that those who entertained very strong moral objections to the operation of these laws should contend that the results which had been obtained, or could be obtained, were not sufficient to justify the continuance of Acts which were opposed to the moral sense of a great number of people in the country. The only other object which had been referred to was the promise which had been given with regard to the introduction of a measure dealing with the subject. It was his firm intention to introduce that Bill as soon as the state of Business in the House afforded an opportunity of doing so; but that opportunity had never yet arisen, and, from circumstances which took place a few weeks ago, it appeared quite impossible to introduce the Bill, or to hope for its second reading this Session. Until, however, that Bill had been introduced, and the House had been able to discuss the principle of the Bill, he contended that the results obtained under the powers conferred by the Compulsory Clauses which had been suspended were not sufficient to warrant the rescinding of the decision of last year.

SIR JOHN HAY said, he had heard with great regret the intimation conveyed by the Secretary of State for War that he had not been convinced of the necessity of reviving the Compulsory Clauses of these Acts. He had always himself supported the Acts, both on the ground of reforming the persons who were unfortunately brought under them, as well as on the ground that they were for the advantage of the Army and Navy and the public generally. He had risen now because the noble Marquess, in quoting the Returns, had alluded to the Navy as well as the Army, and had included the Navy as well as the Marines. He was, therefore, anxious to say a word on the subject. He thought the noble Marquess was wrong in saying that, owing to the great increase of disease in the Navy, there had not been a serious deprivation of the services of a large number of men. Now, the Returns he had consulted put the question in such a light that he would ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether, in consequence of the Navy being deprived of the services of 12,000 men since the suspension of the Acts, it might not be necessary to increase the Naval Force, in order to render it efficient? At Page 10 of the Returns, the Secretary to the Admiralty would see that the force being the same at Portsmouth—namely, 7,000 men during the year—whereas there had only been 800 in Haslar Hospital previous to the suspension of the Acts, there were now 1,111 men in Haslar Hospital. If they took Plymouth Hospital, they would find that the average number, which was about 500, although it occasionally went down to 360, had now gone up to nearly 900. The same thing had occurred at Plymouth, where the number of men in the hospital had been increased by 133 per cent.

THE JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL (Mr. OSBORNE MORGAN): Per 1,000, not per 100.

SIR JOHN HAY said, the number had risen to 230, or 133 per 1,000. The figures showed that there were nearly 2,000 men in hospital suffering from contagious disease in the course of last year, as against 1,000 in the last year in which the Acts were in force. In other stations there had been almost a similar increase; and this terrible contrast was also to be drawn, that whereas nearly 2,500 women were admitted into certified hospitals and discharged cured, with many of them reclaimed, during last year only 720 were admitted during the period of the suspension of the Compulsory Acts. This Return was, to his mind, more convincing than anything which could have been placed upon the Table in showing the advantage of the Compulsory Clauses of the Acts. He had always supported the Acts on moral grounds, and in regard to their advantage in preserving the health and strength of Her Majesty's Forces. He trusted that the Government would take his view, and take advantage of the experiment they had themselves made to re-enact the Acts, having already ascertained the evils which resulted from suspending them. He thanked the Government for having given this information to the public, and he thought it would completely justify them in reviving the Compulsory Clauses, which had done so much for all persons concerned. He was glad the question had been raised now, as it would prevent any reference being made to it when they came to the Naval Vote. He would, however, ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether the Board of Admiralty intended to add to the Naval Forces of the Crown, in order to make up for the increasing number admitted into the hospitals owing to the ravages of disease?

DR. FARQUHARSON remarked that, although he deplored the result, yet he could not help thinking that the action which the Government had taken in the matter had been forced upon them by the decision of the House, and it appeared to him that they had no alternative but to yield in the way they had done. They were now placed in the curious position of having practically suspended the operation of the Acts without substituting anything for them. It was promised, in the first instance, that a Bill would be introduced to put everything right; but there was not the slightest chance of any measure being introduced during the present Session, and they might have to wait for several Sessions before any fresh legislation took place. He quite agreed with the hon. Member for Devonport (Mr. Puleston) that the suspension of these Acts had been disastrous to the observance of order and decency in the streets. Juvenile prostitution was rapidly on the increase, and a large and influential deputation had waited on the Government the other day, and gave some deplorable facts as the result of the withdrawal of the Acts. They were told that the condition of women in many of these towns was most pitiable; that they were living in a state of misery and wretchedness rapidly approaching the condition they were in before the Acts were originally passed. All this misery, vice, and immorality was being brought about because the Acts were not in force. They were told that the Acts were not introduced in the interests of law and order, although, no doubt, law and order had benefited very much from their operation. They were told, also, that they were not brought forward for the benefit of the women who were principally affected by them, although they had undoubtedly received many benefits under them. Not only had they been early brought under the influence of medical treatment, but large opportunities had been afforded them of escaping from their evil courses and becoming once more respectable and reputable members of society. He maintained that the withdrawal of compulsory examinations was fatal to the efficiency of the Acts. He bore testimony to the admirable and skilful manner in which the Metropolitan Police and the doctors engaged in the administration of the Acts had carried out their duties, and the aid which the police had rendered in rescuing many girls in the streets who were trembling on the verge of vice. He stated that his firm and unalterable opinion was that in the absence of compulsory examination, the administration of these Acts must always prove a failure, and he regretted that this provision had been withdrawn.

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN wished at once to respond to the appeal which had been made to him by the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for the Wigtown Burghs (Sir John Hay), although the question the right hon. and gallant Gentleman had raised did not properly come under the Vote they were now dealing with. He entirely agreed with the right hon. and gallant Gentleman that the figures which he had quoted showed a decided increase of disease at Haslar, Plymouth, and Devonport. Anyone, however, who had followed the statistics of this subject must be aware that there were most extraordinary fluctuations in the number of persons affected. He said that by way of caution, although, of course, it was to have been expected that a large increase of disease should have taken place after what had occurred last year. But his right hon. and gallant Friend stated that those Returns showed that more men in the Navy were disabled, and asked whether the Admiralty had taken any steps to supply the places of those men. The figures quoted by the right hon. and gallant Gentleman were admissions to the hospital, and not Returns of men absolutely disabled during the year. There was nothing like the diminution in the strength of the Navy which had been indicated. Instead of 1,200 men being disabled from service, the excess of loss to the Navy throughout the year had been only 110 men. That, he thought, was not a matter sufficiently serious to warrant the Admiralty in taking steps to supply the gap with fresh men. There was really no cause for any such action being necessary, although there was no difficulty whatever in finding a sufficient supply of seamen.

SIR FREDERICK FITZWYGRAM said, that having held a command at Aldershot for many years, he could bear testimony to the beneficial effect of these Acts, which had been very great in one respect at least—namely, in the large decrease in the number of prostitutes since the Act came into operation. Some years ago at Aldershot, before the Contagious Diseases Acts were in force, there were known to be about 400 of these women parading the streets; after the Acts came into operation, the number had decreased, he believed, to slightly under 150; since the suspension of the Compulsory Clauses, the number had increased to 350 two months ago, and it had since probably increased still further. The Contagious Diseases Acts, although many hon. Members might not be aware of the fact, did not render the trade of prostitution legal. The trade was not an offence at Common Law, and the operation of the Acts was to limit a previously existing right. He contended that the beneficial effect of the Acts was shown by the state of their great camp at Aldershot, where, as he had already pointed out, the number of prostitutes had, while they were in force, been reduced from 400 to 150. He, for one, regretted the increased facilities for prostitution now given by the non-enforcement of the Compulsory Clauses.

MR. HOPWOOD said, he was rather surprised that the hon. and gallant Member who had just sat down should have described the Acts as beneficial in their operation at Aldershot. He had alluded to the reduction in the number of prostitutes. The evidence showed that in Aldershot they would have one regiment side by side with another, under equal conditions in every way—the one seriously affected with disease, the other comparatively free. Now, he doubted whether this law was likely to put the men on a better footing as regarded character. Surely there was something to be said on that question. The character of regiments had been shown to be the cause of the difference between them in respect of the amount of disease. One regiment was absolutely forgetful of decency and of the restraints of good character, when placed in the way of these temptations; while another with the same temptations avoided them. Now, with all respect to the gallant officers of regiments, might they not do more for their men? If they set the necessary example, it might be that they would do much for the reclamation of their subordinates. He had once asked the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War in that House this Question—he wanted to know why soldiers, more than any other class of Her Majesty's subjects, were to be protected by special laws from the consequences of their acts? And he put the same question now, because he thought that this was the groundwork of the Acts, and it was that which touched the moral sense of the nation. These Acts were passed in 1866-9, while the people were unaware of what was being done. It was said that the vote of the 20th of April, 1883, which condemned them, was a "snap" vote; but he asserted it was the result of a consensus of opinion of the majority of that House. A certain number of hon. Members on the other side who were in favour of the Acts stayed away; they dared not vote for them, and they abstained from doing so. Taking the majority, then, it was a very significant fact that the House was never more representative of the voice of the nation than it was on the occasion referred to, when the Acts were curtailed. But the conversation they were having had shown that a very great improvement had taken place in the conscience of the Government Departments statistically. It was a matter for wonder how that had been secured. For long years his right hon. Friend the Member for Halifax (Mr. Stansfeld) had fought this battle, during which time he had been met over and over again in that House with statistics of the most convincing and overwhelming character—if reliable—from the Departments in favour of the Acts. There had also been paragraphs inserted by authority in The Times and other newspapers describing the flood of blessings which this legislation had shed upon the British Army and Navy. But they found now, by the Report of the Committee on which he had had the honour of serving, what had been the actual result during the last 14 or 15 years—a trifling saving, if even that could be accredited to the system. Now they had it on the high authority of the noble Marquess that they must not rely on this sort of figuring, and found upon it these conclusions, because he had discovered for himself that the Acts had not done much good. He and his hon. Friends congratulated themselves on having one of independent judgment to preside at the War Office. The Department of the noble Marquess had given a complete answer to his right hon. Friend opposite (Mr. Cavendish Bentinck). The noble Marquess said that even when the Acts were in force the admissions, taking occasional periods of time, had been more numerous than they were now; and therefore, he said, they could not be too cautious in making use of the statistics. The best test they had were the Returns furnished for the six months which ensued on that very decisive vote that was given on the 20th of April, 1883. It appeared that at the end of that time the admissions per week had increased by a fraction of a man per 1,000. The noble Marquess, he was aware, had dealt with another set of statistics, and had said with regard to the continuance of the men in hospital that for the same period there had been an increase of those remaining in hospital. He did not want to dwell too much upon figures; it had always been their contention that they should not be too much relied upon—at least, his right hon. Friend (Mr. Stansfeld) had always contended for that, and he (Mr. Hopwood) had added his protest; but they were not listened to. But this he would say, if the disease, as was alleged, had so much increased, the admissions into hospital would have increased correspondingly. But it appeared there had been little or no such increase. He had had to ask Questions also in that House with regard to the statistics from the Admiralty. The right hon. and gallant Admiral opposite (Sir John Hay) had been dwelling on the Return relating to the Navy. And what had happened with regard to that branch of the Service? Ever since these Acts had been in force, certain ports had been subjected to them. Some years ago, Sir Harcourt Johnstone had moved for a Return comparing five ports in subjection with five ports not in subjection to the Acts. Would it be believed that in making that Return the Admiralty ranked 4,000 boys as men, and with regard to the prevalence of disease, gave the benefit of that classification to the subjected districts? That had been over and over again pointed out to the Secretary to the Admiralty as vitiating the Annual Reports; but it was not until last year that the Admiralty were brought to admit that the mode of comparison was misleading. Misleading! He should say it was playing with the House of Commons; he called it making statistics to justify a false conclusion. Last year the Admiralty promised to leave it out of the Navy Report. But they had only left out a portion of it. Their attention had been called to two tables in which the same error existed, and when reproached with it they said it was no error at all; they had the hardihood to say there was no error in ranking 4,000 boys amongst men; but they added that in the next Report, as the operation of the Act had been suspended, the classification would not be presented to the House. He said that the Return in question was an unfair and unjustifiable statement; and, as a matter of figures, he was bound to say that it shook one's confidence in all the official Returns with regard to such things. Now this matter, with regard to the Acts, was a fancy of the Heads of the Departments and of some hon. Members; and it was also a fancy thing with some in society. It was, in his opinion, dangerous that those who advocated the Acts should be trusted to prepare unchecked the statistics which they put before the House. He was not going into the whole of the wide subject that had to be dealt with. He did not think it would be in good taste, because he was exceedingly glad to hear the opinion which the noble Marquess had expressed, and to perceive that he had taken up an important position in relation to the subject. But he (Mr. Hopwood) was anxious to refer to the question of morals. The idea of the hon. Member for Hythe (Sir Edward Watkin) was that those opposed to the Acts relied on fear of disease to deter young men from a departure from virtue, but that, for his part, he advocated protection for them. He would ask the hon. Baronet whether there was any such thing as the Code of Ethics, which he would apply to the conduct of the nation? His only idea was that boys should be kept from disease; and that seemed to be his notion of morality. The idea of the Acts was that greyheaded fathers should say to their boys—"Never mind those who teach that morality is right and self-restraint is necessary; we have thrown aside all that sort of nonsense; we have passed an Act to make vice safe; listen to the teachings of the Legislature, and not of the divines." The public standard of morality was thus altered. Some hon. Members had said that the Acts produced order in the streets. They had been challenged over and over again on that point. There was not a word in the Acts which gave a policeman power even to question loose women; and a great deal that they did under the Acts was perfectly illegal, and ought long since to have been put an end to. It was said that they produced order. In what way? The policeman was made the tutor, the conductor, and the gaoler of women diseased, and he was set over them in command. And that was called preserving order! Why, they had no power under these Acts to interfere with women from the day they were on the register, provided they came up at the prescribed times for examination. Then it was said—"You know there are a number of people who disagree with you—estimable, religious people, and so on." Of course, he granted that. But what was the explanation? He would take one or two of the clergy thus cited. One gentleman was a Roman Catholic priest, and two or three instances of clergy of different denominations had been cited. Why did clergymen like the Acts? Clergymen were, as a rule, ready, in what they deemed the cause of religion, to pass Acts of Parliament arbitrary and tyrannical; and their idea was that if frail women could be got within the net, and placed under the influence of the clergy, or under other influence which they believed to be good, the legislation would be justified; and that was what they desired to do. Accordingly, they relied upon getting women into hospitals, and upon being then able to set to work to convert them. What could be more striking than the hypocrisy of asserting, on the one hand, that their intention was to reclaim, to guide to holier influences, while, at the same time, they put women on the register, submitted them to inspection, forced them into a hospital, and then went through the mockery of introducing the chaplain to them? They did not, and naturally they could not, expect their opponents to share their sentiments in this matter. But they knew that the majority of their countrymen would not allow these filthy Acts to be continued in any shape, not even by a Bill in the Lords, such as had been brought in for the amendment of the Criminal Law. This legislation, he was glad to say, was doomed. In 1871 a Royal Commission sat to inquire into this matter, and they arrived at the same conclusion that the House had arrived at by its vote. For more than 12 years successive Governments had gone on, in the face of their advisers, imbuing the population with the filth of this legislation, and in spite of the strong efforts made against it. Would they go on in this way? It struck him that their masters would take care they did not, and they would not need a strong appeal to make them come to that conclusion.

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK said, he did not think the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War had much mended his case by what he had said that night. He had not offered what could be called a strong defence of the course which Her Majesty's Government had thought proper to take in this case. He was obliged to join issue with the noble Marquess on one point—namely, that these Acts were originally passed for the benefit of the Army and Navy alone. It was quite true that that was the principal ground of policy on which the Acts were introduced; but at the time that they were carried, there were many Members, amongst whom was himself, who supported the measure as being in the interest of unfortunate women, and who, touched with pity at the miserable condition to which those unfortunates were reduced, were determined to do all that might be in their power to rescue them from the state of degradation into which they had fallen. That had been his motive for supporting the Acts when they were introduced into the House of Commons; and it was perfectly well known that there were many other Members whose motives at the time were the same. The noble Marquess had referred to the Returns of the Army; but he (Mr. Cavendish Bentinck) was bound to say that they were not satisfactory Returns to him in any way. They only came down to the end of last year, when the actual effect of the suspension of the Acts was not plainly visible; and he could not agree with the conclusions which the noble Marquess had drawn from them, for even in the short period referred to of the year 1883, while in the protected stations the average strength was 39,100, there were 6,960 admissions; whereas in the previous year, when there were 40,900 men, there were 5,927 admissions. There was, therefore, upon the noble Marquess's Return, a difference of 1,000 as between the two years. That he regarded as a very considerable amount; and so far as his own information, obtained from general officers, went, and as the result of his own observations, he believed that a great deficiency had occurred in the effective ranks of the Army owing to the suspension of the Acts; and he expected that the next Returns, when brought out, would show a still further diminution in the general efficiency of the Forces. Moreover, the noble Marquess, in this curiously-constructed Return, had not given the various forms of disease; the more severe and the lighter forms were jumbled together; and they were entitled to know whether there had been any increase in the former.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: The Returns of the hon. Member for Portsmouth (Sir H. Drummond Wolff) are on the Table, and if the right hon. and learned Gentleman had objected to them, the form could have been amended.

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK: That was for the noble Marquess to do, so far as the Army Estimates were concerned. But he (Mr. Cavendish Bentinck) had suggested to his hon. Friend the addition with regard to admissions of women into hospital, and he should also have to refer to that subject again, and bring to bear upon it figures that were absolutely reliable. He was bound to say that Her Majesty's Government had shown great vacillation and inconsistency—that would not be denied—in this matter, because if the Acts were bad they ought to have dealt with them a long time ago. Why had they been allowed to continue in force for 17 years? He remembered the time at which there were very strong local objections to the Acts, but one by one they had fallen off; and now they were told, and most truly, what no one in the House would deny—that in the subjected districts the Acts were most popular, and that there was a strong desire on the part of the majority of the populations there that their provisions should be revised. Then he came to the next point—what was now the policy of Her Majesty's Government? First of all, they had introduced the Detention in Hospitals Bill, which had been practically withdrawn; then, in answer to a deputation the other day, the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department said that a remedy in the shape of a Criminal Law Amendment Bill would be forthcoming; but the noble Marquess knew well that that Bill never had the slightest chance of passing in that House, for it was objected to not only by those who shared his (Mr. Cavendish Bentinck's) views, but also by hon. Members below the Gangway opposed to the Acts, and denounced by publications which represented their particular views. It was the general opinion that the Bill never had the least chance of success—certainly not this Session; and, from the nature of the Business which the House would have before it next Session, he did not think there was much likelihood then of its passing, or even being considered. Therefore, he felt justified in making charges of vacillation and inconsistency against Her Majesty's Government on account of their having suspended these useful Acts, and in having proposed one measure which they had not carried forward, and then in having put forward another which was not likely to become law. The result of this vacillation and inconsistency had been, as was generally the case with the policy of the Government in reference to most questions, disaster; at all events, it had proved disastrous to the unfortunate women whom he, for one, desired to be protected by the Acts. Now, if prostitution were not abolished—and he did not think the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Halifax (Mr. Stansfeld), who represented the views of the Repeal Association on the Committee, had ever proposed to abolish it, or make it criminal for a woman to carry on the trade of a prostitute—how were these women to be relieved? They could not be got into hospitals of their own free will; he should be able to show that nothing of the kind could be done. The country had an excellent law on this subject; it had been suspended, and nothing substituted for it; the Government had found order existing, and replaced it by chaos. He had taken some trouble to investigate this matter by the light of what had occurred at the London Lock Hospital, to which he had been for many years a subscriber; he had personally attended upon the House Surgeon and the Secretary, and obtained some statistics which perhaps the noble Marquess might place upon the Table as a Parliamentary Return, for they were very interesting statistics with regard to the condition of women in the hospital. Well, then, in the London Lock Hospital, comparing the year ending on the 30th of June, 1882, with the year ending on the 30th of June, 1884, the total number admitted on the Government side was 464 in the former period; whereas, in the latter, the number had fallen to 207; and the number of cases of gonorrhoea, which in 1882 was 183, had dropped to 20. Constitutional or secondary syphilis had risen from 33 per cent to 55 per cent, and the average duration of treatment had extended from 23·31 to 52 days.

MR. PULESTON: The average duration in the Royal Albert Hospital has risen from 30 days to 60 days.

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK said, the figures he had quoted showed that while there was the enormous reduction from 464 in 1882 to 207 in 1884, the percentage of cases of constitutional syphilis had risen from 33 to 55. He had a letter from the House Surgeon of the Lock Hospital, who, in forwarding the Return to which he (Mr. Cavendish Bentinck) had just referred, said—

“While the number of women relieved has enormously decreased, the disease under which they suffer is of a very aggravated kind.”

He (Mr. Cavendish Bentinck) would now take the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Hartington) to the Chatham Hospital. Miss Webb, writing from Chatham on July 4, 1884, said—

“In answer to your letter received to-day, I consider we may say we are, since the suspension of the police, in about the same position as before 1870; therefore, a fair comparison should date within a short time of that period and now. The admissions to this Hospital, from July 1, 1871, to July 1, 1872, were 614. The number of beds usually occupied, 60 to 68; on one occasion, 73. Detention in hospital, 28-36 days. Owing to the benefits conferred by the 'C. D. Acts' in their entirety the numbers of admissions decreased, and from July 1, 1881, to July 1, 1882, they were 474. The number of beds occupied, 26 to 30. Detention in hospital, 24-58 days. On the suspension of the police, Shorncliffe Hospital was closed, and the patients of that district are received at this Hospital. With that addition, the number of admissions from July 1, 1883, to July 1, 1884, have been 164. The number of beds occupied, 13 to 26; on one occasion, 30. Number now in hospital 20, three of whom have been under treatment for more than seven months, and are still too ill to be discharged, and two came in two days ago likely to want as long treatment; few are able to be discharged under three or four months in the present state of things."

That was the result of the suspension of the Contagious Diseases Acts. In the Chatham Hospital, also, the number of admissions had fallen very much; but the diseases under which the unfortunate women suffered were of a very aggravated kind. Miss Webb also told him that 53 out of the 75 admissions during the last six months were very bad cases of secondary disease, and more of such cases were being admitted. He had a further letter from a gentleman who was well acquainted with the matter. His correspondent wrote—

"You may be assured that the reports you received yesterday from the House Surgeon at the London Lock Hospital, as to the relatively greater number and the increased severity of the cases of secondary syphilis are precisely what you would receive at all the certificated Lock Hospitals. What is worse, at Portsmouth and Devonport especially there are now a much greater number of very young girls between 17 and 20 than there were formerly, many of these affected with the worse forms of syphilis, and the statements made by them in hospital confirm the belief that there must be large numbers of young girls on the streets infected with the most virulent type of syphilis. They will not seek admission until compelled to do so by the severity of their sufferings, and the cases are necessarily much longer under treatment."

These were the results which were always prophesied by the supporters of the Acts. The witnesses who gave evidence before the Committee stated over and over again that women would not go into hospital until they were compelled, or if they did they went in too late and came out too early. It seemed to him that if ever the female sex had been misused, they had been misused by the policy adopted by the right hon.

Gentleman the Member for Halifax (Mr. Stansfeld) and by the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Stockport (Mr. Hopwood). He (Mr. Cavendish Bentinck) had always endeavoured to befriend the women. [A laugh.] The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Stansfeld) laughed; but did he think it right that these poor unfortunate women should not be admitted to hospital; did he think it right they should be allowed to rot and starve in the streets? Was the right hon. Gentleman a subscriber to the Lock Hospital? No, Sir. Was the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Stockport (Mr. Hopwood) a subscriber to the Lock Hospital? No. They considered it wrong to subscribe to such a place; but it was a great pity they did not visit the hospitals, and see what a great advantage they were to the unfortunate sex whose cause they claimed to espouse. There was a Society opposed to the Acts called the Rescue Society, the Secretary of which was called as a witness before the Committee. The Society had a very limited operation, and one of the pieces of information which the Secretary gave them was that they never, on any consideration, in these later times took in a woman who came from a subjected district. This was an instance of the Christian charity on the part of the Rescue Society; this Society declined to have anything to do with any abandoned woman who had come from where the Acts were in force. He had only that morning received a further letter from Miss Webb, and it was so interesting that he did not hesitate to read it to the Committee. Writing on July 25, 1884, Miss Webb said—

"I have so lately sent you statistics of the number of women who have passed through this hospital at different periods, that I will now only add, what has been brought to my notice lately, by ladies who devote their time to 'rescue work' in these towns; they tell me the state of the place with regard to immorality, is worse than they have ever known it, and two clergymen who I met a few days since, told me they had never known such a sad state of things in all their experience, as it has become since the suspension of the 'C. D. A.' police. I have been asked to help to trace girls gone astray, which I could have done easily when the Acts were in force, but am now powerless. Only two days ago two ladies came to me about a child, not quite nine running about barracks in danger of harm; her mother being in here. Had the 'C. D. A.' police been on duty, that child and many quite as young would have been placed out of danger. I am aware this has been fully represented by the deputations in favour of the 'C. D. A.' and I am also aware that one argument is that 'rescue work' was not the intention of the Acts, but only incidental. Granted. Take it on sanitary grounds. There are only 20 women in hospital, and that from eight towns, with a radius of 10 miles round each, under (we can no longer say protected by) the 'C. D. Acts.' Though I came here solely for the purpose of trying to reform the poor women brought under the 'C. D. A.,' a time has come when the exigencies of the case require I should speak plainly, however painful to myself. The argument that women are injured by these Acts, I, after 14 years' experience, pronounce absurd. These unfortunates make a trade of their passions. Should the Police be restored (which is much to be desired) I would like a clause added to the Acts—namely, that once a doctor has pronounced a woman must be received into hospital, the police should not lose sight of her, on the plea that she 'wants to lock up her house,' etc., etc. Numbers have come in after, semi-intoxicated, and boasted to their companions of the mischief they knew they had done in the two or three hours so gained of liberty. Should such creatures—I cannot call them women—be allowed to go on unrestrained?"

That was the experience of everybody who had had to do with the Acts, and certainly it was his experience of the evidence which was given before the Committee. He was not aware that any witnesses thoroughly acquainted with the working of the hospitals had been brought to contradict the evidence which was given by the persons practically acquainted with the working of the Acts. In fact, almost all the witnesses who were produced by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Stansfeld) were witnesses who, when pressed, said the real fact was they knew nothing about the matter. That being so, what answer had been given to the statements of the supporters of the Acts? What was to be said on behalf of those who would deny to these poor women the great benefits they had received from the Lock Hospitals? It was the old argument of superstition which was really at the bottom of the opposition to these Acts—namely, that these diseases were God-made punishments. Such an argument had been repeated to him over and over again at the time of a Parliamentary Election. He attended a meeting at Exeter Hall not long ago. He heard the hon. Member for Liverpool (Mr. S. Smith) make a speech; but he was bound to say that a more superstitious speech he never heard. It was so superstitious that even the audience objected to it. It was argued at the meeting that it was an offence against religion and morality to relieve the sufferings of these unfortunate women. Was that Christian charity? If so, it was not charity he (Mr. Cavendish-Bentinck) cared to practice. He was glad reference had been made to a certain Memorial to the Prime Minister against the Acts. He found, however, that most of the signatures to the Memorial were those of members of Radical Clubs, Trades Unions, and other similar Societies, who for some years had taken an objection to the Acts; but he could not exactly understand why. One of the paragraphs of the Memorial was to the effect that the tendencies of this legislation was to force women into the hands of irresponsible officers. He denied that a policeman was an irresponsible officer, and the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Stockport (Mr. Hopwood) would not say, as a lawyer, that a police officer was an irresponsible person. A policeman was responsible to his superior and to the authorities. If ever there had been a case of misconduct brought against a policeman—no case had as yet been brought—he (Mr. Cavendish Bentinck) had not the slightest doubt the man would have been punished. Another paragraph of the Memorial was to the effect that the power given by the Act was abused. A more untrue statement was never made, and he was surprised to see amongst the signatures to the document that of the hon. Member for Stoke (Mr. Broadhurst). The hon. Member had before him all the evidence given before the Committee, and, therefore, it was surprising he should have neglected to examine that evidence before he signed a document which contained statements so deliberately false as the one to which (Mr. Cavendish Bentinck) had called attention. As hon. Members knew perfectly well, there was no instance in which virtuous young women had been hurried into a life of prostitution by the action of the police, as was alleged in the Memorial. If there had been such a case it would have been brought before the Committee, and its merits would have been adjudicated upon by the Committee. Another basis for opposition to the Acts was that of intolerance and prejudice. It was a most surprising thing that so few Scotch Members supported the Acts. He did not know what had become of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Edinburgh (Sir Lyon Playfair), who used to defend the Acts so energetically; but he knew that the right hon. Gentleman was still a strong advocate of the Acts, and he also remembered that, not long since, a most able speech was made in the House by his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for South Ayrshire (Major General Alexander)—who he regretted not to see in his place—in answer to another very powerful speech against the repeal of the Acts. No doubt, considerable Parliamentary pressure had been put upon Scotch Members to induce them not to vote and speak in support of the Acts. That was one of the reasons why he had always advocated secret voting in the House on occasions of this kind. Under such a system they would really get at the true opinions of Members, because Members would not be afraid of an adverse vote at the next Election. How was it, he repeated, that the Government had allowed the Acts to continue in operation for 16 years without taking any action? Why, last year, when the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Halifax (Mr. Stansfeld) proposed his Resolution, the Government did not make up their minds until the eleventh hour as to which way they would go. The House were always led to suppose that, as three Heads of Departments—the Home Secretary, the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War, and the right hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Osborne Morgan), who represented the Government on the Committee—were in favour of the Acts, the Members of the Government would vote for them; but, at the last moment, the majority were found going the other way. The right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government appeared to have given the word of command that the wishes of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Halifax (Mr. Stansfeld) were to prevail, so the Government support melted away like wax, and a vote adverse to the Acts was taken. He (Mr. Cavendish Bentinck) could not congratulate the Government on the course they then took. He thought it was their duty, if they meant to oppose the Acts, to have used their influence, and not to have led hon. Members on the Opposition side of the House to absent themselves, as many did, in the belief that, as this was a Government question taken on the Motion to go into Committee of Supply, there was no need for them to come down to vote. He could not conceive how the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister could reconcile the position he had taken up upon this question; because the right hon. Gentleman was Chancellor of the Exchequer when the Acts were passed, allowed the money to be voted for the purpose of carrying out the Acts, supported the Acts all along, and then absented himself on the occasion of the memorable Division on the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Halifax (Mr. Stansfeld). If hon. Members looked at the Petitions which had been presented against the Acts they would find that almost everyone of them sprang from one class of society; they came principally from the Dissenting or Nonconformist Bodies of the country. The right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister had already said that the Nonconformist or Dissenting Bodies of the country were the backbone of the Liberal Party. He (Mr. Cavendish Bentinck) thought it was probably in the desire to keep that backbone in its right position that the extraordinary move or vote against the Contagious Diseases Acts was taken last year. He wished the right hon. Gentleman had announced a more distinct and straightforward policy upon this question; because then supporters of the Acts would have had a better opportunity of holding their own. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Halifax (Mr. Stansfeld) had said that some ladies demanded a repeal of the Acts. He (Mr. Cavendish Bentinck) attended a meeting at Exeter Hall, and the right hon. Gentleman was present. It was called a religious meeting; but with the exception of a ceremony which occasionally took place at Naples, he thought he never saw any performance which ought more properly to be called rank superstition. There were at that meeting a certain number of half-crazy women—some in the pulpit, some on the ground, and they were preaching and praying and singing. So far as he could see, there was no reason why they should not pray and preach and sing any more than he saw any reason why people should not believe in the liquefaction of the blood of Saint Januarius. Belief in the latter would do no harm, whereas the preaching, praying, and screaming which went on at Exeter Hall did a great deal of harm, because, not only was the health of the Army impaired, but as he had already shown—and he was sorry that the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister was not in his place when he was reading the statistics—the admissions of unfortunate women to the Lock Hospitals had been reduced by something like three-fourths; while the severity of the disease from which they suffered had been more than doubled. He presumed that result made no effect upon the mind of the right hon. Gentleman. The right hon. Gentleman cared not whether the women suffered or not, so long as he could keep his Party together and occupy a seat on the Treasury Bench—the unfortunate creatures might rot in the streets and perish without any commiseration on his part. He (Mr. Cavendish Bentinck) had in his possession the copy of a letter written by the Prime Minister to one of the principal performers on the occasion referred to at Exeter Hall. The letter was as follows:—

“Dear Mrs. Butler,—I am directed by the Prime Minister to acknowledge the receipt of the Memorial forwarded to him by you praying for the total repeal of the Contagious Diseases Acts. We need hardly assure you that the Government are sensible of its weight; and that, having advisedly adopted a Resolution on the subject, they intend to act to the best of their ability in the spirit of it. I remain, dear Mrs. Butler, yours faithfully, Herbert J. Gladstone.”

Now, was that the Resolution which had been now advisedly adopted, or was it advisedly adopted last year when the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the House was absent, or had it been adopted since? He would like to know whether the right hon. Gentleman's policy was embodied in the Detention in Hospitals Bill and the Criminal Law Amendment Bill? He would like to know, also, whether the Government meant to stick hard and fast by those two measures, and to pass them, if ever a Session came round in which they could pass them? It was said that there were many important members of society who were opposed to the Acts. He had been told that certain Bishops were opposed to the Acts. One Bishop he heard make a speech at Exeter Hall, but the right rev. Prelate knew very little about the subject indeed; he appeared to have never troubled himself at all to understand the alphabet of the subject. His (Mr. Cavendish Bentinck's) impression was that a number of very excellent people did not take the least pains to acquaint themselves with the details of the case, but were too apt to rely on any wild statements they heard. No less a person than the Secretary to the Post Office, Mr. Stevenson Blackwood, presided at a meeting held at Exeter Hall this year on this subject, and he made one statement so astounding and so absolutely incorrect that he (Mr. Cavendish Bentinck) felt it his duty to call the attention of the Home Secretary to it. Mr. Stevenson Blackwood said—

“As citizens of a free country, we denounce and oppose the Acts, because they are a gross and violent outrage upon the liberty of the subject, and that, too, upon the liberty of the weaker and most defenceless portion of the population, whom they hand over to the mercies of the spy police and the danger of imprisonment without trial.”

[Mr. SAMUEL SMITH: Hear, hear!] He (Mr. Cavendish Bentinck) would ask the hon. Member not to cheer too soon. And then Mr. Stevenson Blackwood went on to say that the Acts must be demoralizing to the agents who enforced them; for there were people ready to put money into the hands of the spy police to send women to hospital. It was an official of the Post Office who made this misleading statement; and when he (Mr. Cavendish Bentinck) called him to account for it, what did the Committee think was his excuse?—

“Oh, I did not refer to the police under the control of the Home Secretary—not to the Metropolitan Police—I referred to something that was done many years ago in Hong Kong.”

Mr. Stevenson Blackwood was very angry with him (Mr. Cavendish Bentinck) afterwards, because he did not admit the excuse, and because he said he (Mr. Stevenson Blackwood) had no right to make such a statement to the superstitious and ignorant people who composed his audience at Exeter Hall. He (Mr. Cavendish Bentinck) did not think it right to call any Member of Parliament ignorant, and therefore he would not say the hon. Member for Liverpool (Mr. S. Smith) was ignorant, but that the hon. Member was superstitious, and that his superstition forbade him to examine the law. The hon. Member evidently had not instructed himself in law, or else he would have been aware that no woman could be imprisoned under the Acts without trial. But as to the statement about Hong Kong. If Mr. Stevenson Blackwood meant Hong Kong, why did he not say so? It was all very well to make a misleading statement to a number of ladies gathered together in Exeter Hall, and then withdraw it in a letter which, probably, very few persons saw—a letter printed in an obscure corner of a newspaper. Mr. Wheeler, of Rochester, afforded an instance of the same sort of thing. He did not wish to call anyone bad names; but Mr. Wheeler, who had said there were hundreds of cases of forcible imprisonment—who had repeated the statement in lying leaflets—while he was unable to show even one such case, pretended to describe them. Wheeler was a contemptible person; but he thought it was highly improper for an official holding one of the highest positions in the Service to take the chair at a meeting of this sort at Exeter Hall, and make such grossly misleading and untrue statements. If persons of that position committed themselves in such a way, it was not surprising that persons of an inferior class of society should allow themselves to be deluded. In fact, he himself knew of two cases in which ladies, having been told that Mr. Blackwood had made these statements, said they must be true, for nothing he said could be untrue. This gentleman held a leading position in some places as a preacher, and, he believed, was highly moral and virtuous; but, virtuous and moral and distinguished as he might be as a preacher, he had no right to preside at a meeting at Exeter Hall and give utterance to untrue statements that could not be supported in any way whatever. He felt very grateful to the hon. Member for Devonport (Mr. Puleston) for having brought this matter before the Committee, for that was the only chance there had been that Session of discussing the subject. The discussion, he was sure, had been very wholesome and useful, for it had shown that no argument could be advanced in favour of the policy of the Government except the misleading Returns produced by the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War. He had had paper after paper sent to him by writers employed by the Society saying how misleading those Returns were, especially by their principal statistician. Therefore, he did not think it could be denied that the Returns were misleading. He had always supported these Acts, with a view to the relief of these unfortunate women. They had obtained relief while the Acts were in force, but since the Acts had been suspended, the reverse had been the case, and it was impossible to consider that the action of the Government had been either for the public good or for the advantage of these unfortunate women.

MR. STANSFELD: I do not propose to follow the right hon. and learned Gentleman at any length or in detail through the points of his very discursive speech. It does not seem to me that I am called upon to do so, and if not it would be a waste of the time of the Committee to do so, the Committee being desirous of proceeding with the Business before them. But there is one statement of the right hon. and learned Gentleman to which I must refer, and that is his statement involving an attack on the truthfulness of Mr. Stevenson Blackwood. Now, Mr. Blackwood is a gentleman well known to a great many Members of this House—well known to Gentlemen who sit on these Benches, and to Members who sit on the opposite Benches; and I will undertake to say that there is no man who has ever met Mr. Blackwood in official relationship, or who has ever met him in public, or private, or social relationship who does not entertain the very highest opinion of the character and the truthfulness and accuracy of the man. The right hon. and learned Gentleman has said of Mr. Blackwood that he made a statement, as chairman of a meeting, which was grossly misleading and untrue. The right hon. and learned Gentleman had a correspondence with Mr. Blackwood, which I have seen, and now I say to the Committee that it is the right hon. and learned Gentleman who is guilty of misrepresentation, and that he has misrepresented to this Committee of the House of Commons the words and actions of Mr. Blackwood as explained by that Gentleman in letters which the right hon. and learned Gentleman had received.

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINOK: I referred to a statement made at the meeting.

Google

MR. STANSFELD: I will prove my statement, I think, to the satisfaction of the Committee. The purport of the argument and the insinuation of the right hon. and learned Gentleman was that Mr. Blackwood, trading on the supposed ignorance of his audience, induced them to believe that in this country there existed a system of enabling spy police to lead people to offend against the law. I absolutely deny the accuracy of the statement of the right hon. and learned Gentleman. That meeting was called to protest not only against the Contagious Diseases Acts in this country, but against the system of which these Acts are the expression as far as this country is concerned; and one of the Resolutions passed by that meeting referred not only to the Contagious Diseases Acts, but to the system as administered in Hong Kong. I undertake to say that that vast meeting had every reason to understand, and that the vast majority did accurately understand, Mr. Blackwood to refer not to the state of things in this country, but to the possibilities of such principles and such a system as illustrated by the Acts in force in Hong Kong. That was the explanation given by Mr. Blackwood to the right hon. and learned Gentleman; but the right hon. and learned Gentleman does not deal with Mr. Blackwood as we deal with each other as Members of this House; and I want to know what right he has to not treat Mr. Blackwood as his equal, and as the equal of any man on the Benches of this House. Those who know him know there is no truer gentleman or more honourable man in this country than Mr. Blackwood, and I, for one, am proud of the privilege of being able to call him my friend. The right hon. and learned Gentleman sneers at Mr. Blackwood as a religious man; but that is one of the attributes of Mr. Blackwood most to be respected and venerated. Whether a false impression was produced on the mind of the meeting or not—and I do not believe that was so—the right hon. and learned Gentleman had the distinct declaration of Mr. Blackwood that he referred not to England, but to Hong Kong; and I think it would have better become him, knowing the character of Mr. Blackwood, if he had in a frank and manly manner accepted that explanation.

I have another reason for wishing to occupy the Committee for a short time to-night, and it is this: I, for one, cannot but feel highly satisfied with the course of this discussion. My noble Friend the Secretary of State for War, it is true, said that he had never agreed with the arguments I have brought forward from time to time to demonstrate, as I thought, the immoral tendency of the Contagious Diseases Acts; but I need not quarrel with my noble Friend for that difference of opinion, because he absolutely testified to the correctness of the arguments I have been advancing for so many years with reference to the hygienic basis of these Acts. My noble Friend remains of opinion that if these Acts could be applied universally they would be of great benefit; but he says that as they are only applied to certain exceptional districts their effect is slight and fluctuating, and hence not very beneficial. If there is no sufficient hygienic argument to advance in support of these Acts, they are lost beyond any possibility of support. The hon. Member for Devonport (Mr. Puleston) and other Members have referred to a certain Return; but I wish to say for myself that, so far as I am concerned, I take the authority of the Government as the highest authority upon this question of hygiene; and when we find Her Majesty's Government, in the Reports of the officials concerned in the administration of these Acts, admitting, as my noble Friend has frankly admitted, and as the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Admiralty has also admitted, that their operation has not been of such hygienic value as to justify their retention, I am determined, in future, to take my stand upon that admission on the responsibility of the Government, and I do not feel myself compelled to occupy the time of the Committee by discussing statistics brought forward on the spur of the moment, perhaps privately obtained, and which it would be impossible to discuss. But there is another point upon which I must say a word. The hon. Member for Devonport seemed to think that because I ejaculated across the floor of the House an expression of difference of opinion, I gave him or some other hon. Gentleman the lie. He accepted my explanation that I had no such intention; but I do say this—that I absolutely disbelieve the accuracy of the views represented and believed in by himself and those other hon. Gentlemen. My hon. Friend referred to a deputation to the Home Secretary. He said truly that that deputation consisted largely of magistrates, and that their statements were of a very serious nature. They were of a very serious nature, and I have had a report of that deputation, and I find that the statement of the Memorial was no less serious than this—that the withdrawal of the Metropolitan Police, by whom the Acts were carried out, had conduced to most disastrous effects, which were seen in an increase in prostitution; especially in juvenile prostitution; in more reckless conduct of prostitutes in the streets; in an increase of disease, and in its more virulent character. That was the very serious statement made by the deputation; but the attention of the Earl of Mount-Edgcumbe was shortly afterwards drawn by two of our Associations interested in the repeal of these Acts to statements which he was said to have made, and I have a letter from him in reply. This letter was addressed to the Secretary of the National Association, and he wrote another to another Association, which I also have. He says—

“I have to acknowledge your letter of the 25th instant, referring to my remarks in introducing the deputation to the Home Secretary, in reference to the Contagious Diseases Acts. In reply, I have to say that I was unexpectedly called upon to introduce the deputation, and while commenting on the statements made in the Memorial, I distinctly stated that I myself had no personal knowledge of the facts, which others who were present would be able to confirm.”

Therefore, so far as the Earl of Mount-Edgcumbe was concerned, it is perfectly clear that, as spokesman of the deputation, he relied on the statements of the deputation, and had no personal knowledge of the matter. Then the hon. Member for Devonport referred to the fact that a great many Members of that deputation were magistrates. I have something to say upon that question. If they were magistrates, they ought to have known the law, and as magistrates, it was their duty to enforce the law; and the magistrates and mayors of England would surely have command over the local police. It is absolutely undeniable that, if you want to preserve order in the public streets, you must have recourse to the general law, and not to the Contagious Diseases Acts, because they contain no powers for the preservation of order; and, therefore, when this deputation went to the Home Secretary, and entreated him to restore these Acts, and maintained that the suspension of the Acts had increased disorder, they were condemning themselves, because the law still exists which alone is necessary for the purpose of preserving order. No law has been repealed or suspended by which order could be maintained at all; and if these magistrates have not carried out the law the responsibility and fault are theirs. Then as to the facts. The hon. Member cited the Mayor and ex-Mayor of Plymouth; but I will cite the Mayor of Devonport for last year. He is a medical man, and when he had retired last year, and heard these statements by the Earl of Mount-Edgcumbe and others, he denied that there had been any increase of disorder in Devonport, and maintained that there had been no such increase in consequence of the suspension of these Acts. I have been very much accustomed, during the many years in which we have been discussing this subject, to find gentlemen who desired to uphold these Acts glad to receive and rely upon evidence from the police. The police have always been held up to me as great authorities; but what say the police? The chiefs of the police of Plymouth and Devonport contradict every statement made by the Earl of Mount-Edgcumbe and other members of this deputation, and I have their views on record. I have first to quote an extract from The Western Daily Mercury, of June 5, that being the Report of the Chief Constable of Plymouth contradicting the statement of increased disorder since the suspension of the Acts. Referring to a statement made at the Local Board of Guardians' meeting, that, since the repeal of the Contagious Diseases Acts, there had been an increase of prostitution, he says—

“I am in a position most confidently to state that such is not the case. There are, in fact, fewer brothels and fewer prostitutes in the town than there were 12 months ago. Neither has juvenile prostitution nor disorder in the streets increased, as is so often stated; and as regards the street more particularly referred to—Summerland Place—there are at present only five brothels, and fewer prostitutes than there were two or three years ago. I and those under my command are ever ready and willing to undertake such prosecutions when taken in the interest of order and morality, and I fearlessly assert that, taking into consideration the large number of people who frequent our streets at night, the streets of Plymouth are as free from disorder as any town of the same size in America or in this country."

That is the evidence of the Chief Constable of Plymouth. Then I have the evidence of the Chief Constable of Devonport. What he says on the 11th of June is this—as to the virulence of the disease he would say nothing; but—

"As to the increase of juvenile prostitution and disorder in the streets, I must emphatically say that that is not the case in Devonport. Some time ago the Earl of Mount-Edgcumbe made a similar statement; but then it was contradicted. Unfortunately, he had not seen the statistics of the town, and it must be in the knowledge of every magistrate in Devonport that there was a marked decrease in the number of loose women brought before them."

The Chief Constable adds—

"There is a wonderful decrease of prostitution, and as to disturbances in the streets, I emphatically contradict the statement of the Earl of Mount-Edgcumbe."

That, at any rate, shows that there are two sides to the question, and that I am as much entitled to rely upon these statements as the hon. Gentleman is to rely on the statements he has laid before the Committee. Therefore, I am entitled to differ in toto from his view. The only other word I would say is this—I would like to get my hon. Friend, and some others who have been accustomed to argue that these Acts were very beneficial in reducing disease, and in promoting order and decency, and so forth, to turn back to the Resolution of April 20, last year, to see what it meant and what it has effected. That Resolution simply expressed, in a manner which was unquestionable, and which I think could not be reversed, the deep feeling and conviction of the majority of the House of Commons against the system of compulsory examination of women for the purposes of these Acts. Now, Her Majesty's Government, not able, I believe, to repeal these Acts at the time, and substitute what other legislation they might think necessary, in the exercise of their discretion and judgment, suspended their operation as far as they were, by that Resolution, bound to do. What, therefore, the Government have done is this—they have not withdrawn the police; they have only withdrawn a portion of the police; and the only thing they have stopped is the system of the compulsory examination of women; and what I want to point out is that, if nothing will satisfy hon. Gentlemen but harping upon these Acts, and entreating the Government to go back upon the Acts—which neither this nor any future Government will, I believe, be at all likely to do—the position in which they place themselves will be this—that the compulsory examination of women is not only the best, but the only method which they deem is possible to carry out their views. How can they justify a contention of that kind? So far as hygiene is concerned, we have it on the best medical authority that the effect of these Acts is trivial. So far as order and decency are concerned, they cannot deny that the Acts have done nothing enabling the authorities to preserve order. If they think that the deterrent influence of the system of compulsory examination is the only method of preventing juvenile prostitution, then I beg to say that they are extremely mistaken in point of fact. I deny, as a matter of fact, that juvenile prostitution has increased, and I have given the evidence of the Chief Constables of Plymouth and Devonport to support my case. But I would ask them to take the example afforded by Glasgow, where compulsion has become impossible. Let us accept the alternative of freedom and persuasion; let us strive to make our Army sober and moral, and so to diminish the causes of prostitution. Let us do what we can to save the young, and redeem those who have fallen. That can be done independently of the system of compulsory examination of women, which is odious to the hearts and minds of all people who have given consideration to this subject. I do not believe there is a man who has brought himself to the idea that compulsory examination was necessary, without beginning by disliking it. It is repugnant to every mind. Do not let us, then, despair. Do not let us be so impotent as to imagine that there is no other method of diminishing disease and enforcing order and decency in the streets, and checking prostitution. Do not let us, for a moment, be so feeble as to slip into the foolish conception that there is only one nostrum and method, and that is compulsory examination. I am profoundly convinced—and there is, perhaps, no man living who has given so much attention to this subject in all its aspects as I have—that when these Acts have been repealed, and are dead and buried, and when we have ceased to hanker after them; when, in consequence, you have given yourselves to the only other policy of non-compulsion and freedom, education and moral persuasion, charitable hospitals and medical assistance to the diseased of both sexes—I am strongly and completely convinced that you will then arrive at results in the reduction of disease, and vice, and disorder in the streets greater than any you can obtain by such methods as these Acts.

Mr. SAMUEL SMITH said, he did not desire to trouble the Committee with a speech on this subject; but he wished to make one or two observations, because he had been taunted by the right hon. and learned Member (Mr. Cavendish Bentinck) with belonging to a superstitious sect. He did not believe that any good whatever could come from a bad principle, and that was the reason why he objected to these Acts. He hoped the House would never be led by any sophistry into believing that any benefit would ever be derived from legislation that was contrary to the laws of morality. He trusted that the Government would not desist from the course they were now taking, but that they would adhere firmly to the decision of the House of Commons last year.

Mr. WARTON said, he was sorry to see the Government in this position. All the responsible Heads of the Departments most interested knew that these Acts were absolutely essential for the promotion of the health of their soldiers and sailors. The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Judge Advocate General, who had formerly a strong prejudice and leaning against them, had been converted, and now took a favourable view of them, simply from hearing the evidence before the Committee over which he had presided.

THE JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL (Mr. OSBORNE MORGAN) remarked that he was not Chairman of the Committee.

Mr. WARTON said, that the right hon. and learned Gentleman, if not actually Chairman, was very often in the Chair. He (Mr. Warton) had read the whole of the evidence, and he found that the right hon. and learned Gentleman who had taken a distinguished part in the proceedings was compelled, by the overwhelming weight of the evidence given by doctors, clergymen, priests, matrons of hospitals, and the police, to come to the conclusion that the Acts were beneficial, not only in regard to the health of their soldiers and sailors, but as regarded the reformation of the unhappy women who came under their influence. As a believer in Christianity, he thought it was a Christian act to remove these poor women out of all temptation to sin. One thing which had particularly struck him was the clear evidence that, under the operation of these Acts, juvenile immorality, which once largely flourished, had almost ceased, and that houses of ill-fame had greatly diminished in number. These were facts beyond dispute; and, therefore, he was sorry for the decision of the Government, because he believed that their defeat last year was, to a great extent, accidental. The right hon. Member for Halifax (Mr. Stanfeld) had spoken of the majority of the House. In one sense, it was true that there was a majority of the House in favour of the repeal of the Acts; but, in another sense, it was not true. The actual Division last year showed 170 or 180 in favour of repeal, against 110 or 115 on the other side. But that was very far from being a majority of the House, and those who knew how Divisions were taken in the House, no matter upon what question, knew very well that all those who were actively and tremendously in earnest in pushing on an agitation assembled in the full strength of their numbers, and it was exceedingly doubtful whether, if the whole House had been polled on this particular occasion, they could have got more than the 170 or 180 votes they did. But there were many hon. Members absent who would have been present if they had imagined that such a result would have been brought about. It was by a lucky accident that those who were in favour of the proposal of the right hon. Member for Halifax were present in their full numbers, while others were away who fondly supposed that Her Majesty's Government would stand firm, and would have strength sufficient to insure the rejection of the Resolution. If the Government had freely used their influence, or if a single crack had been opened, a majority composed of two-thirds of the House would have supported them. He thought it showed remarkable weakness on the part of the Government in yielding, under the circumstances, to a scratch majority. He recollected that when another Division took place affecting the contagious diseases of cattle, although there was a clear majority against the Government, they refused to give effect to the wishes of that majority, and took occasion, over and over again, to evade even the repeated decision of the House. The only ground on which he thought the Government could have refused to give effect to the Resolution in this case was that in both cases the same object was to be attained—namely, the prevention of the spread of disease. By giving way in the one case to a majority, and by refusing to give way in the other, the Government had encouraged the spread of disease. The only thing which could justify them was the ground of consistency; but, for his part, he was of opinion, after the careful perusal of the whole of the evidence given before a Select Committee—evidence given by magistrates, and ministers of every creed—that these Acts had worked well for the unhappy women who were affected by them, and had resulted in the restoration of many of them to society, and that they had prevented many poor girls, who were on the borderland between right and wrong, from going astray. The only thing he was able to find in opposition to the Acts was a feeling of sentiment—a sort of a priori idea, that nothing should be done which might appear to sanction vice. He hoped that some of the fanatics who had taken part in this agitation would be ashamed to see how far their ideas had carried them, and would ask the Government, once for all, to give up these follies and fooleries. The truest morality was to relieve suffering and misery, to take these poor women off the streets and reform them. He had the firmest conviction that such results would follow from the careful, but strict administration of these Acts.

Mr. PULESTON said, that it was quite superfluous for the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Stansfeld) to inform the Committee that he did not, of his own knowledge, know anything of the state of the streets in Plymouth, Devonport, and Stonehouse. The Earl of Mount-Edgcumbe, however, possessed such knowledge, and he simply lived across the river, and was closely identified with the three towns. The right hon. Gentleman had quoted the ex-Mayor of Devonport, and had stated that he was against the Earl of Mount-Edgcumbe and others, who took a contrary view. Now, he (Mr. Puleston) found that, attached to the Memorial of the magistrates, clergymen, medical practitioners, and others in the boroughs of Plymouth and Devonport, and the township of Stonehouse, an extract from which he had read, was the name of Dr. Rolston. He did not know what evidence could be stronger as to the views of Dr. Rolston than his signature to that very strong Memorial. He fully appreciated the statement of the noble Marquess, who told them that he still firmly maintained his former opinion in favour of the Acts. The arguments of the right hon. Member for Halifax (Mr. Stansfeld) and the hon. and learned Member for Stockport (Mr. Hopwood) were altogether unsound, as were certainly those of the hon. Member for Liverpool (Mr. Samuel Smith), who spoke of the action of the Government, and appealed to them to stand firm by the decision already arrived at; but he (Mr. Puleston) begged those hon. Members not to forget what the views were of the Cabinet Ministers who had had most to do with the working of the Acts. The noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War, who might be presumed to know as much of the matter as an hon. Gentleman who had exercised no control whatever over the subject, was, at least, not of the same way of thinking as the hon. Member for Liverpool, but candidly told them that nothing that as yet had been adduced, either inside or outside the House, had induced him to change his mind. He should not follow the arguments of the Secretary to the Admiralty, who had ingeniously whittled down the number in the hospitals to 110. All he (Mr. Puleston) knew was that since the Acts were suspended, the number of persons in the hospitals suffering from disease were exactly double. He believed that since the suspension of the Acts there had been an influx of immoral women into the towns which had formerly been within the operation of those laws. It was too soon yet to judge fully of the physical degradation which would result both in the Army and Navy from the suspension of the compulsory clauses. Those who advocated those clauses, he would remark, had not the least objection to the adoption of other measures also, such as had been recommended by the right hon. Member opposite (Mr. Stansfeld). What they objected to was that the operation of the Acts should have been suspended before anything else had been provided to take their place. Notwithstanding all the evidence that had been produced, the right hon. Gentleman preferred to rely upon the evidence of one or two men against the positive and unequivocal statements of the editors of all the local newspapers, and three-fourths of the whole population of the towns concerned. If that was the way in which evidence should be tested, it must be apparent that the foundation of most of the legislation of this country was unsound.

Mr. CAVENDISH BENTINCK complained that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Halifax (Mr. Stansfeld) had made an attack upon him, and then run away. Since the right hon. Gentleman had left the House, he (Mr. Cavendish Bentinck) had had an opportunity of referring to printed documents, and he found that they entirely supported his assertion that Mr. Stevenson Blackwood did not mention the "Hong Kong" case either directly or indirectly in his speech at Exeter Hall, and that the audience must, therefore, have construed the charge as referring only to the Metropolitan Police. He (Mr. Cavendish Bentinck) therefore insisted that it was abundantly clear that he had made out his case. As to the way in which the Earl of Mount-Edgcumbe had deluded or hoodwinked the Home Secretary. Devonport and the two other towns were not the only towns which which had received benefit from these Acts. The evidence of his hon. Friend the Member for Hythe (Sir Edward Watkin) was very strong upon that point. He himself (Mr. Cavendish Bentinck) knew a good deal about the City of Canterbury; and there was a very strong opinion there that the city had sustained great injury by the suspension of the Acts. The same might be said of Chatham and Portsmouth. The right hon. Member for Halifax (Mr. Stansfeld) urged that moral suasion would be sufficient to induce people to give up immorality in the Army. Why, then, was not moral suasion tried in reference of the women of London, of whom the hon. Member for Liverpool (Mr. S. Smith) complained so strongly the other day when bringing before the House some extracts from the speech of the Earl of Shaftesbury—why did not the advocates of these Acts try moral suasion there? He thought they ought; and that if ever there was a case for moral suasion it was that; and if it was a failure in London, in all probability it would result in a similar failure elsewhere. He believed himself that, much as the details and principle of the Acts might be objectionable, there was no other mode of meeting the evil. It was with melancholy satisfaction he noticed that neither the right hon. Member for Halifax (Mr. Stansfeld), the hon. Member for Liverpool (Mr. S. Smith), nor the hon. and learned Member for Stockport (Mr. Hopwood) had said one word in regard to the fatal effects which the suspension of these Acts had produced upon the unfortunate women themselves, nor had they expressed one word of pity for their condition. One hon. Member said he would prefer their being placed in an hospital where they might be made accessible to religious instruction and influences. Was it contended that they would be made worse by religious instruction even in a Lock Hospital? The suspension of the Acts had had a most disastrous effect; and he thought he had clearly proved his case that the compulsory clauses of the Acts should again be put in force.

Dr. FARQUHARSON asked for an explanation of an item under Sub-head G of £600 for grants made to certain institutions.

SIR ARTHUR HAYTER said, this was a grant of £600 to the Discharged Prisoners Aid Society to enable prisoners who had been, unfortunately, detained for crime to maintain themselves until they could procure work after their release from prison. Acting upon a suggestion which had been made by the right hon. Member for King's Lynn (Mr. Bourke), he had placed himself in communication with the prison authorities, and, in conjunction with the Director of Clothing, he was happy to say that arrangements had been made by which the whole of the clothes of the prisoners.

and their bedding were now made by the prisoners themselves, instead of being exercised at shot drill, where good conduct justified this relaxation of the rules.

CAPTAIN AYLMER asked for an explanation of an item of £2,700 under Sub-head J for commission granted to local bankers for a supply of specie for the payment of pensioners, &c., residing in the Colonies. It seemed to him that if pensioners chose to reside in the Colonies it was quite sufficient for the Colonial pensioners to charge for providing for that specie; and he did not see why there should be any additional charge for home pensioners.

SIR ARTHUR HAYTER said, that for many years pensioners had resided in the Channel Islands, and this was a payment in connection with such pensioners.

COLONEL NOLAN said, he thought that £2,500 was a large item for providing change for the small amount of money paid in the Colonies. He hoped the Secretary to the Treasury would give some idea of the number of pensioners in the Colonies and the amount of the pensions paid.

SIR ARTHUR HAYTER said, the bankers charged 3 per cent on the amount which passed through their hands, and the payment was sanctioned by the Treasury. It would be difficult to say at that moment how many of these pensioners there were.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR asked if there was any alteration in the rate of commission, so as to make the concession more profitable at one time than another? He wished also to have some information as to an item of £12,000 which appeared under Sub-head O for rewards to inventors.

MR. BRAND said, that the rewards to inventors were given in accordance with the recommendation of a Committee as appointed by the present Chancellor of the Exchequer when Secretary of State for War. The Committee had to decide on various critical questions which arose in connection with the construction of the new steam ordnance, and the Committee held its meeting at Woolwich. Experiments were constantly made, and Reports were presented. The Reports were sent to the Surveyor General, who transmitted them to the Secretary of State. It was not considered to be for the interest of the Service that the Reports should be made public. The rewards during the present year consisted of the sum of £1,000 paid to the inventor of a torpedo, and £200 in rewards for inventions now under the consideration of the Committee.

SIR HENRY FLETCHER said, that under Sub-head M he noticed an item of £500 for medals. It seemed that there was an item last year for a similar purpose which amounted to £600.

SIR ARTHUR HAYTER said the decrease from £600 to £500 was simply because medals for the Admiralty were now paid out of the Admiralty Vote; £500 was the ordinary charge for military medals.

CAPTAIN AYLMER asked what was the scope of the inquiry of the Committee appointed by the late Secretary of State for War? Was it extended to Ordnance generally, or confined to Field Artillery?

MR. BRAND said, the Committee considered all questions relating to Ordnance.

CAPTAIN AYLMER asked if he was to understand that the Committee referred to was a permanent Committee?

MR. BRAND: Yes.

Votes agreed to.

(2.) £245,200, War Office.

MR. CAUSTON said, upon this Vote he desired to say a few words on behalf of a very intelligent and deserving body of men—he meant the Military Staff Clerks of the General Staff. No doubt it was for the interest of the Army, with a view of encouraging intelligent and respectable men to join its ranks, to hold out to them the prospect of promotion. In all branches of the Service with this single exception of the Corps of Military Staff Clerks, promotion from the ranks did prevail; but under the existing Regulations commissions were practically closed to Military Staff Clerks. In the following branches of the Service men who joined the Army had a prospect of obtaining commissions:—The Cavalry, the Artillery, the Royal Engineers, the Office of Schoolmaster, the Commissariat Department, the Ordnance, the Household Corps, and Infantry battalions. In the whole of these branches of the Service a man, entering the Army as a private, was able to reach the post of commissioned officer—such as Riding Master, Quartermaster, Inspector, or various other positions in which they ranked as commissioned officers. But in the Corps of Military Staff Clerks there was no promotion at all. Nevertheless, the Staff Clerks, were, he believed, a very intelligent and respectable body of men, and very useful indeed to the Staff officers. They were called upon to guide, as it were, and to act in support of all new Staff officers. The noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War, and hon. and gallant Gentlemen who had served on the Staff of the Army would be in a much better position than he was to speak of the qualifications of these Staff Clerks; but he had been given to understand that it was impossible to find in the entire ranks of Her Majesty's Military Service a more useful and trustworthy body of men. Their position, however, was very different from that of any other soldier. A man in any other branch of the Service, by his ability, attention to his duty, good conduct, and intelligence was capable of being promoted from the ranks; but if he once became a Staff Clerk, when the regiment left the garrison town in which he was stationed, he was left behind, and he and his services, however meritorious, were soon forgotten by the officers connected with the regiment, and everybody else. Unless he happened to misconduct himself the probability was that he never joined his regiment again, and, therefore, he was necessarily passed over in any promotion in the regiment, and such promotion was given to someone actually serving with the regiment, and he did not complain of it. Now, he wished to suggest a remedy for the grievance of which he complained, and it was that these Staff Clerks who were stationed in a garrison town, and did not leave with the regiment like the rest of the soldiers, and had consequently no prospect before them of promotion to commissioned rank—that this Corps of Clerks should be eligible for promotion to the rank of Quartermaster; and that they should be afforded an opportunity of filling the posts now filled by the Civilian Clerks at the War Office, who already possessed salaries equivalent to those paid to Quartermasters. For his part, he could not help thinking that this very useful class of men would make quite as good clerks as civilians, because they would be able to bring their practical knowledge of Staff work to bear at the War Office; and he should imagine that it would be of very great advantage to the Staff officers to know that their communications were being attended to by those who thoroughly understood the technical details of the services required. The action of the noble Marquess with regard to the Quartermasters had been very highly appreciated, and he believed that it would not only be an act of wisdom, but of fairness to hold out to these deserving clerks the prospect of promotion in the same way that promotion was given to those who joined the ranks and served in other capacities. He did not for a moment believe that the omission had occurred wilfully; he had no doubt that it was the result of mere accident. But it was undoubtedly the fact that some of the best men serving in the Army had been debarred from participating in the prospect of obtaining commissioned rank which was open to all other soldiers. He sincerely hoped that the noble Marquess would give him some encouragement, and that he would hold out to the clerks, in whose behalf he (Mr. Causton) had spoken that night, some hope that he would grant the request which he now made.

SIR WALTER B. BARTELOT wished the hon. Member for Colchester to explain what the corps of clerks was? As long as he had served in the Army he had never heard of a corps of clerks until that moment, and he confessed that he was unable to understand what it consisted of, unless the hon. Member referred to the Staff sergeants and others serving at the different headquarters throughout the country.

MR. CAUSTON said, he referred to the Military Staff Clerks serving with the Staff in different parts of the country.

SIR WALTER B. BARTELOT said, they would have rank of some sort or other according to their service, and some would belong to certain regiments. But, be that as it might, he wished to call attention to the clerks as organized at the War Office; and after what had been repeatedly said in regard to the employment of non-commissioned officers as clerks in the War Office it was most unsatisfactory to find that only 82 were so employed out of 523 clerks at the War Office. The noble Marquess had said that it was his anxious wish to employ as many non-commissioned officers as he was able in the different posts at his command. Non-commissioned officers in the Army looked forward very much to such employment, and any post that could be given to them, both in the office and elsewhere, would be very well bestowed. These men fought all over the world for their country, and in many instances they received a very inadequate return for their services. It must be remembered that they were the backbone of the Army, and it was desirable that they should attract the best class of men they could obtain for the Service. When he saw so few of them employed at the War Office, although they had been increased by 12 recently, he felt it his duty to impress upon the noble Marquess the desirability of making some greater recognition of the important services rendered by these men. He had ventured to call the attention of the noble Marquess to the matter, because he was quite sure that the noble Marquess was as anxious as he (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) was that these men should receive the reward their long and valuable services deserved.

Mr. WHITLEY wished to invite the attention of the Committee to the grievances of another Department—namely, the officers of the Army Pay Department, who were not represented at the War Office. He believed that was the only Department which was not represented at the Horse Guards, and they could only bring their grievances before the House itself. Their grievance was a considerable one; but he had no doubt that it would receive attention at the hands of the Financial Secretary, who was noted at all times for his courtesy. At the present time there was a body of 300 or 400 officers of the Army Pay Department who were debarred from obtaining the rank which was enjoyed by the Commissariat and Medical Department. At present, in consequence of the smallness of the number of Chief Paymasters, men who had been 20 or 30 years in the Army got no promotion, and he asked if it would not be possible to increase the number by 15 or 20? Another grievance was of a different kind—namely, that after serving five years in the Department as Chief Paymasters they were not allowed to retire with the honorary rank of Lieutenant Colonel. He believed at the present moment that there were only one or two officers in the Army Pay Department who were Lieutenant Colonels. From an answer received from his hon. and gallant Friend opposite (Sir Arthur Hayter) some time ago, it would appear that his hon. and gallant Friend was under the impression that if honorary rank were conferred upon these officers they would be placed in a combatant position in case of the absence of a superior officer. He believed there was no ground whatever for that impression, and that honorary rank would not place them in a position to command. He thought that his hon. and gallant Friend had himself discovered that in that respect he had committed an error. He would urge on the Secretary of State for War and the Government the desirability of increasing the number of officers of the Army Pay Department in the position of Chief Paymasters from 15 to 20, and of giving them the rank of Lieutenant Colonel after five years' service. He believed that such a course would strengthen the Department, and produce a feeling of contentment in the minds of the officers. He, therefore, trusted that the grievances of the Army Pay Department would be taken into consideration.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR wished to point out that a transference had been made from this Vote to another which made the Vote appear this year much less than it was in the former year, and for that reason, therefore, he objected to it. This practice of changing items in this Vote was not unusual, and should not be permitted. With regard to the suggestions of his hon. Friend the Member for Colchester (Mr. Causton) regarding the extension of the employment of soldiers as clerks in the War Office, he begged to refer to the Staff Clerks, of whom there were a number of very excellent men liable to be sent abroad who were now serving in different capacities, as efficient clerks in the Army. He was sure that from the ranks of the Army they could get any number of qualified men to do the clerical work which had been referred to. He trusted that the noble Marquess would give his attention to the matter, and see what could be done.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I agree with the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for West Sussex (Sir Walter B. Barttelot), and with the hon. Gentleman the Member for Colchester (Mr. Causton), that it is desirable to give as much encouragement as possible to deserving non-commissioned officers in the Army by giving them employment, if possible, in the War Office, and in any similar employment that may be open to them. The subject has not been lost sight of. Military clerks have been introduced from time to time in the War Office; I believe that at one time they were employed to a larger extent than they are now. The number was reduced because it was found that the system was not altogether successful—that the clerical work was not advantageously placed in the hands of men who had had no experience of such employment. Military clerks are employed to some extent under the Adjutant General in connection with Artillery, and they are admirably suited for record work. They are invaluable in connection with work of this kind, and in this kind of duty they will continue to be employed as much as possible; but for other duties, involving a greater amount of education and a greater amount of Departmental training, it has not been found advantageous to employ them. I need not, therefore, add that, however desirable it may be to give encouragement to meritorious non-commissioned officers, it would be false economy to employ them in work which experience has shown they are not familiar with and not qualified for. Attention has been given to the matter, however, and whenever it has been found advantageous to employ the services of non-commissioned officers or pensioned soldiers, they are employed in preference to civilians. For instance, all the messengers of the War Office will, in future, be non-commissioned officers, and not civilians. With regard to the point raised by the hon. Member for Colchester as to transferring Military Staff Clerks from the districts to the War Office, I have to say that the practice has not been found altogether successful, and it has therefore been discontinued. The non-commissioned officers are willing and anxious to be employed; but I have not heard that any improvement in their prospects is required. No representation of any grievance in this matter has been made to me; but now that the subject has been raised, I will make a point of looking into it. Without further inquiry, I cannot pledge myself to any opinion that any improvement in the position of these men is necessary. With regard to what has fallen from the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for Kincardineshire (Sir George Balfour)—as to some transfer of expenditure from this Vote to another—I did not quite catch the point to which he adverted; but I may say it is inevitable that from time to time alterations in the formal rendering of the accounts should take place, and, no doubt—as I suppose has occurred in this instance—in the first year in which the alterations in form are made some inconvenience is experienced. I believe that all that is possible will be done to minimize the inconvenience. I do not think my hon. and gallant friend, or anyone who takes the interest he does in the matter, will find it difficult to discover what the transfers are.

SIR FREDERICK FITZWYGRAM said, he thought the feeling of the Army was more in favour of having better paid employment given to non-commissioned officers in their regiments than increase of pay to Staff Clerks. The great prominence which had been given to these Staff clerkships instead of doing good to the Army had rather had the opposite effect. Regimental appointments had become depreciated in the minds of the men in the regiments. The Army was far from desiring to see these Staff clerkships increased, and wished to see better pay and increased advantages given to regimental appointments. He did not think that non-commissioned officers looked for employment outside their regiments.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL remarked that this was the last of the Effective Votes, and he hoped, therefore, he should be in Order in asking one question with regard to the Effective Service in Egypt. He desired to have some explanation as to how the expense of the Army in Egypt was borne—as to who paid the cost of its being moved up and down? They constantly heard of troops being moved from place to place—

THE CHAIRMAN: There is no reference whatever in this Vote to the expenses incurred in Egypt.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL: I think I am entitled to go into this matter, seeing that this is a Vote for military administration. Of course, I am in your hands, Sir.

THE CHAIRMAN: This Vote is for the War Office and the Staff of the War Department; it does not embrace any expenditure of the kind the hon. and gallant Gentleman refers to.

SIR ARTHUR HAYTER said, that in reply to the hon. Member for Liverpool (Mr. Whitley), who had referred to the Paymasters' Department, he should like to offer some explanation. In the first place, the hon. Member had recommended that there should be an increase in the number of Paymasters; and, secondly, he had expressed himself in favour of some revision of the relative honorary rank possessed by these officers. The hon. Member had asked if the Chief Paymasters could not be increased to 20. Well, there had been a careful revision of the whole of the Chief Paymasters' duties, and it had resulted in the issue of a new Warrant under which the number of Chief Paymasters was increased from 12 to 15. He could assure the hon. Member that there was no desire whatever to limit the expense; but they had been bound to consider what were the duties performed. It had been found that it was not the case, as had been contended by the Paymasters themselves, that there should always be a Chief Paymaster in every district where there was a General Officer. Three stations had been found where Chief Paymasters were required—Hong Kong, Aldershot, and one other station which he did not, for the moment, remember. To these places Chief Paymasters had been added; but he was afraid he could not hold out any hope of the number being extended beyond 15. With regard to the second point, which was that the relative rank of Staff Paymasters should be altered, and the rank of Lieutenant Colonel given to them, he would explain the position as to the honorary rank of the officers in the Pay Department after five years' service. At present Chief Paymasters ranked with Lieutenant Colonels, and became Colonels after five years. The Staff Paymasters ranked with Majors, and ordinary Paymasters with Captains. It was only very recently that the higher honorary rank had been given to Chief Paymasters, and the War Office Authorities felt, after consultation with the Military Branch, that it was too much for the Paymasters to expect that the Lieutenant Colonels' rank should be given to the Staff Paymasters as a matter of right after five years' service. The hon. and gallant Baronet the Member for West Sussex (Sir Walter B. Rarttelot) would bear him out when he said that it was not to be expected that the non-combatant officers should rank immediately after the officers commanding regimental districts. The Staff Paymaster attached to a regimental district had now the rank of Major; were he given the honorary rank of Lieutenant Colonel he would be the senior officer in the regimental district whenever the officer commanding was absent. It was only recently that the ranks had been revised, and he was sure the Military Authorities would strongly object to granting this honorary rank of Lieutenant Colonel, after five years' service, to Staff Paymasters.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, that this Vote suggested many considerations on different points—so many, in fact, that he would not venture to detain the Committee on more than two or three of them. He should like to offer a few remarks with reference to the observations of one or two hon. and gallant Gentlemen who had preceded him. With regard to these Military Staff Clerks, the noble Marquess had hardly caught the exact drift of the observations of the hon. Member for Colchester (Mr. Causton). The Vote showed that, whereas there were only 70 of these clerks employed in the War Office last year, there were now 82. So far the Military Staff Clerks had little reason to complain, because the authorities at headquarters had shown a disposition to utilize their services so far as possibly might be. The noble Marquess was quite right in saying that the experiment which had been made in using these men for clerical duties had not been altogether successful; but the complaint which, as he understood it, the Staff Clerks made, was this—They belonged to the Staff Corps, and were unlike non-commissioned officers in Line regiments, in so far as they could not be promoted after having lost their hold upon the regiment. However long a Staff officer of the Line had left his regiment, he had a chance of promotion; but not so with officers of the Staff Corps; and this was all the more hard, because the cause of their leaving the regiment for the positions offered was, as a rule, owing to excellence of character and superior conduct and ability. That was a very just complaint, and he hoped that in any inquiry the noble Marquess instituted it would not be lost sight of. Then, as to the position of the writers. On page 85 an item of £6,500 would be found—

“For Pay of Writers employed from time to time as occasion arises in the several branches of the War Office, at the rate of 10*d.* an hour whilst employed.”

Speaking from his own personal knowledge of the Department of the work and of many of the men employed, he was bound to say that this remuneration of 10*d.* an hour was a disgraceful pittance for the services these men rendered. Tenpence, he believed, was the sum originally mentioned in the Report of the Committee which sat upon the general question of the employment of clerks in the Civil Service; but that sum was never intended as a maximum. The original experiment was a payment of 10*d.* or 1*s.* an hour, he forgot which. These men had been employed not merely casually, and from time to time, as one would suppose in reading this description, but many of them had been employed for many years. They had had great experience, and were of great value. He could put his hand on men within the walls of the War Office who were worth twice or three times as much as 10*d.* an hour, and who, nevertheless, had been working on for years with no prospect of an increase of pay, although the cost of living had increased almost daily, and although as time went on they, of course, advanced in years. He certainly did think that in a large Department like the War Office, where so many men were employed as writers in the discharge of useful duties, some attention ought to be given to their claims upon the Treasury for increased remuneration. As to the Civil clerks, as the Committee would observe, they were put in different classes. There were men described as “clerks” with salaries of £500; others described as “clerks, upper division,” with salaries of £400; and then there were “supplementary clerks” with £300, and “men clerks” with £250. The men of the lower division were more numerous than those of the upper, and their salaries were limited to £250—that was the maximum. These men had entered the Civil Service on just the same terms as the upper division clerks—men who were receiving two, and sometimes as much as three times their amount of salary. They were every bit as good as the upper division clerks. Although they received such miserably small salaries, they could be trusted to do any work which was done by any portion of the Civil Staff in the War Office. As a rule, the hardest and heaviest part of the work was given them to do. They had less leisure than the clerks above them; they had less leave, and in every respect were treated less favourably. He saw no reason why the upper division of the clerical staff should not be reduced by something over 100; their places, or, at least, half of them, being replaced by the men of the lower division. If this were done, the country would benefit in the matter of economy, and would not in the least suffer in the matter of efficiency. The men of the lower division were quite as able to do the work as the men of the upper division; in fact, in many cases, they were much more fit for superior duties. So much for these clerks. What appeared to him to be the most important aspect of this Vote was this—that the whole of the increase was in the Department of the Commander-in-Chief. On that point he would have to find occasion more favourable for offering some remarks, for at that period of the Session, and in the present mood of the House, it would hardly be advisable to raise the very large question which might well be raised in regard to the position of the Commander-in-Chief. If, as he said before, the occasion were favourable, he should be prepared to submit to the House that the position of the Commander-in-Chief at the War Office was, to a very great extent, the cause of a large number of little wars in which this country had for the last 15 or 20 years been engaged. They had had wars on the Red River, wars on the Gold Coast, wars against the Basutos, wars against the Zulus, in the Transvaal, a raid against Abyssinia, and now this descent upon Egypt. If it were not for the dominant position of the Commander-in-Chief he believed they would have been spared many of these wars. He believed the secret of their entering into these useless and far from honourable enterprizes was to be traced to the fact that military officers, anxious for promotion, anxious for an increase of pay and allowances, tired of inaction and the irksomeness of an idle military life, brought pressure to bear on the Military Authorities at headquarters whenever there was a favourable opportunity for a quarrel, and so launched the country into a line of action which, if the Civil element at the War Office were dominant as it ought to be, would never have been entered upon. But, as he had said before, the present was not a favourable opportunity for the discussion of this matter, and he would not venture to go further into it. With regard to the administration of the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War, he begged to remind the Committee that when the Army Votes were first taken in Committee hon. Members were not allowed a fair opportunity of discussing many things which they were desirous of having thrashed out. Amongst other questions he had wished to discuss was the question of the Riding Establishment at Woolwich, and this the noble Marquess had promised to look into between that date and this. Earlier on he (Mr. A. O'Connor) had given his reasons for believing that the Riding Establishment at Woolwich—which cost some £5,000 or £6,000 a-year—was perfectly useless, and was a thorough waste of public money, keeping a large number of men in a comparatively idle life. He had shown, in fact, that the establishment had nothing whatever to justify its continuance. The noble Marquess had said he was not acquainted with its details, or even with its raison d'être, and had promised to inquire into the matter. But although the noble Marquess had had two or three opportunities of speaking since then, he (Mr. A. O'Connor) had noticed that he had said nothing about the matter. He would ask the noble Marquess to say something upon it now.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: The hon. Member says that the increase in this Vote is due to the Commander-in-Chief's Office.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR: Almost all the increase.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: That point has been raised and answered already. The increase in the Commander-in-Chief's Department is only a nominal one. It is owing to the transfer of certain of the Commissariat Staff to the Commander-in-Chief's Department from the Department of the Surveyor General of the Ordnance. That has been done because the Staff has been under the Commander-in-Chief. Being under his direction, it is only right that the transfer in the Votes should take place. With regard to the hon. Gentleman's remarks as to the Riding Establishment at Woolwich, immediately after the discussion to which he refers I called for a Report on the subject. That Report has been received, and has been more or less under discussion; but I do not think it would be possible to make any changes until next year's Estimates are under consideration. The subject is not one of pressing importance, and I cannot say that I have examined into it very carefully. I will do so, however, when next year's Estimates are in course of preparation. The hon. Member has referred to the great disparity between the salaries and position of the clerks in the upper division and those of the clerks in the lower division, and he has called attention to the large number of men clerks in the lower division. This disparity is not due to the present War Office, but is owing to the system inaugurated by our Predecessors; besides, it applies to all Departments, and is not peculiar to the War Office. I believe the lower division clerks do not accept service on the same conditions or in the same division as the upper division clerks. I believe these changes were introduced in consequence of the Report of the Commission presided over by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Edinburgh (Sir Lyon Playfair). Several improvements have been made in the position of the lower division clerks, who are now sometimes allowed to become clerks in the higher division. But this is not their right, seeing that they accepted the positions they hold in the lower division under well-defined terms. The War Office had no control over the appointment or the pay of the writers. Whenever assistance of that kind is wanted, application is made to the Civil Service Commissioners to furnish the War Department with the required number of writers, who are paid according to rule, and in whose rate of remuneration it would be impossible for the War Office to make any alteration.

MR. A. F. EGERTON said the noble Marquess had certainly stated correctly the practice at the War Office with regard to the writers being furnished to the Department by the Civil Service Commissioners; yet he (Mr. Egerton) thoroughly endorsed what had been said by the hon. Member for Queen's County (Mr. A. O'Connor) with regard to that practice not working in a satisfactory manner. No one, he believed, would say that it did work satisfactorily. He agreed also with the hon. Member in saying that the breach, or division, which separated the upper from the lower division clerks was much too wide, and that there ought to be some better and easier means of bridging it over than at present existed. He had heard it said that there were many gentlemen in the lower division perfectly capable of performing higher duties in the Office than those which they had to perform; but that it was under the present system quite impossible for them to jump over the gap between them and the clerks of the higher grade. He ventured to hope that before long there might be a thorough investigation of, and inquiry into, the working of the Playfair system. He thought that inquiry ought to be held as soon as possible, and that it would result in good to the Service. With regard to the pay of the writers, he thought 10*d.* an hour was a very miserable pittance, and that there ought to be some means by which these persons could be advanced by selection. There were some writers perfectly capable of performing much higher duties than those for which they had been engaged, and in some of the Public Offices those higher duties were entrusted to them with advantage. There were many cases of the kind, and from the success which had attended the arrangement he ventured to think that the whole system with regard to the employment of writers would soon have to be carefully considered.

MR. RYLANDS said, he was very much disposed to think, with the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. A. F. Egerton), that the whole arrangement between the Civil Service Commissioners and the War Department required reconsideration. He remembered several occasions on which questions relating to Public Offices were before Parliament. It had been urged that by reconsideration and reconstruction in the Office certain economies might be effected; that certain clerks should be removed, and a staff of a more efficient character organized. It was believed that, although some charge might be incurred for pensions, in the long run economy would be effected by reducing the number of officials employed. But those prospects had been falsified. The Vote went on, gradually creeping up in the number of clerks employed, and in the amount paid to them. Now, it was his impression that they did not get as much work out of those in the Public Service as they ought to do; he believed that to be the case as a rule. He referred to gentlemen who were placed in the highest class, favoured servants of the Crown, who had a great many advantages in pay and short hours, and who were allowed to play the part, in short, of the aristocracy of the Public Service. On the other hand, in the lower class there were men who were expected to work more regularly, who had no hope of future advancement, who received less pay, and, no doubt, represented the lower class of the Public Service. He agreed with the hon. Gentleman on the Front Opposition Bench (Mr. A. F. Egerton) that the strong line of demarcation between these highly paid and indulged servants of the higher class and a large number of men of the lower class was open to serious objection. He thought, of course, that the noble Marquess was right in saying that it was very necessary to secure for the Public Service men whose qualifications were fitted to the higher work of the Departments by some such distinctions as those which existed. But the point was that they should give a stimulus to men in the Service to devote themselves with earnestness and zeal to the public interest; and if, combined with that, they showed greater capacity, they ought to be able to rise to the higher positions, if the chance were open to them, no matter what their qualifications were at first, because that was a matter of little consequence, what was to be looked to being the qualities they displayed afterwards. He thought that greater opportunities should be given for the promotion of these men. He should be glad if the whole position of clerks under the Playfair scheme were investigated by a Committee of the House, which he would prefer to a Departmental Committee as being better able to judge whether the arrangements for the Public Service might not be improved, so as to give more hope of advancement to the employés, and, at the same time, have a beneficial effect upon the Public Expenditure. The hon. Member for Queen's County (Mr. A. O'Connor) had gone down, not only to the lower, but to the lowest, stratum of the Public Service, the writers, and he complained that those gentlemen were only paid 10*d.* an hour, no doubt a small sum to work for, and it might be said that their position was a hard one. But it must be remembered that the State was not bound to give more than the market value for such work, although he could quite understand, and he should be willing to see, a higher rate, even 3*s.* an hour, paid for work of a certain kind perfectly well done. With regard to the other points, he thought every man in the establishment ought to have a chance of rising to the highest position, if he showed attention, zeal, and ability to discharge the duties; and, therefore, he should be glad to see the whole matter carefully inquired into, first of all, to ascertain whether the Playfair scheme ought to be retained in its integrity; secondly, whether it should be modified; and, thirdly, to ascertain whether the Public Service was not overmanned.

STR HENRY HOLLAND desired to protest against the statements made by the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands), that the first class clerks were too highly paid, and that they were "indulged." He had had some years of official experience, and he could distinctly assert that such allegations were quite contrary to the facts. No class of public servants did their duty more efficiently, and more to the satisfaction of their superiors, than these first class clerks; and he was sure that all the Heads of the Departments would confirm that view. He was not particularly wedded to the Playfair scheme, nor should he object to an inquiry by a Committee as to the working of that scheme, if it should be thought that the time had arrived when such an inquiry might be advantageously made; but he must remind hon. Members who had taken up the case of the second class clerks, and had dwelt upon the hardship inflicted upon them by not allowing them to be promoted into the upper division, that these clerks had entered the Public Service with a full knowledge of their position and chances. Without at all underrating the work done by these clerks, and their zeal, and without affirming that in no case should promotion be made in very deserving cases to the higher class, he doubted very much whether it would be to the interest of the Public Service that there should be any claim or supposed claim on the part of these clerks to promotion upon a vacancy in the higher division. Such a claim would necessarily lead to the promotion in every case of a lower division clerk.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, he trusted he should not be supposed to disparage the services of the upper portion of the clerks in the War Office. His contention was that the lower class clerks were not treated fairly in respect of having to do the same work and getting less pay for it than others sitting in the same room perhaps. The hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands) said he would take men into the Office at the market price for their services, and that when they were taken in he would give them every prospect of rising, if their ability and assiduity showed them to be worthy of promotion; but his (Mr. A. O'Connor's) complaint with regard to the writers was that, although they were taken into the Office at a low market price of 10*d.* an hour, if they worked for 15 or 16 years they had no increase of pay, although they gave good and valuable service, and their experience every year became more valuable to the public. Nor had they any chance of promotion, or of improvement in their position. He knew very well that the writers were worth a great deal more than 10*d.* an hour, and that the clerks in the War Office would be very sorry to lose their services; if they were withdrawn they would very soon want to know why they were taken away, and would find it very difficult to get through their work without their assistance. The work they had to do was of an important character, and required a certain amount of official experience for its proper execution; and yet there were men of 14 and 15 years' service having no hope of promotion, and receiving no more pay than they did when they first came into the Office. He considered it unjust on the part of the Treasury to resist the application for improvement in their position on the part of men who, after a long period of service, had become of great value to the public.

Vote agreed to.

(3.) £20,300, Rewards for Distinguished Services.

SIR JOHN HAY said, he proposed to move the reduction of this Vote by £1,300, in order that he might call attention to the fact that the reward for meritorious services here proposed was not the only reward bestowed upon such services, nor was it the best mode in which they might be recognized. As a matter of fact, a Vote for money, as a reward for meritorious services, was one very just and proper way of treating them; but there were some kinds of meritorious services which had always been rewarded by a Vote of Thanks in that House. That, in his opinion, was a more excellent way of proceeding in reference to the Army. This was the first occasion, he believed, when the courtesy of the House had not been extended to a private Member who had offered to its consideration a Vote of Thanks to the Army for distinguished services rendered in the field. According to the authority of Sir Erskine May, that courtesy had been extended on two former occasions—in 1803 to Mr. Sheridan, and in 1828 to Mr. Hobhouse; and he believed that if he had been permitted to bring under the notice of the House the services rendered in the Soudan it would have gladly passed a Vote of Thanks.

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out to the right hon. and gallant Gentleman that that Committee had no power whatever to deal with the subject he was discussing, which was one solely for the consideration of the House. The right hon. and gallant Gentleman was not in Order in discussing on this Vote the subject of a Motion he had placed on the Paper.

SIR JOHN HAY said, he proposed to justify his proposal to reduce the Vote by £1,300 by pointing out that this was not the best manner in which reward could be offered for the distinguished services to which he was about to call the attention of the Committee. Very recently in the Soudan certain meritorious services had been performed, and it had been stated that the War Office and the Admiralty had alike proposed to recognize those services by giving sums of money; but he could not find any trace of the sums voted by Parliament for such services rendered. Thus, Members were deprived of any opportunity of expressing their opinion on those services. He believed this was an unusual course, and he could find no parallel case in which a large sum of money had been paid to the Navy or the Army while no charge was submitted to the House. No doubt, the only opportunity which Members of the House had for considering services rendered was on Vote 1. That opportunity was taken for asking the House for a sum of money to bestow on persons who rendered these services; and yet they were informed that money had been paid by the Admiralty and the War Office without any Vote being taken in that House. He ventured to say there were many in that House who would gladly have voted the money, and it was strange that there should be no trace of a Vote for the money which they knew had been paid.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: If a Vote had been taken for a gratuity, it would have been in Vote 15 for Miscellaneous Services. It could not possibly come under a Vote for Non-Effective Services.

SIR JOHN HAY said, it was desirable that the House or the Committee should, in some way or other, understand how, where, and when the rewards were to be given for the most distinguished services which had recently occurred in the Soudan. The Army was fighting in a space 50 miles square; within that space nine battles had been fought. Amongst those battles were the two victories gained by General Graham which entitled him, and the officers and men serving with him, to the thanks, not only of the House, but of the country. Those two victories involved the destruction of 20,000 lives, and retrieved the honour of the English name in the Soudan. No doubt, the prestige of England had been sadly shaken by previous defeats, and the enormous loss of life which they entailed; but General Graham, with an imperfect force of 4,000 picked up haphazard, was sent down, and he, in the most gallant manner, succeeded in defeating a large force of the enemy in a manner beyond all praise. That was decidedly one of those distinguished services for which the thanks of the House had been formerly given.

THE CHAIRMAN said, he could not understand how the right hon. and gallant Gentleman connected his statements with the reduction of the Vote.

SIR JOHN HAY said, his object was to point out that there was a more excellent way of rewarding these services than that which the War Office had adopted. He, therefore, thought it right to call attention to these distinguished services which were being rewarded in so imperfect a manner.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, those services could not be considered under this Vote. The Vote could have no possible reference to the services to which the right hon. and gallant Gentleman referred, because it was framed before the battles were fought.

SIR JOHN HAY asked on what Vote it would be possible to call attention to rewards which had been given, and were now being given, to the officers and men of the Army and Navy for the distinguished services for which the House had not been allowed to thank them?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, he did not think it was altogether his duty to tell the right hon. and gallant Gentleman under what Vote he would be able to call the attention of the Committee to a particular question; but he imagined that the best plan to adopt would be to move a substantive Motion, or to propose a Resolution on the Motion to go into Committee of Supply. The question of a Vote of Thanks did not appear to be relevant to any particular Vote of the Army Estimates.

SIR JOHN HAY said, he did not wish to interfere with the Chairman's ruling, or to detain the Committee. He had given Notice of a Vote of Thanks; he had been refused by the Government an opportunity of bringing it forward; and it was not his fault if, having given Notice of it, he was not permitted to call the attention of the House or the Committee to the distinguished services recently rendered by the Army and Navy. He would not interfere with the Chairman's ruling; but he should endeavour, upon the last day of the Session, to give effect to the Motion which he now had upon the Paper.

Vote agreed to.

(4.) £77,000, Half Pay.

(5.) £1,193,900, Retired Pay, &c.

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT said, he had one remark to make upon this Vote, inasmuch as it brought clearly to view the cost of the abolition of purchase. He had in his hand a Return which the House had granted upon his proposition. From that Return it appeared that they had already paid in hard cash £6,444,771 5s. 4½d. for the abolition of purchase; and it was estimated in that Return what it would cost the country up to the year 1903. In 1883-4 the charge was £287,106 half-pay and retired pay to General Officers; £341,365, half-pay and retired pay to Regimental Officers; £12,000 for rewards for distinguished services, and £118,500 for payments awarded by the Army Purchase Commission, making a total for that year of £758,971. The Return showed that in 1902-3 the half-pay and retired pay of General Officers would be £174,876, the half-pay and retired pay of Regimental Officers £894,208, rewards for distinguished services £10,000, and payments under the awards of the Army Purchase Commissioners £17,800, making a total for that year of £1,096,884, and a grand total from 1883 to 1903, irrespective of the £6,444,771 already paid, of £18,019,398. He merely mentioned that to show the cost the country had been and would be put to by the abolition of purchase. There were, of course, certain payments made before the abolition of purchase; but into those he would not now enter. He could not help thinking that if they had been wiser in their generation, and had returned the regulation money, as was proposed at the time, they would not have had anything like this enormous sum of money to pay. He did not wish to say anything more; but he thought it was right the country should know what it had paid and would have to pay for the abolition of purchase in the Army.

COLONEL NOLAN said, he wished to direct the attention of the Committee to the injustice of the retirement scheme which was introduced by the late Government about seven years ago. He did not mean to say that the present Secretary of State for War (the Marquess of Hartington) was responsible for the scheme; indeed, the noble Marquess went as strongly as he could against the scheme, and took a Division against it. Under the retirement scheme captains were to be compulsorily retired at about 40 years of age, and majors at about 44 or 45. That scheme, if it was unjust and foolish, was consistent; but now the scheme had been made thoroughly inconsistent by the Secretary of State. Under a new Regulation, which he (Colonel Nolan) thought it was very probable had been issued at the instance of the Commander-in-Chief, captains were still to be compulsorily retired at 40; but majors were not to be allowed to retire at 44 or 45. The effect of that, of course, was that they would compel some men to serve beyond 45, while they would compel other men to retire at 40. It might be said that the new Rule would not be operative; but the Secretary of State for War had announced that he had taken the power to himself, and he meant to put it in force in certain cases. The noble Marquess would not allow a major to retire at 44 or 45; but he would compel a captain to retire at 40. It was ridiculous to say there was any difference between captains and majors. There was, practically, no difference between them; and if captains were too old for service at 40, surely majors were too old at 44 or 45. He thought it was very silly to compel officers to retire at 40 or 45; it was an extravagant system, and it had, to a great extent, prevented the Army being as good a Profession as it was formerly. If they had a scheme of retirement, it ought to be a consistent one. The present state of things required amendment, or, at least, an explanation.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON said, the compulsory retirement of officers at 40 years of age was as injurious to the State as it was unjust to the individual officers of the Service. Under the scheme to which the hon. and gallant Gentleman (Colonel Nolan) had referred, the State lost the services of men at the very prime of their lives—lost the services of the very men who were wanted to fight their battles; men who had seen difficult service were sent about their business in order that their places might be filled by young ensigns and boys. He was aware that up to the present time nothing had been done to alter the new Regulation; but the Regulation was made by the present Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Childers) some few years ago, and it must hold sway for some time. He (Sir Alexander Gordon) was satisfied that the day would come when the country would not allow the Rule to be carried out of compelling men who were of the greatest value to the Service to retire at 40 years of age. His chief object in rising, however, was to draw the attention of the Committee to the large increase in the Vote which they were now considering. The increase over last year was no less than £59,844. There was a steady yearly increase in the Non-Effective Vote for the Army. The Committee would find that for 1877-8 the Estimate for the Non-Effective Services was £1,985,069; this year it was £3,714,274, a difference of £1,700,000. It was really worth the while of the Committee to consider why this increase took place. Perhaps hon. Members who did not follow up the matter were not aware that the taxation of the country had increased steadily by £1,000,000 a-year for the last 10 years. The taxation was now £10,000,000 more than it was 10 years ago, and there was no security that in the next 10 years the taxation would not increase by another £10,000,000. The Committee ought, on occasions like the present, to do all they could to reduce the expenditure of the country. A few years ago he drew the attention of the Committee to the increase in the Non-Effective Vote; and Mr. Gathorne Hardy, who was then the Secretary of State for War, said—"Oh, this is a Vote over which we have no control; and we cannot help the increase." But he (Sir Alexander Gordon) could not accept this dictum. The noble Marquess (the Marquess of Hartington) ought to pay as much attention to the Non-Effective Vote as to the Effective Vote. The year before Viscount Cardwell left the War Office, the Army Estimates amounted to £11,600,000; now they reached £18,500,000. In that short time the Army Estimates had increased by such an enormous amount. Every year the Army Estimates increased by about £500,000; surely something ought to be done in the direction of retrenchment. The Committee met, and talked matters over; but they were actually powerless to check the War Office. The Army ridiculed the discussion on the Army Estimates, because they knew that nothing was ever done either to improve the position or comfort of the Army, or to make any effective reduction. The net increase in this Vote in the last 12 months was £59,000. He trusted that some explanation would be given of that increase.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, he had always regarded the retirement system as an extravagant system. In his opinion, the country ought to receive something more for its money—something, say, in the shape of Reserve officers. He only rose to make one suggestion, and it was that if the retirement system must go on, the retired officers ought to go to the Reserve. The officers were retired with considerable pay; therefore, why should they not be required to join the Militia, and thus do a modicum of service?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, that, in replying to the observations of his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for East Aberdeenshire (Sir Alexander Gordon), he was afraid he could only repeat what Mr. Gathorne Hardy said years ago—namely, that this was a Vote over which the Government had no control. Whether the present system of retirement was a good one or an extravagant one, it was deliberately introduced by the Government of the day, and sanctioned by the House of Commons; and, therefore, the matter had passed entirely out of the control of the Government. Parliament, of course, must provide the necessary funds. He understood the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for Galway (Colonel Nolan) to call attention to a statement he (the Marquess of Hartington) made the other day on the subject of suspension of voluntary retirement, and to make a comparison between the condition of compulsory and voluntary retirement. No alteration could be made in the system of compulsory retirement without very serious consideration. If any change were now made, the officers who had already been compulsorily retired would have very great ground of complaint. They would argue that they had been treated more unfairly than their successors. On the other hand, as he said the other day in answer to a Question, voluntary retirement was still at the discretion of the Secretary of State for War and the Commander-in-Chief, and the system was created for the express purpose of equalizing, as far as possible, the rate of promotion in the different corps of the Army. It was always understood that voluntary retirement would be used, according as it became desirable, either to stimulate or to check promotion in the Army. Under the circumstances he stated the other day, it was now found necessary to check somewhat the undue and abnormal rate of promotion which was going on in the different corps, and that was being done by means of the system of voluntary retirement.

COLONEL NOLAN said, the noble Marquess did not argue that it was better to retire officers compulsorily at 40 years of age than to allow them to remain in the Service longer; he had simply argued that the law would not allow him to change matters; he must retire captains at 40, whether it was right or wrong, though he was allowed to prevent other officers retiring at 45. That was the noble Marquess's case; he did not argue the case on its merits. The noble Marquess virtually contended that he was bound by law to retire captains at 40; but, in order to regulate promotion, he could prevent majors retiring at 44 or 45. Hard cases made bad laws. The noble Marquess was in the minority when the law was passed, and he voted against it. He did not approve of the law; and, therefore, he ought to alter the scheme, if necessary, by legislation. In one way, it would be hard on the men who had been retired at 40; but no injustice would be done if the noble Marquess were now to raise the age of compulsory retirement of captains to 42, 43, 44 or 45. It would be rather cheaper to let captains continue longer in the Service, and let majors retire earlier. The present scheme was extravagant, because 40 years was too young an age to put men out of their Profession. An officer was quite fit for duty at 55, so that it must be extravagant to retire him compulsorily 15 years earlier than was necessary. The nation was the sufferer in every respect; the charge imposed on the nation in consequence of this retirement scheme increased by £15,000 and £20,000 every year. The charge would increase year by year; indeed, it would not find its level for 10 or 15 years to come. This extravagant scheme would have to be remedied sooner or later.

MR. RYLANDS recollected perfectly well that when the retirement scheme in question was before the House some years ago, it was very strongly opposed by several hon. Members. Nothing could be more unsatisfactory than that they should have a Vote which was increasing every year under conditions which even the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Hartington) himself could not say were calculated to improve the efficiency of the Army. It was perfectly unjustifiable on the part of the Committee that they should allow to continue a scheme which was prejudicial to the interests of the Army, and which, at the same time, increased every year the burden upon the taxpayers of the country. When the scheme was before the House originally, he spoke very strongly against it, because he considered at the time it was a scheme which would necessarily lead to very large expenditure, and not only lead to a large expenditure, but have the effect of driving out of the Army some of the very best men they ought to keep. He had known many cases in which officers who were in the prime of life who chose the Army as a Profession, and who were admittedly very efficient officers, had been sent about their business, and for what? To increase the efficiency of the Army? Certainly not. To make a flow of promotion. The public purse and the efficiency of the Army was to be sacrificed in order to gratify a desire that there should be a flow of promotion. The time was not very far distant when people would say that the efficiency of the Army was not at all commensurate with the cost imposed on the country, and they would ask the reason why. When the people discovered that the non-effective charges amounted to such an enormous proportion of the entire cost of the Army, they would not fail to see that the system had been bolstered up, and that a large expenditure was being incurred in the interest of one class. He believed that if all these pensions and superannuations went on increasing year after year, the time would soon come when the difficulties which the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War now experienced would be dealt with by the people in a manner which would not be pleasant to those who were receiving the pensions and superannuations. ["Oh, oh!"] Hon. Gentlemen might differ from him; but he was saying what he believed from his knowledge of the feeling of the working classes of the country. If these enormous pensions continued to increase, the feeling of the people would be that their taxes were taken from them without justification, that they were being defrauded, and that large sums were being paid for which the country got no advantage whatever. The Members of the present Government were opposed to the retirement scheme now in force; but, of course, they could not be expected to make any change that Session. He was persuaded, however, that they would shortly look seriously at this matter with a view, if possible, of avoiding these constant increases of the non-effective charges of the Army, and of securing that men who were most capable in the Service of the country should not be retired merely to provide a flow of promotion.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, the view taken by the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for Galway (Colonel Nolan), and the hon. Gentleman the Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands), was that he (the Marquess of Hartington) had not defended the retirement system upon its merits. He had not done so, because he did not think it was desirable that they should be constantly altering the terms under which officers served in the Army. He thought that unless there was some absolute necessity for a change, it would be much better to leave the matter alone. The terms under which officers in the Army served were embodied in the Royal Warrant; and unless strong reasons were shown why he should do so, it was not necessary for him to investigate any individual grievances. He was far from saying that some Regulations—he would not say these precise Regulations—were not necessary. When his hon. Friend the Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands) talked about these Regulations being absolutely unnecessary for the efficiency of the Army, and about their being only initiated for the purpose of providing a flow of promotion amongst the officers, he forgot altogether that a flow of promotion was absolutely necessary for the efficiency of the Army. Did his hon. Friend want battalions of the Army to be commanded by old men of 70 and 80 years of age; or did he think it was expedient for the efficiency of the Service that battalions should be commanded by officers in the prime of life? How were officers to rise in their Profession unless some steps were taken to secure a flow of promotion? When the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Rylands) talked about there being a large expenditure in the interest solely of a class, he altogether forgot that some provisions of this kind were absolutely necessary for the very existence of the efficiency of the Army.

Vote agreed to.

(6.) £120,000, Widows' Pensions, &c.

(7.) £17,000, Pensions for Wounds.

(8.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £33,200, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge for Chelsea and Kilmainham Hospitals and the In-Pensioners thereof, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1885."

COLONEL NOLAN asked whether the question of pensioners came under this Vote?

THE CHAIRMAN: No; under the next Vote.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, that on this Vote he wished to submit a point to the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War. Some time ago there was published a statement of the accounts of the Commissioners of Chelsea Hospital for services other than those voted by Parliament for the year ending 31st March, 1883; and from that account it appeared that there was a balance in the hands of the Commissioners for Army prize money of £76,000 in securities, and some £1,200 or £1,300 in cash. Of all that sum only £121 had been distributed as prize money to the soldiers or their representatives; but a sum of £200 had been granted to the officials in Chelsea Hospital as the expense of the Prize Department—that was to say, the Secretary in the Hospital was allowed £100 a-year, and the principal clerk was allowed another £100 a-year in order to enable them to disburse a total sum of £121. The simple fact was that it cost £200 to pay away £120. The Public Accounts Committee called on the Commissioners of the Chelsea Hospital to say what amount of prize money had been distributed during the past three years, and this was the result. Taking the three years ending 31st March, 1884, the sum annually distributed was respectively £65 11s., £121, and £167, and for each of these years there had been a charge made of £200 to defray the expense of distributing this miserable amount of money. The story of the distribution of prize money through the Chelsea Hospital and the Military Authorities was one of the most disgraceful stories of the whole history of the military arrangement of this country. The very names of Banda and Kirwee must stink in the nostrils of all who were acquainted with the transactions in regard to prize money. The gentlemen who got the salaries to which he had referred had no right at all to them, as they did no work, and as the money was taken from funds that belonged to the soldiers and their representatives. In order to get rid of the balance arising from the prize money, the authorities were obliged to spend £3,361 in the maintenance of grounds and for other purposes at Chelsea. It appeared to him that the Committee was bound to take some notice of the way in which this money was being jobbed away; and, in order to bring the matter to an issue, he would move a reduction of the Vote by the amount of the salary of the Secretary and of the principal clerk, in all £200.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £33,000, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge for Chelsea and Kilmainham Hospitals and the In-Pensioners thereof, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1885."—(Mr. Arthur O'Connor.)

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I trust the hon. Member will not persevere in his Motion for the reduction of this Vote. The matter is one with which the War Office has absolutely no concern whatever. So far as this money is concerned, it is true the Chelsea Commissioners, who have to deal with it, are subordinates of the War Office; but, so far as I am concerned, I have nothing whatever to do with their action, and have no knowledge of the working of the prize fund. The Army prize fund accounts are audited by the Auditor General in the ordinary way; I can only promise to ascertain whether the sum is properly spent.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR: After that declaration from the noble Marquess I will rest satisfied; and I can only say that I trust that by this time next year a General Election will have relieved the noble Marquess from the service of the Department. If I then happen to be in my present position, I shall take care to raise the question, and probably I shall not do so without success.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

(9.) £1,411,000, Out-Pensions.

COLONEL NOLAN said, there was a Question which he had put upon the Paper some two months ago, when the Army Estimates were before them, which he wished now to repeat. He would follow the habit which had now for some time been adopted in the House of putting the Question without reading it from the Paper, as the War Office knew all about it from its being on the Votes. He had repeatedly brought the question under the notice of the War Office, so that no one could plead ignorance of it. He did not wish to have any dispute as to the facts, for he believed his statement was perfectly correct, having gone to the trouble of obtaining from the various Departments of the War Office what information he could of an accurate kind. The case was one of a very gross kind; the individual whose grievance he was representing, who was a very poor man, having been done out of 3*d.* a-day and part of the result of his labours during the greater portion of his life. It seemed to him absolutely necessary that the rights of pensioners of this kind should be carefully protected. These pensioners from the ranks were not like the officers or higher grade pensioners they had been dealing with under Vote 19. The amounts were very humble compared with those voted to the officers; but, however small, they were as important to the poor pensioners, or even more so, than were the large sums granted to people in higher grades, and it was necessary they should be very closely guarded and watched by the House. He could not mention a stronger and more grave case of a man having been absolutely done out of his pension than the present. The case was that of a man who had enlisted very many years ago into the Indian Artillery, the contract of enlistment being different to that for the English Artillery or the Royal Artillery. The question of character was not so much looked into in the case of men enlisted for the Indian Artillery in those days. The character of men enlisted for the Royal Artillery was, of course, a matter of moment; but in the case of men enlisted for the Indian Army they desired to get the white man, and were prepared to give him 1*s.* a-day without taking his character into consideration. He mentioned that with emphasis, because, to a great extent, the point of the whole case turned upon it. This man had contracted, as a great many men from this district did, to join the Indian Artillery on the understanding that at the end of 20 years he was to get a pension. It was customary in those days to enlist nearly the whole of the white contingent of the Indian Artillery in the South of Ireland, the Royal Artillery being recruited from the North of Ireland and England. Well, there happened in India the great Mutiny. The Indian Artillery was amalgamated with the Royal Artillery, not in exactly the same way as the Infantry were amalgamated, but still an amalgamation took place. 8,000 or 9,000 men of the Indian Artillery mutinied—that was to say, the Law Officers of the Crown declared it to be a mutiny. They declined to serve with the new force, but this man did not. These 7,000 or 8,000 men declined to serve, because they thought that their case would not be properly considered by the Government, and no doubt their apprehensions were well founded if the case of this man was at all typical of the action of the English Military Authorities. The artilleryman whose case he was bringing before the Committee went to Lucknow. Two years' service was reckoned off his time on account of the transfer, and having served the requisite number of years he was to have his pension. The original contract, as he (Colonel Nolan) had stated, was that this man was to get 1*s.* a day at the end of his service. He was to have his pension at the end of 21 years, so that when he had served 19 years, having had two years taken off on account of his agreement to be transferred to the English Army, he was entitled to 1*s.* a-day. Within a month of the expiration of the 19 years the War Office said practically—"We do not want to give you this 1s. a-day; we will bring you before a Medical Board and see whether you are fit for service." They brought him up before a Medical Board, and they found that he had varicose veins, and they dismissed him from the Service, striking off 3d. a-day—a small amount no doubt, but to a man in the position of this person a sum as important as £500 a-year would be to a Member of that House. Great blame was to be attached to the Military Authorities who had held out to this man, as an inducement to join the English Service, that they would keep the contract of the Indian Government. In the case of this man they had obviously broken their contract. The officer who applied to the Medical Board might have been ignorant of the rule that an Indian artilleryman was in a different position to that of an English artilleryman. Just 27 days before this man would have been entitled to his 1s. a-day he was discharged on account of varicose veins. It was perfectly absurd to discharge a man in that way. The man in all probability had got into some difficulty or other, not sufficient to entitle the officers to bring him before a court martial, but still sufficient to render his superiors inclined to punish him. Probably he had been bragging about his pension, saying, perhaps—"You fellows of the Royal Artillery are not so well situated as I am." He might have made himself unpopular in that way, and have got himself disliked; but the fact of a man being disliked was certainly not sufficient to entitle the authorities to deprive him of 3d. a-day for life. The grievance in this case was a most serious one. It was said, as a rule, the men of a regiment were protected by their own officers. No doubt that was so in 99 cases out of 100. Generally it was a most efficient protection, but in this case it was nothing of the kind. The feeling of esprit de corps which would have induced the officers to protect the men of the Royal Artillery was wanting in the case of the man who had left the Indian Artillery to join them in time of emergency. As a rule, the men taken over from the Indian Service were not badly treated; but in this case, as he had explained, it was probable that it was seen that the man was about to get an advantage over their own soldiers, and that he was bragging about it, and therefore the officers sought to punish him. The man was discharged for a nominal weakness of health—not that the medical certificate could be challenged—but it was absurd to suppose the man could not do barrack duty for the remaining 27 days of his 21 years. He might have been unfit to go with his battery on service; but it was absurd to suppose that he could not, on account of varicose veins, discharge barrack duty for 27 days. He had gone into this case at some length, and had repeatedly brought it before the notice of the War Office, because it was one of a serious kind to the individual for whom he was pleading. He was very curious to know how the War Office would treat it.

SIR ARTHUR HAYTER said, he was very glad the hon. and gallant Gentleman had brought this case forward; probably it was a case of one of his own constituents?

COLONEL NOLAN: No; it is not.

SIR ARTHUR HAYTER said, then it was the case of a man belonging to that branch of the Service—the Royal Artillery—of which the hon. and gallant Gentleman had been so distinguished a member? He (Sir Arthur Hayter) fully admitted all the statements made by the hon. and gallant Gentleman and those he had placed on the Paper, with two exceptions. He found the fifth paragraph was incorrect, there being no record at Woolwich of the man ever having been employed on active service in the field.

COLONEL NOLAN: He took part in the advance on Lucknow.

SIR ARTHUR HAYTER said, that there was no record of the man having been on active service, nor had he any medal. Again, with regard to paragraph 7, he could not admit that the Government had saved anything or that the man had lost anything, because it could be shown that he had not fulfilled the contract which he had made with the late Indian Government, the fulfilment of which contract alone would have entitled him to full pension. Although that might be thought a hard case, the man having nearly completed his service, it was by no means an exceptional one. There were several cases—four or five at least—in which men had rendered themselves ineligible for full pension a few days or a month or two before the expiration of their period of service. The Chelsea Commissioners had taken into consideration the character of this man—and it was necessary to look into that question for a moment. It was obvious from the statement of the hon. and gallant Gentleman that this man could not have made up his 21 years' service without boon service, because he was enlisted on the 18th of August, 1847, and discharged on the 14th of July, 1866. Even adding the two years' boon service which was given to every soldier who enlisted from the Indian into the Imperial Army, he had not made up his 21 years. The man had lost through his misconduct, and through being twice tried by court martial, 83 days' service; and although, at the end of 21 years' service, he would have had 1s. a-day, he was only allowed 9d., because he had not completed his contract of service. His character was returned on his discharge—and it was well known that they were not unduly severe in making that return on a man's leaving the Army—as indifferent. He had been 24 times drunk, twice tried by court martial, 32 times in the regimental report book; and the cause of his discharge was that he was unfit for military service in consequence of varicose veins. However, the case had been taken up, and the Chelsea Board had been referred to on no fewer than five occasions by the War Office; but the Commissioners had always most consistently refused to make any addition to the man's pension. They said they were unable to make any alteration under the terms of their Statute, by which their action was governed, and pointed out clearly that the Statute only allowed them to give 1s. a-day pension when a man had fulfilled his contract of 21 years' service, and that for anything less than that they could not give more than 9d. a-day. That was the only ground for their decision, and there was none of a special character for the reduction of this pension from 1s. to 9d. The Bill which the Secretary of State for War had introduced into the House, and which stood for second reading that evening, would enable them to give greater elasticity in the matter of pensions, because for the future they would be given under the Royal Warrant, or under Regulations made by the Secretary of State for the time being. He did not know that he could say more, even if he went more fully into the case; but it did not appear to him to be an exceptionally hard case when the facts were fully gone into.

COLONEL NOLAN said, his contention was still unaltered. The Financial Secretary allowed that the man was within 27 days, deducting 83, of the completion of his 21 years' service. Of course, if the man had had the 83 days, the whole case of the Government would fall to the ground, according to the strict letter of the contract. If this had been the case of a rich man, who could afford to bring an action in a Court of Law, there would have been no hesitation on the part of anyone sitting on such a case to declare that this had been a gross breach of faith. It would be held at once that this was such a flagrant swindle on the side of the defendants that they would be at once required to comply with the terms of the contract, and to pay the costs. The Government were simply eluding the contract. He (Colonel Nolan) was not complaining that the Chelsea Commissioners had not given the man 1s. a-day; but what he was complaining of was that the officers had discharged him in the manner in which they did, and for the sake, perhaps, of preventing his getting the 1s. a-day to which he was entitled. It was usual, just before the expiration of a man's period of service, to give him a month's furlough—to send him away a month before his time. As to drunkenness and the question of character, as he had already pointed out, the Indian Government had been anxious to get a white-faced man beside a black-faced man, and in securing that they did not care so much about individual character. They wanted a white man, and they got him, because the white man was sure, or thought he was sure, of getting his 1s. a-day pension. The British Government, when it took over the Indian Army, had undertaken to carry out the contract of the Indian Government; but it had neglected to do so. As for the man getting drunk, they could not expect all the cardinal virtues for 1s. a-day; and as to his having been on active service, he must have been pretty near the campaigning, because he got his two years' boon service for his advance on Lucknow. To his (Colonel Nolan's) mind, this was one of the grossest cases of violation of contract—at any rate in spirit. If, however, he was told by the Financial Secretary that this case could be dealt with under the new Bill, of course he would not go further into it. Otherwise, however, when the next Vote for high pensions came on he should move a reduction, and point out the discrepancy between the award of £800 or £1,000 a-year without question to this or that distinguished man, whilst they defrauded "Tommy Atkins" of his 3d. a-day.

SIR ARTHUR HAYTER: This man was discharged by a Regimental Board of Royal Artillery officers.

COLONEL NOLAN: The War Office ordered them to discharge him.

SIR ARTHUR HAYTER: Not in the first instance. Application must have been made for a Board to assemble.

COLONEL NOLAN: The Secretary of State orders the Regimental Board.

SIR ARTHUR HAYTER: Yes; but the Board, when assembled, inquires into the case.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON said, he wished to call attention to the defective manner in which these Estimates were presented, in consequence of the amalgamation of the Supplementary Votes with the original Votes. The net increase on the total Vote was stated to amount to £91,100; but those who had eyes to see might read in a foot note that there was £50,000 added to the original Vote last year in the Supplementary Estimate for the Egyptian Vote, and the consequence was that the real increase on the Vote of last year was £141,100. That arose from the system of not placing the original Vote of one year in juxtaposition with the original Vote of the subsequent year, which was the only way of forming a proper comparison between the Votes of one year and the Votes of another. The result was that the increase was always minimized and the decrease was magnified, and so a very wrong impression was conveyed. Members at a late hour—say, at 2 or 3 o'clock in the morning—saw "net decrease" so many thousands, and they were satisfied that the amount was less than in the previous year; but, in reality, they might be voting hundreds of thousands more, and that was one of the reasons why the Estimates crept up without their knowing it. He hoped that next year the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Hartington) would consider whether he would not adopt the system adopted in regard to the Navy Estimates, by which this inconvenience might be entirely obviated. In the Navy Estimates the original Votes for one year were placed in juxtaposition with the original Estimates of the following year, so that the House could make an exact comparison between the Estimates of one year and the Estimates of another, and know precisely whether the normal expenditure of the country was being increased or not.

SIR ARTHUR HAYTER said, the increase was owing to £91,000 which was the lesser amount of the Non-Effective Votes.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON said, he thought the hon. and gallant Gentleman was altogether wrong. It was distinctly in consequence of the Supplementary Vote provided last year for Egypt, and the real increase was £141,100, and not £91,000.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, he would look into the matter and consider the system in regard to the Navy Estimates; but he could not imagine that there could be any difficulty in comparing the amounts in the present form.

Vote agreed to.

(10.) £190,000, Superannuation Allowances.

(11.) £50,100, Retired Allowances, &c. to Officers of the Militia, Yeomanry, and Volunteer Forces.

COLONEL KING-HARMAN asked the noble Marquess to give a little more information with respect to Quartermasters of Militia. In an answer to a Question the noble Marquess could not be expected to say much; but he thought a case had been completely made out in regard to these Quartermasters. Their case was simply this. A very small number of deserving officers, who had chiefly risen from the ranks, and had served Her Majesty in every part of the globe faithfully and well, had grievances which the public outside believed to be substantial grievances, involving a small amount to the State, but meaning a large amount to men of this position. He did not think it was sufficient for the noble Marquess to say, as he had said that day, that this matter had been inquired into by previous Secretaries of State for War and decided. He did not wish to say anything offensive; but it seemed to him that this Government rather prided themselves on having a policy entirely different from that of their Predecessors, and he thought this was a matter of justice to men who deserved well of their country. The matter was very small in point of pounds, shillings, and pence; but it was a hard thing that men who had given so many years of their lives to their country should at the latter end of their lives find themselves in an almost penniless position. They were not in the position of ordinary pensioners. They were given the rank of Captains, and they had to keep up a certain position; but their pensions were very small—far less than they imagined they had a right to, and far less than he thought they were entitled to.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, he did not know that he could add anything to what he had said in answer to a Question that day. The fact, he believed, was, that in 1870 the maximum pension for these men was 4*s.* a-day, and in 1877 it was nearly 5*s.* a-day. In 1881, however, the maximum was raised to 7*s.* a-day, as compensation for compulsory retirement. He did not think there was any precedent whatever for giving an increased pension to Quartermasters who had retired under a War-rant, as these men had.

Vote agreed to.

SUPPLY—NAVY ESTIMATES.

(12.) £62,500, Medicines and Medical Stores, &c.

(13.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That a sum, not exceeding £10,400, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Expense of Martial Law, &c. which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1885.”

CAPTAIN MAXWELL-HERON said, he was sorry to have to trespass on the Committee in bringing before them a question which was raised last year; but he would not travel over the same ground. He must, however, bring the matter up now, first, because he thought there had been a misunderstanding as to the arrangement made by the Prime Minister with the House; secondly, because of certain passages in the speech of the Secretary to the Admiralty on that occasion, which were prejudicial to the interests of the late Commander of the Clyde, but to which, as they were then on the Report stage, he had no opportunity of replying; and, thirdly, because this was the only Court of Appeal to which recourse could be had with regard to a Naval court martial. The Committee would recollect that at an early hour on one day in August last he brought the subject of the court martial upon Commander Heron, of Her Majesty's Ship Clyde, before the Committee. He then raised three principal points—the first was as to the evidence of the second in command of the Clyde, Gunner Fitzgerald; the second was with respect to the corroborative evidence; and the third was the constitution of the court martial itself. To the last-named point he should mainly confine his remarks on this occasion. The Prime Minister agreed to refer the point he raised as to Gunner Fitzgerald to the Law Advisers of the Crown; but, at the same time, the right hon. and gallant Gentleman opposite (Sir John Hay), and also, he believed, the right hon. Member for South-West Lancashire (Sir R. Assheton Cross), asked the Prime Minister whether he would also refer to the Law Officers the point as to the constitution of the court; and he quite understood that the right hon. Gentleman agreed to do so. He was rather astonished at receiving from the Admiralty an official letter containing the opinion of the Law Officers; but that opinion only related to the point as to Gunner Fitzgerald. The circumstances of the case were these—Fitzgerald was second in command of the Clyde when Commander Maxwell-Heron had command of that ship; and he was afterwards tried and dismissed from the Service. Last year he drew attention to these facts, and pointed out, first, that Fitzgerald was an interested and prejudiced witness; and next, that this man and another who gave corroborative evidence having been under arrest, were released in order to give Queen's evidence against the Commander of the Clyde. He also drew attention to the fact that at the preliminary inquiry

these men made certain statements, and when called at the court martial they swore to diametrically opposite statements. One made a statement so prejudicial to the prisoner that the court did not believe him. He could not go over the circumstances of the case again, because the matter had been referred to the Law Officers; but their dictum was this—that after eliminating the evidence of Gunner Fitzgerald, there was still sufficient evidence to justify the decision of the court. But how was this arbitration—if he might so call it—conducted? It was simply a case of submitting the decisions of two courts martial, one on the Commander of the Clyde and one on Gunner Fitzgerald, to the Law Officers, the point placed before them being only one of the points he had raised in that House. It was the well-known practice that in an arbitration the two sides should be heard; but in this case only one side had been heard, and none of the points raised in the debate was submitted to the Law Advisers except the one he had mentioned. The only consideration put before them was whether, after eliminating the evidence of Fitzgerald, there was sufficient justification for the decision. He thought this unfortunate and gallant officer ought to have been allowed to put before the Law Officers the points that had been raised in the debate, and the method adopted seemed to him to be a very extraordinary way of carrying out the intentions of the House. As he understood the arrangement made, it had not been carried out, neither the constitution of the court nor the corroborative evidence being referred to the Law Officers. Another point was this. In his speech last year the Secretary to the Admiralty—no doubt without intention—used some words which were very disparaging to the officer in question. Referring to the most serious charge, that of appropriating certain things, the hon. Gentleman said there was doubt in the mind of the court as to the charge made by Fitzgerald against Commander Maxwell-Heron. How could he know whether there was doubt in the mind of the court? The court was sworn to secrecy; but to say there was a doubt in the mind of the court was to say that the accused officer only escaped conviction by a very narrow margin owing to that doubt. The third consideration was that there was no Court of Appeal against decisions of courts martial but the House of Commons. These courts could ruin, condemn, convict, and sentence a man without there being any appeal. But in the Army every decision of a court martial was referred to the Judge Advocate General, and he believed the Judge Advocate General had had many thousands of such decisions sent to him for revision, and that at least 400 or 500 had been altered upon his advice. Why should not the same system be adopted in the Navy? There was at one time a Judge Advocate General in the Navy; but he was disposed of, and his duties were undertaken by the Counsel to the Admiralty. Last year there was a case raised, which he understood the Government would not submit to the Counsel to the Admiralty, though if it had been an Army case they would have submitted it to the Judge Advocate General. He could not see what use the Counsel to the Admiralty was. He received a certain amount from Votes by that House, and the rest was made up by fees; but such a system ought not to be allowed to prevail. There was no appeal against the decision of a Naval court martial, and that was why these cases could only be brought before that House. The constitution of this court martial was the point to which he wished to refer more especially. It was laid down in the Rules under the Naval Discipline Act that no officer should be relieved from attending upon a court martial, except the Admiral of a Royal Dockyard. This court martial was held on December 13th, 1882, on board the Victory at Portsmouth. The order of the Service was, that on the signal for a court martial being given, all officers of junior rank to the President must repair to the ship and answer to their names. On this occasion the names were called over, among them being the names of Captain Gordon, captain of the Vernon torpedo ship, and Captain Oodrington, captain of the Excellent. They were reported by the Deputy Judge Advocate General as being absent on leave. But how were they on leave? One of them was reported to be absent on Government duty. Now, it could not be accepted as right by anyone who valued the Services, that a man should be reported absent on leave when he was with his regiment or on board his ship. If he was on board his ship he was on duty, and the same if he was with his regiment, and he could not be relieved of his responsibility. There might be a mutiny or a fire, or any other circumstances might happen; and if this rule was to be accepted, an officer who was supposed to be absent on duty might shelter himself behind that plea. It was absolutely impossible that the captain of a line-of-battle ship should be on board his ship except on duty, and on this morning both Captain Gordon and Captain Codrington were on their ships, although reported absent on leave. Captain Gordon, he believed, had received leave; but it had been cancelled at his own request, and Captain Codrington had been granted leave on Government duty. The primary duty of all Naval officers was to attend courts martial, and he submitted that these two officers ought to have repaired to the Victory, and answered to their names. They ought to have been members of the court, and as they were not the court assumed the aspect of having been packed. He did not mean that it was packed for any particular reason; but the order of the Admiralty could not be allowed to contravene an Act of Parliament. On this occasion these were the facts, and the answer he had received from the Admiralty upon this matter was that the Commander of the Clyde had an opportunity of challenging the constitution of the court; but he could not possibly know who were the officers who ought to have sat upon that court. He was satisfied with the constitution of the court with regard to the honour, integrity, and ability of the officers who sat there; but being a prisoner he could not possibly know that there were two absent officers who ought to have been present. But supposing he had challenged the constitution of the court, he conceived that if there was a chance he ought to lose no opportunity of trying to relieve this officer from the position in which he was placed by a sentence acknowledged to be very severe by every officer of the Navy of every rank to whom he had spoken. These were the facts, and he could not conceive how they could be controverted. Captain Gordon and Captain Codrington were on board their ships, and if they did not sit on the court then the constitution of the court was illegal. He knew it was a very difficult thing to get a matter such as this discussed at a late hour, and he had had the greatest difficulty in bringing it forward last year; but he knew there were many Members of that House who thought the case a very hard one. The Prime Minister had acknowledged that the case was a very peculiar one. At the court martial not a single Executive officer was examined. All the witnesses called were subordinate Warrant officers, and he was convinced that some day the whole truth of the matter would come out. He believed that his unfortunate relative was the victim of a conspiracy, and that it was a conspiracy in which the witnesses were obliged to take the course they did, and to make the statements they did, to save themselves from the punishment they really deserved. He considered that this unfortunate officer was sacrificed to overweening confidence in the second in command of the Clyde. He trusted that officer in every way, and then that officer had turned round upon him. There was one other point he would like to submit to the Committee. After the court martial had dismissed the Commander of the Clyde from the Service, the second in command was tried, and though the Commander of the Clyde was subpoenaed as a witness, the court absolutely refused to receive him as a witness, although he had been the Commander of the ship, and there were many things stated at the inquiry which he had no opportunity of refuting because he was not represented, and his evidence could not be given. That in itself, he thought, was a very serious matter; but, however that might be, the case he now brought before the Committee was simply that the constitution of the court being illegal its decision was of no value, and went for nothing. He firmly believed that the decision was illegal, for these two officers ought to have sat upon the court martial, and he was quite sure there were many officers in the Navy who were of the same opinion. Every officer he had spoken to took the same view, and one of them who had been and still was one of the greatest friends of Commander Heron was General Gordon, who was now at Khartoum, and had accepted his services on his intended journey to the Congo. General Gordon was the least likely man in the world to accept the services of a man who he thought had been guilty of the crimes alleged against Commander Heron. He was deprived of every opportunity of vindicating his character before this court, and holding that the constitution of the court was illegal, he felt that he ought to leave no stone unturned on behalf of this unfortunate officer in order to replace him in his former position; and he maintained that if the constitution of the court was illegal the decision at which it arrived must be quashed. He sympathized much with the position in which this gentleman was placed, because, whatever the decision of the court martial might have been, he was satisfied that he had never done anything in his life to discredit himself, or that would raise a blush on the face of any of his friends.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That a sum, not exceeding £10,150, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Expenses of Martial Law, &c. which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1885.”—(Captain Maxwell-Heron.)

SIR JOHN HAY said, his recollection of what had occurred last year entirely confirmed what had fallen from his hon. and gallant Friend opposite. On that occasion the intention of the House was, no doubt, that the whole of the points raised in the debate should be referred to the Law Officers of the Crown. He himself was present on the occasion, and remembered that he had asked the Prime Minister that very question, and the answer of the right hon. Gentleman was that his hon. and learned Friends had had the advantage of hearing the whole of the debate and that all the points raised would be referred to the Law Officers of the Crown. It was, therefore, with considerable surprise that he found that only one point had been referred to the Law Officers of the Crown for inquiry, that point being, in his (Sir John Hay's) opinion, of not much value. The composition of the court martial was, no doubt, satisfactory; but the evidence brought before it had been recognized by many as evidence which ought not to have been relied upon; and although he understood the Law Officers of the Crown to say that there was sufficient evidence to justify the finding of the court martial irrespective of the evidence supposed to be tainted, yet the Committee would perceive how much the mind of the Court would at the time have been influenced by the evidence which would be presented to it, although it was found afterwards that the evidence was such that it ought not to have been received. A court composed of men not of legal mind, but of honourable gentlemen only, having before them evidence which at the time was not properly estimated at its true value, would naturally be influenced in its decision by that evidence; and although it might be true that some subordinate points were not affected by the character of that evidence, yet it must be remembered that the charges most detrimental to the character of this officer were the charges which were not proved. He was bound to say—it was his duty to say—that Commander Heron had served with him during five years, and that he knew him to be an officer of high character, in view of which circumstance it did seem to him that his case was of the hardest. That officer had served with the highest character until he was 45 years of age, originally in the Red Sea, and there he was placed in relation with General Gordon. He held in his hand a letter from that distinguished man to Commander Heron, from which it appeared that he had selected him to accompany him to the Congo, which arrangement would have been carried out had not General Gordon been sent on his present mission to the Soudan. It seemed to him that so distinguished an officer as Commander Heron, whose character when he came home from the Red Sea so highly commended itself to General Gordon, was not the man of whom it ought to be supposed that he would commit an act which he must have known would ruin his name and fortune. He contended that the character of this officer ought not to be ruined entirely for a comparatively trifling mistake. Commander Heron was sent down to the Clyde, a vessel fitted up as a dancing saloon, with gas pipes and other appurtenances, and with a gunner in charge. Commander Heron was not expected to superintend the dances, which he believed was the work of sergeants and of this gunner, who had been sentenced to dismissal from the Service with disgrace. Commander Heron, who had been all his life on active service, had so far distinguished himself that when he returned from the Red Sea he was offered promotion to the rank of retired captain, although he preferred service in a lower rank which would afford him occupation. He (Sir John Hay) acknowledged that he had not sufficiently attended to the duties which he was appointed to discharge on board the Clyde, and that he thought certainly deserved some punishment; but the amount of punishment in such cases should, in his opinion, be proportioned to the offence. It was perfectly clear that the House of Commons had a right to see that the Act by which courts martial were appointed was correctly carried out, and it was, therefore, their province to inquire into the sentences of courts martial. Now, who were the officers to be excused from sitting on courts martial? There was a special clause in the Act of Parliament by which Admiral Superintendents were so excused. He had served on many courts martial, and knew perfectly well how the Act was to be interpreted; it provided that every officer should appear on board the flagship who was within sight of flag or sound of gun. It was decided by Captain Codrington's superiors that his services were of more value in another capacity. That officer had business to attend to in Portsmouth Harbour; the court martial was held on three successive days; he was present at Portsmouth and was cognizant of the fact that a court martial was being held; but as he had pointed out, through no fault of his own, he did not attend. But then there was the captain of the Vernon. He had, it was true, applied for leave of absence, but he had not availed himself of it, and it was his duty to have attended on board the flagship on which the court was held, and to have answered to his name when called upon. The result of the absence of these two officers was, that Commander Heron instead of being tried by a court composed of an admiral and six captains was tried by a court composed only of an admiral and four captains. A court of six was undoubtedly of more value than a court consisting of five officers only. He knew not whether this court martial of five was or was not unanimous, because the members of the court were bound not to reveal what took place beyond the room in which the court was held; so much so, indeed, that a gallant friend of his, overjoyed at the fact that the character of a fellow-officer had been cleared, having told him, when he returned his sword, that he had been unanimously acquitted, was justly reprimanded for breaking the rules. But he would say that a court of six would have had more stability, and its decision carried more weight, especially as the Act of Parliament said that a court martial should consist of nine officers, and that it was only when that number could not be obtained, that it might consist of less. It appeared to him that the court in question was illegally constituted; and, that being so, it was a point which that House and the Committee had a fair right to consider. Well, then, they had the fact that the court was illegally constituted; that the officer tried was a man of high character up to the time at which he joined the Clyde; that he joined that vessel when his health was unequal to the discharge of his duties. No doubt, it would have been better had he acted on the proposal of the Admiralty to retire when he came home, in which case he would have been in the enjoyment of retired pay, instead of having lost the reward of his services and the high character he had gained. But, in view of the facts he had set forth, it seemed to him that the Admiralty were bound to give Commander Heron a new trial, or at least that they should not insist upon the carrying out of a sentence of this severity which was not usually passed on officers of rank and good character unless they had committed themselves in a manner which was certainly not attributed to Commander Heron. If his hon. and gallant Friend would allow it, he would prefer to take the sense of the Committee on the words he had himself placed upon the Paper; but in any case he would appeal to the Admiralty not to treat with such extreme rigour an officer of distinction for the first offence, and he appealed to the Committee to join him in insisting that a further trial should take place in consequence of the fact that the court martial which tried Commander Heron was not constituted in accordance with the Act of Parliament.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir FARRER HERSCHELL) said, it was, of course, impossible not to sympathize with the interest felt in this case by his hon. and gallant Friend (Captain Maxwell-Heron) and by the right hon. and gallant Admiral opposite, who were relatives of the officer concerned in the finding of the Clyde court martial; but it appeared to him, nevertheless, that it would be wrong if the Committee were to allow that feeling to induce them to say that officers or seamen tried by court martial had any such claim as that the House of Commons was a proper Court of Appeal in such cases. His hon. and gallant Friend said that was the only Court of Appeal open to them; but he could conceive nothing worse than a tribunal of that House dealing with cases from courts martial; there was no tribunal more unfit to deal with an appeal of that kind from a court consisting of honourable and upright men who had heard the whole evidence and come to a conclusion honestly and impartially on the facts. How could the House sit as a Court of Appeal in a case like this? Hon. Members would recollect that last year it was suggested in that House that Commander Heron had been convicted on the evidence of tainted witnesses unsupported by any corroborative evidence, and that the question whether there had been any corroborative evidence had not been before considered, and that there was a strong presumption that he had been improperly convicted. That was the case put before the House last year, and the Prime Minister then said he would lay the matter before the Attorney General and himself (the Solicitor General), in order that they might examine the evidence taken before the court martial, and say whether there was anything in that evidence which would justify any Constitutional interference in the case, or justify any other course being taken. Accordingly, his hon. and learned Friend and he devoted themselves to the task, which was no light one, for they had to read over many hundred pages of evidence given before the court martial, and they determined to exercise a perfectly impartial judgment on it. They entered upon their task with an inordination rigidly to scrutinize everything that had occurred before the court martial, and with every disposition of sympathy for his hon. and gallant Friend who had brought the matter before the House; they read the whole of the evidence independently, and by agreement they exchanged their views by letter, so that each might record his views without knowing the conclusion at which the other had arrived. Having done so, the conclusion arrived at was that the evidence laid before the court martial was such as to justify the finding of that court martial; that there was ample evidence without the tainted evidence to justify the decision at which they had arrived; and he did not think that the court martial could have come to any other conclusion. How, then, could that House deal with the question? Unless they were prepared to go through the whole of the evidence given, how could they sit in judgment on the conclusion at which the court martial had arrived? He had read through the whole of the evidence, and he could not help saying that he had never perused the proceedings of a Court of Justice which showed more scrupulous propriety than the proceedings before this court martial; and he was bound to say that it reflected the highest credit upon the person whose duty it was to advise the Court. Throughout the whole case not a single question was put that there was any doubt about; every question objected to in any way was withdrawn and another course adopted; in short, he had never known in any Court of Justice a case tried with more care. Of course, he did not want to enter on the circumstances brought before the court martial—it would be unnecessary to do so—but he must demur to the statement of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman opposite that they were trivial matters. They were serious matters proved by evidence beyond all possibility of question, and with regard to which it would have been impossible to arrive at any other conclusion than that at which the court martial had arrived. With regard to what had been said in palliation of Commander Heron's conduct, he knew that the officers who tried him gave every consideration to his good character and distinguished services; yet they were bound to act also with regard to the evidence, and it was impossible for them to allow any feeling of sympathy for the individual or his past services to cause them to arrive at a conclusion not warranted by the facts of the case. He said that, so far as his hon. and learned Friend and himself had been able to judge, no injustice had been done in this case; and when his hon. and gallant Friend spoke of the case as having been exceptionally dealt with, he could assure him that it had been dealt with with the sole object of finding out the truth. Now, with reference to the constitution of the court martial, his right hon. and gallant Friend opposite had raised what was purely a technical question. His words were to the effect that he was satisfied with the honour, ability, and integrity of the officers who constituted the court martial.

SIR JOHN HAY: I said that the Commander of the Clyde was satisfied with that.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (SIR FARRER HERSCHELL): Then, the Commander of the Clyde was satisfied that these officers were men by whom he was willing to be tried. That being so, the judgment they arrived at could not be complained of, even if, as the right hon. and gallant Admiral said, the tribunal ought to have included two captains more. [SIR JOHN HAY: Hear, hear!] That, he said, was a purely technical question. There could be no doubt that, in former times, there were occasions in connection with which questions were raised, subsequently, as to the constitution of courts martial, where persons who had been summoned did not attend; but in order to prevent invalid proceedings by court martial, on this ground, the Legislature had intervened and passed an enactment, which he would shortly refer to. He admitted that the Statute provided that all officers within call should be present on board the flagship; but he was not prepared to admit that this applied to an officer who had obtained leave of absence, which was running at the time when the court martial was summoned, or that he was bound to attend, without it was necessary to summon him to do so. There was nothing in the Statute which, according to his judgment, bound an officer so placed to attend. That, he thought, disposed of the case of the captain of the Vernon. The other case was that of Captain Codrington. That officer was conducting some important experiments at a distance from the port. There was nothing more to say with regard to his case; and he was not prepared to admit that, these two officers being absent for the reasons stated, the court martial was, upon that ground, improperly constituted. But the Enactment of 1866 disposed of the technical point altogether, for it distinctly laid down that any objection to the constitution of a court martial must be raised before the trial, and not afterwards. That provision was passed by the Legislature to prevent technical objections being afterwards taken to the proceedings of courts martial. If a particular officer happened to have friends in that House who were interested in his case, and could rely upon it being re-opened by them on every occasion, it was obviously impossible that any decision could be arrived at by a court martial which would be final; and, therefore, he met the technical objection of the right hon. and gallant Admiral by saying that objection to the constitution of the court must be taken before, and not after, the trial. The right hon. and gallant Gentleman asked them to say that in this particular case, in the face of the evidence given, the finding of the court martial should be set aside. But would it be right, would it be Constitutional or fit, upon the grounds stated by the right hon. and gallant Admiral, that that should be done? He was sure that nothing would be more properly made the subject of adverse comment than such a course of action. Of course, they could sympathize with the relatives of a man who had sustained a great misfortune; but their sympathy ought not to allow them to deal with this question in the exceptional and dangerous manner suggested by the hon. and gallant Gentleman (Captain Maxwell-Heron). It was impossible they could set a precedent in this case; indeed, it would be a precedent of very evil omen if they were to deal exceptionally with this case, simply because the officer affected happened to have friends who could bring his case forward in the House of Commons.

CAPTAIN MAXWELL-HERON said, it was, no doubt, laid down that the constitution of the court should not be afterwards impeached; but that did not mean by anybody but by the prisoner. Certainly, the prisoner was the person referred to in that clause of the Act; but how could the prisoner in this case possibly know that the court was not properly constituted? The prisoner knew that the names of the two officers referred to were read over, and that it was stated that the officers were absent on leave. If they were both absent on leave, he (Captain Maxwell-Heron) had nothing more to say; but they were not absent on leave. One was on duty on board the tender, and the tender of the ship must have left the harbour that morning. There could be no doubt of that. The second officer had applied to have his leave cancelled. ["No, no!"] He (Captain Maxwell-Heron) understood, from an Admiralty Minute, that the officer had applied to have his leave cancelled. He saw it in writing, and it came from the Admiralty. The fact, however, remained that Captain Gordon was on board his ship, and, if that were so, he could not leave on leave; he could not be absent on leave and be present on his ship, and that was an argument he (Captain Maxwell-Heron) had used all along. He had said that the Commander of the Clyde could not challenge the constitution of the court—it was so laid down by law—but he submitted that any Member of Parliament could do so if he thought the constitution of the court was illegal. He thought this would have been a fair opportunity for the Admiralty to have given this officer of 32 years' standing, with five medals and the Order of the Mejidie, mentioned in the despatches from the Black Sea, a chance, at all events, for he was quite certain that if the case were tried over again by the light of the evidence they had now, there might be a very different result arrived at. He admitted now, as he did last year, that they were very unfortunate in the defence that they could bring up. The counsel for the defence, a very able man, told him, after the evidence was given—and one of the witnesses distinctly perjured himself, for he was convicted of the very thing he swore he did not do—that it was his belief that had the case been tried before a Judge and jury the verdict would have been very different. He (Captain Maxwell-Heron) agreed with the Solicitor General (Sir Farrer Herschell) that the prisoner could not impeach the constitution of the court after the decision; but that law only applied to the prisoner, and not to anybody else. The Act of Parliament did not lay down that he (Captain Maxwell-Heron), or any other Member of Parliament, should not do it. He maintained that it was impossible for the Commander of the Clyde to know that the two officers, Gordon and Codrington, ought to have been in the court, because he was then a prisoner on board the Duke of Wellington, and had been so for some days.

MR. WARTON said, all those who had any recollection of the debate which took place last year on this subject must remember how deeply impressed the House was with the very able and feeling manner in which the hon. and gallant Gentleman (Captain Maxwell-Heron) brought forward his case. Nothing could exceed the good taste and judgment displayed by the hon. and gallant Gentleman in the impressive remarks he, on that occasion, addressed to the House. For a long time the House was put off with the usual cold-blooded official answer, and the sneer that if the gallant officer had not relatives in the House his case would not have been brought before Parliament. It was not until the Prime Minister came in and, gathering up what had taken place, found that the cold-blooded officialism would not do, that anything like a satisfactory solution was arrived at. The Prime Minister, who was wonderfully smart in gauging the sense and feeling of the House, saw in a moment that the matter must be treated in a conciliatory spirit. As there was, according to the present miserable system, no Court of Appeal to which parties might take a decision of a court martial, the Prime Minister, with his high sense of justice and honour, promised that all the points which had been raised by the hon. and gallant Gentleman (Captain Maxwell-Heron) should be referred to the Law Officers of the Crown. It appeared to him (Mr. Warton), however, after listening with care and attention to the able statement of the Solicitor General, that all the points had not been so referred.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir FARRER HERSCHELL) begged the hon. and learned Gentleman's pardon. He was present during the whole of the debate last year; he read the whole of evidence, and every point which was then raised had been considered by the Law Officers.

MR. WARTON said, the point to which he particularly referred was the constitution of the court. Although the hon. and learned Solicitor General argued the case with regard to the impeachment of the constitution of a court martial, he did not say in so many words that the point was referred to the Law Officers of the Crown. He (Mr. Warton) was justified, therefore, in saying that the pledge given by the Prime Minister had not been kept, and that instead of all the points raised by the hon. and gallant Gentleman (Captain Maxwell-Heron) being referred to the Law Officers, only one point was so referred, and that was the question of the sufficiency of evidence given before the court martial.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir FARRER HERSCHELL) said, he was bound to correct the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Bridport (Mr. Warton). In the first instance, it was not understood that the question of the constitution of the court was to be referred to the Law Officers; but as the right hon. and gallant Admiral the Member for Wigton (Sir John Hay) considered that that point ought to have been referred, the Admiralty brought the point before the Law Officers.

MR. WARTON said, he was perfectly right so far that, in the first place, the pledge given by the Prime Minister was not kept. Until the Solicitor General rose for the last and third time that night, nothing had been said to show that the question of the constitution of the court had been referred to the Law Officers, and it was only when they were about to divide, that they were told that something took place between the right hon. and gallant Gentleman (Sir John Hay) and the Admiralty, and that then the point was referred to the Law Officers. He thought that what the Prime Minister meant was, that there should be a reference of all the questions raised; and, therefore, he was a little surprised that the Law Officers should have stood upon any technicality of the Act of 1866. Whatever was the intention of the right hon. Gentleman, the Law Officers of the Crown had very wide liberty given to them, so that they were hardly justified in standing by technicalities. It was rather hard for this unfortunate officer, about whose services they had heard so much—who seemed to have been so worthy an officer—that the House did not come to a decision last year in respect to these wretched charges about paint pots and other trivial things. It was only by means of the promise given by the Prime Minister that a decision was averted last year; and he hoped now, that more light had been thrown on the case, it would be found, as suggested by the hon. and gallant Gentleman (Captain Maxwell-Heron), that much of the corroborative evidence was supplied by tainted witnesses, and that no reliance was to be placed upon it. He (Mr. Warton) did not pretend to have read all the evidence; but the impression made on his mind by the debate last year was that the Commander of the Clyde was very unjustly treated, and that the witnesses brought against him were tainted. Though the Law Officers of the Crown were of opinion that there was corroborative evidence, it was quite possible, when all the ramifications of the conspiracy had been discovered, that a new inquiry would be granted. He hoped that, under all the circumstances, the Government would take a larger and broader view of the case than they had hitherto done; and that, considering the long service of the officer, the trivial nature of the charges preferred against him, and the tainted character of the evidence, they would have no more of the cold-blooded officialism which had been displayed, or of the sneers at the fact that the gallant officer had relatives in the House.

SIR JOHN HAY asked if the Committee were to understand that, for the future, a court martial in a Fleet, or elsewhere where there were nine officers, would be legally constituted if the admiral, or other persons summoning the court, chose to constitute the court of five or seven, or any smaller number than nine? He had certainly understood the Solicitor General (Sir Farrer Herschell) to say that it was competent for the court to be composed of any smaller number than nine. Although the Act of Parliament said that nine officers should constitute the court, and although the Admiralty themselves understood that that was so, because in the Bill of last year, which they failed to pass, there was a clause altering the present law on the subject, was the Navy to understand that for the future an admiral or any other officer holding a court martial, might, if he pleased, select a number of officers inferior to nine? It had always been understood that the officers to compose a court martial should be appointed according to their seniority. It was, therefore, important to know whether it was possible that a court martial could be packed; that the members of the court need not be the nine senior officers present in the Fleet or on the Station? He hoped they would hear from the Solicitor General whether the Admiral or the officer authorized to summon a court martial might select a number inferior to the number which was intended by the Act of Parliament, and might choose them without reference to their seniority, as was done in the case under consideration?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir FARRER HERSCHELL) said, he had not suggested anything of the kind. The Act provided that a court martial should not consist of less than five, or more than nine.

SIR JOHN HAY begged the hon. and learned Gentleman's pardon. The words "if they be present" were significant.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir FARRER HERSCHELL) said, that was another point; the right hon. and gallant Gentleman was referring to another provision. The number of officers who were to compose the court martial was not definitely fixed; the Act merely provided there should not be more than nine, or less than five.

SIR JOHN HAY said, he was sorry to have to pledge his opinion against that of the hon. and learned Gentleman; but every naval officer's reading of the Act was that, if there were nine officers present, the court martial should consist of nine. It was understood that the admiral had no power to make the number smaller.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir FARRER HERSCHELL) said, he did not want to disagree with the right hon. and gallant Admiral; but it was competent for the President of the court to give leave of absence to an officer who had been summoned, and there was nothing in the Act providing that the court should consist of nine officers.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 21; Noes 51: Majority 30.—(Div. List, No. 190.)

Original Question again proposed.

MR. HEALY asked the Secretary to the Admiralty (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) if he could give the Committee a guarantee that there would be any sum taken on which the question of the assistance given by the Navy to Mr. Tuke could be raised?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN stated that emigration had nothing to do with Martial Law. The Vote for Pay was the one on which the question referred to by the hon. Gentleman could be raised.

MR. KENNY said, he should like to ascertain from the Secretary to the Admiralty whether, assuming the Vote were to be passed now, there would be an opportunity on some future day to raise the question of the manner in which some of Her Majesty's ships had been utilized for the purpose of assisting the enterprise of certain supposed humanitarians? As many as four of Her Majesty's ships had been used for the purpose of carrying away emigrants, mostly pauper emigrants, from Connaught. If they consented to this Vote, would they lose their opportunity of discussing that question? So far as he could see it was competent for them to raise the question on almost any Vote.

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN said, the Votes for Ships and Men had been passed in Committee and on Report, so there would be no further opportunity that he could see on these Estimates of raising the question the hon. Gentleman desired to raise. But, of course, it was rather for the Chairman of the Committee to say what was in Order and what was not.

MR. HEALY said, the Committee could not accept the ruling of the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman). If the Vote now under consideration was passed, he (Mr. Healy) could see no objection to raising the question on Vote 14, because in that Vote there was an item for piloting and towing Her Majesty's ships.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(14.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £116,900, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Expense of various Miscellaneous Services, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1885."

MR. HEALY said, this appeared a very proper Vote on which to raise the question of the assistance given to Mr. Tuke. He observed there was a sum of £8,000 asked for for piloting and towing.

Her Majesty's ships, and he wanted to know upon what principle the Government piloted and towed the famine ships in Black Sod Bay for the purpose of clearing some 40,000 or 50,000 unfortunate Irish people off to Canada? He wished to know, in the first place, why Her Majesty's officers undertook the duty of assisting Mr. Tuke in importing these poor unfortunate people from their homes? A number of gentlemen, who knew nothing whatever about Ireland, went about making promises to the people of the West, many of whom did not understand a word of English—making them promises of remarkable situations and great benefits if they would emigrate to Canada or elsewhere; and Her Majesty's Government helped these gentlemen, at whose head was Mr. Tuke, in their nefarious business, to the tune of £46,000. In addition to that grant, they lent Mr. Tuke's Committee Her Majesty's ships, in which the emigrants were taken from the shore to the emigrant ships, from which, in due course, the emigrants were shot, like so much rubbish, on the Canadian shore. On whose authority were the ships lent to Mr. Tuke; and would a guarantee be given that Her Majesty's ships would not be again used for the same purpose? Unfortunately, Mr. Tuke had done his work, and, therefore, there was not much probability of the Government doing any more mischief by lending their ships to carry away Irish emigrants.

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN said, that, as a matter of fact, he should think it was extremely unlikely that anything was paid for piloting and towing Her Majesty's ships on the West Coast of Ireland.

MR. HEALY: Then, how did the ships get into Black Sod Bay?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN, continuing, said, that with regard to the general question, he was not prepared to enter into the merits of Mr. Tuke's enterprise, because he was not officially advised. The Admiralty were pressed to give this small assistance, and they did so; but from what he could understand, it was not intended to make a further request to the Admiralty.

MR. KENNY said, he did not know whether the question arose here; but there was a sum down for wars against pirates?

Mr. Healy

THE CHAIRMAN: There is no item for war, and the question is, in my opinion, altogether out of Order. I did not stop the hon. Member for Monaghan, because it seemed to me that he was putting a simple question, requiring only a simple answer. It is clearly out of Order to raise such a question as emigration on a Vote for Pilotage. That refers to pilotage in the Suez Canal, and clearly has no reference to Mr. Tuke's scheme.

MR. HEALY asked if he could raise the question on Vote 14?

THE CHAIRMAN: Yes.

MR. HEALY pointed out that this was a Vote for the pilotage of Her Majesty's ships on Foreign and Home stations, and said Black Sod Bay was a Home station into which vessels could not get without pilotage. He challenged the Secretary to the Admiralty to say that iron-clads could get into that bay without pilotage. That being so, he failed to see why Black Sod Bay did not come in under this Vote for Pilotage; and he, therefore, submitted that he was entitled to raise this point.

THE CHAIRMAN: I must adhere to my opinion that it would be out of Order to raise a question like emigration upon a Vote for the Pilotage of Her Majesty's ships, and for towing them through the Suez Canal. Such a discussion would be altogether out of Order.

MR. KENNY rose to a point of Order, and observing that as he understood these ships had been engaged on special service, said, there was item of £300, under Sub-head D, for gratuities for special services.

THE CHAIRMAN: No part of this item is devoted to that purpose.

MR. KENNY said, the Committee were not aware of that, and he should move to reduce the Vote by £300, this mysterious sum for gratuities for special services. That Motion, he apprehended, would raise the question of the allocation of this Fund.

THE CHAIRMAN: I have no desire to stop any discussion that is at all regular; but I could not allow such a question as gratuities for special service to be discussed, after the statement of the Minister in charge that no portion of this money would be applied to Mr. Tuke's emigration scheme.

MR. KENNY thought it would then be desirable to take time to examine the Appropriation Account, and see how this sum would be expended. He would recommend the Government to postpone this Vote, in order that Members might satisfy themselves upon this matter, and he would move that Progress be reported.

Motion made, and Question, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again,"—(Mr. Kenny),—put, and negatived.

Original Question again proposed.

Mr. HEALY mentioned that there was an item of £4,500 for allowances for lodging and subsistence for officers and crews of Her Majesty's ships detained by stress of weather when on temporary or special services, and he asked the Secretary to the Admiralty to state what those special services were, if they were not connected with this emigration scheme? These crews were a long time occupied upon this emigration scheme, and he wished to know what were the special services that entitled them to this £4,500, or what the total cost of this emigration was?

Mr. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN replied, that he was not aware that there were any special services whatever. The cruisers employed were on their natural Station on the West Coast of Ireland, and that the allowances for officers and men went on all the same, whether they were engaged in assisting Mr. Tuke's Society, or on the ordinary duties of their Station. He did not believe there was any special expense incurred.*

Mr. HARRINGTON said, that, in any case, it seemed to him that this was a particularly large item. Had the hon. Gentleman no information to give upon this matter? How did it happen that a number of officers and men went on shore, and were detained on shore so long? Sailors were rather fond of going on shore whenever they could get an opportunity, and they remained as long as they could; but that was quite a different thing, and he apprehended that this item only meant charges for occasions when they had been detained on shore for special services. Were the casualties in the Service so numerous that this large item was required? He hoped the hon. Gentleman would give such general lines of detail as would indicate the special services upon which it would be likely that so many men as this sum would pay would be engaged.

Mr. KENNY asked whether any portion of this £4,500 had been devoted to the maintenance of Marines in Dublin?

Mr. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN replied in the negative, and said, this was not a very large sum, when they considered that the ships were employed in all quarters of the globe on different services, and on various Stations. This item was based upon the experience of many years past. The same sum was taken last year, and he thought that would go to show that there was nothing in this item connected with Mr. Tuke's or any other Fund.

Mr. HARRINGTON said, he was not speaking of Mr. Tuke's Fund, and this item had not been justified by the hon. Gentleman's observations. When expeditions were sent from ships abroad, they were supplied with provisions from the ships for a three, or four, or seven days' journey, and, as a matter of course, they always provided themselves for emergencies. Therefore, the number of casualties must be very large indeed if, after they had been fitted out from the ships, they were still detained so long beyond the time provided for that this large item should be required to defray the incidental expenses.

Mr. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN said, he could give no further information, beyond the fact that this item was based on the experience of past years. It was found that for the ordinary contingencies of the Service an amount of this kind was required, and, therefore, this sum, was again asked for.

Mr. HEALY asked how much of this was for the Marines?

Mr. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN replied, that he could not tell.

Mr. HEALY said, he would assume that something was paid in regard to the Marines in Dublin last year, and he asked how many Marines were detained in Dublin last year?

Mr. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN said, they were not included in this sum. This was for special subsistence allowances for officers and crews detained on shore, or by stress of weather, or temporary or special services.

Mr. HEALY asked if the Marines were not temporarily landed in Dublin?

Sir WALTER B. BARTELOT asked whether this Vote included any of the Marines landed for the expedition to Tokar?

MR. HARRINGTON said, it seemed to him that this Vote included nothing they wanted to know anything about. It was a remarkable thing that they could find out nothing about any Vote they came to. This was the usual excuse of the Government; but he did not suppose the Chairman would accept such excuses for the purpose of bowling Irish Members over. He must ask how many Marines were detained in Dublin?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN said, these were Estimates from the 1st of April last year, and he was not aware that since the 1st of April this year any Marines had been detained in Dublin. None of this sum was for the Marines landed at Tokar.

MR. KENNY asked whether the special Supplementary Estimate of £28,000 for special services in Egypt came under this head?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN replied that it did not.

MR. HEALY said, he thought the statement of the hon. Gentleman extremely unsatisfactory. They could get no information, and he respectfully submitted that it was needless to detain the Committee by making these little explanations, and obliging Members to go through this system of cross-examination. If the Government were frank, they would get their Estimates much more rapidly. As Representatives of the people, they were entitled to more information. At that late hour they did not intend to worry the Government about these matters; they were in an extremely amiable mood, and if the Government would give some information they would get their Estimates more rapidly. He hoped the hon. Gentleman would state how many Marines there were in Dublin, and would promise that such a thing should not occur again. A more ill-bred and ill-conditioned set of men were never detained for special service.

MR. PULESTON said, that, according to his experience, in whatever part of the world they had been, the Marines had gained the greatest praise for the performance of their duty; and even the Colleagues of the hon. Member had spoken of the Marines, while they were in Ireland, in a way very different from that of the hon. Member. Gentlemen representing Ireland, who might not altogether like the duty upon which the Marines were employed in that country, had more than once volunteered statements to him respecting the Marines which were in the highest degree creditable to that Force; and he hoped that, whatever differences of opinion there might be in that House, that excellent body of men, standing, as they did, very high in the estimation of all parties in this country, would not be disparaged.

MR. HARRINGTON quite believed that the Marines were a valuable body of men in their own way when employed for proper purposes; but he thought that preserving the peace in Dublin was not a duty originally intended for those men, and that in performing that duty they were very much out of place. There was another item in this Vote about which he wished to ask a question. He found a sum put down for contributions in aid of religious and charitable institutions, and he wished to know what were the religious institutions to which these charitable contributions were given? It seemed to him that it was not the intention of that House, when voting Supplies of this kind, that contributions should be given to any particular religious institutions; but the point he wished to raise was this. The Navy was a very mixed Service, containing men of all religions, and largely composed of his fellow-countrymen and co-religionists; and he wished to know to what institutions this money was given, and whether any Roman Catholic institutions received any contributions? There was a very large number of Catholics and Irishmen in the Navy, and he wished to know whether any part of this money went to their benefit? If not, he should not agree to the Vote.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN said, he was quite certain that no charitable or public institution was refused assistance because of its religion. The Admiralty did a good deal to meet the wants of the men in the Navy, whether they were of the Catholic religion or not. For the last two or three months he had himself been engaged in arranging one or two points which, he thought, were not properly provided for in reference to Roman Catholic and other religious wants. These contributions were made chiefly to Sailors' Homes and similar institutions. He had not a list of all the contributions with him; but they were, as a rule, only small sums.

MR. KENNY said, he should not have felt disposed to press this matter to a Division but for the speech of the hon. Member for Devonport (Mr. Puleston) and the speech of the Secretary to the Admiralty. He felt very strongly with regard to the matter of the Marines in Dublin, and he very much objected to their having been sent there, as they were to tyrannize over the people—

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member is not in Order. There is no question before the Committee respecting Marines in Dublin.

MR. KENNY said, he would move the reduction of this Vote. The question of the Marines in Dublin was not raised last year, and he was not aware that hon. Members were strictly confined, upon a Vote which was practically devoted to the payment of these men, to a discussion of matters which could technically only be brought forward. He should not have referred to this matter of the Marines in Dublin but for the observations of the hon. Member for Devonport. He held quite a contrary view to that of the hon. Member as to these Marines, and he greatly regretted that the Chairman would not allow him to give his reasons. All he could do, therefore, was to move the reduction of the Vote by £4,500.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £112,400, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Expense of various Miscellaneous Services, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1885."—(Mr. Kenny.)

MR. DEASY wished to ask one question. He had received a communication stating that the usual grant to the Cork Sailors' Home had been reduced from £100 to £25; and he should like to know what the explanation of that reduction was?

SIR THOMAS BRASSEY explained that there had simply been a transfer of the grant from Cork to Queenstown, on the ground that Her Majesty's ships very seldom visited Cork, whereas they were constantly at Queenstown. Therefore, the institution at Queenstown had greater claims on the Admiralty than that at Cork.

MR. DEASY asked whether the hon. Gentleman would be willing to receive a deputation on the subject from the Committee of the Cork Sailors' Home?

SIR THOMAS BRASSEY replied, that he would be happy to receive any representation on the subject.

MR. KENNY said, he would withdraw his Amendment, in consequence of the somewhat conciliatory answer of the hon. Gentleman.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(15.) £853,900, Half-Pay, Reserved Half-Pay, and Retired Pay to Officers of the Navy and Marines.

MR. PULESTON desired to say a few words on this Vote with reference to the Paymasters. A long time ago the allowance to these men was settled at 2s. 6d. a-day, which was at that time above the ordinary pay; but now, he understood, the pay of the Paymasters had risen to something like 12s., and this 2s. 6d. a-day was still called half-pay. This was perhaps, a small matter, but it was very unjust, and he wondered whether it was possible to remove the injustice? A case had been brought under his notice in which an Assistant Paymaster was invalidated from foreign service on account of injuries he had received, and which had entirely unfitted him for active service. He was put on half-pay for nine months at 2s. 6d. per day, and it seemed very hard that the allowance should be so small. This allowance was little enough when men were ill and unable to do duty, but it was particularly hard that they should receive so little when they had been disabled by injuries received in war. This might be a small matter, but he felt sure the Secretary to the Admiralty would see that it was hard upon the men.

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN promised that if the hon. Member would let him know the facts of the case, he would look into it.

MR. PULESTON said he had merely mentioned this case as an illustration; but there were similar cases constantly occurring.

Vote agreed to.

(16.) £889,600, Military Pensions and Allowances.

(17.) £328,400, Civil Pensions and Allowances.

(18.) £130,900, Extra Estimate for Services not Naval.—Freight, &c. on Account of the Army Department.

(19.) £156,007, Greenwich Hospital and School.

Resolutions to be reported To-morrow.

Committee to sit again To-morrow.

MAGISTRATES (IRELAND) SALARIES BILL.—[BILL 292.]

(Mr. Courtney, Mr. Trevelyan.)

SECOND READING.

Order for the Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Courtney.)

MR. COURTNEY said, that on a former occasion he had sufficiently indicated the nature of this Bill, therefore he did not propose to delay the House by going into detail upon it on the Order for the Second Reading.

MR. HEALY said, he was extremely surprised at the very curt manner in which the Secretary to the Treasury submitted the second reading of this Bill at that hour of the morning (1.45). A short statement was not surprising, indeed, it would have been much more satisfactory to Irish Members if the hon. Gentleman had postponed the Bill and given them some further opportunity of considering it; but under any circumstances they had a right to expect that something in support of the Bill should be offered by the Government. When the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister had decided, in consequence of the action of the House of Lords, to shorten the Session, he had given a pledge that contentious legislation would not be taken. That pledge had been completely broken. Notwithstanding the Prime Minister's undertaking, they had this Bill brought in by the Government with the knowledge that it must inevitably prolong the Session. The Government wished them to get away on Saturday week; but how could they possibly do it if this Bill was to be passed? How could they expect, without tremendous consumption of time, to pass a Bill, the object of which was to set up Mr. Clifford Lloyd and other such disgraceful officials permanently in the country? Surely the Government knew the feeling of the Irish people with regard to Mr. Clifford Lloyd and similar individuals. And what were the facts as to this Bill? It was an extremely short measure, but as they knew from the Home Secretary the other night, a short Bill might sometimes take a long time to pass, and he was surprised that had not occurred to the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Courtney) when he undertook to introduce the Bill to the House. The measure was a reversal of the position taken up by the Government. He (Mr. Healy) did not know whether hon. Members recollected what had taken place during that famous Saturday Sitting. What occurred was this. The Irish Members pointed out that the Government were asking the taxpayers for a larger sum than the Act of Parliament—that was to say, the 37 & 38 Vict. c. 33—entitled them to ask. But they had the learned argument of the English Attorney-General—who had conveniently left them in the lurch on this occasion that he might not be confronted with the echoes of his own statement that night—to the effect that it was needless to have an extra charge on the Estimates. The Irish Members had pointed out that the sum was charged in the Estimates on account of that Act of Parliament, and that it was largely exceeded in consequence of the bloated salaries given to Mr. Clifford Lloyd and other officials. The Government had said—"That does not matter, because this sum is included in the Appropriation Bill at the end of the Session, and becomes an Act under the Appropriation Act." The Government now found out their mistake; and what became of the argument by which they had snatched a Division on that famous Sunday morning? [Mr. Courtney dissented.] The Secretary to the Treasury shook his head. He (Mr. Healy) would ask the hon. Gentleman how was it that he had given no explanation whatever of the change of front that had taken place between now and April last?

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members being found present,

MR. HEALY said, it must be extremely gratifying to the Government to be able to carry their Bills by a bare majority. They found that there were just 44 Members in the House, and that appeared to him to be legislating by the skin of their teeth with a vengeance. He had hoped that the Chief Secretary would have been summoned to his place by the "count" so opportunely moved by the hon. Member for Ennis (Mr. Kenny); but the right hon. Gentleman had not on that occasion seen fit to enter the House, and he (Mr. Healy) extremely regretted that they should have to discuss this measure, which had so much in it about the welfare of Ireland, without the presence of the chief Irish Official. He had said the English Attorney General on a previous occasion had given them an extremely learned argument to show that the measure was absolutely needless. The date of that discussion was the 15th of March. He believed it had been said by the hon. and learned Gentleman that it was not competent for the Committee to vote a salary of £1,000 a-year; but it was competent for them to vote a specific sum of money. The hon. and learned Gentleman continually dwelt on that question of a specific sum. He had said that that was the first time he had ever risen to answer a legal question at 4 o'clock in the morning. Well, it was now only 2 o'clock in the morning, and it was to be hoped that the hon. and learned Gentleman would find his legal faculties much better now than they had been on the last occasion at a later hour. If the Attorney General's argument was worth anything, why introduce this Bill? If the Government was entitled to keep them out of their beds during the whole of Saturday and part of Sunday because of the strength of their desire to pay these unprecedented salaries, why were they now, at the end of July and near the end of the Session, to be asked to prolong the Session for the purpose of passing such a measure as this? The Attorney General's argument was that, so long as this extra sum was sanctioned by the Appropriation Act, there was no need to have recourse to a Bill. What had become of that position of the Government? That the Secretary to the Treasury should move the second reading of this Bill, without a single word of explanation of the right-about wheel which had characterized the policy of the Government, seemed to him (Mr. Healy) about the most extraordinary feature in the action of the present volatile Government that they had ever had to deal with. But, apart from this technical question, the Irish Members, on other grounds, had a strong objection to the Bill. Its object was really to enable the Irish Government, with the consent of the Treasury, to give certain Resident Magistrates increased salaries not exceeding the sum of £1,000 a-year, and to enable the Lord Lieutenant to order that such increased salaries might be paid from the 1st of April before the passing of this Act. The measure was retrospective in spite of what had fallen from the Attorney General for England. The hon. and learned Gentleman had succeeded in obtaining the votes of Englishmen who followed the Government Whip. These Gentlemen marched through the Lobby on the strength of the Attorney General's statement, and now, at the end of July, the Government found it necessary to endeavour to amend their hand by obtaining credit from the 1st of April last. The Irish Members had pointed out the illegality of the Act. [Mr. COURTNEY: No, no.] The hon. Gentleman interrupted him, but why had he not explained the Bill? He had not done so, and the Irish Members were therefore entitled to explain it for themselves. They had not been told who the five gentlemen were who were to be affected by the Bill. He should like to know the names of those five champions of Christendom. Why should they not know the meritorious gentlemen who were to have these positions? Was one of them Mr. Clifford Lloyd; and, if so, why had they not had a statement to that effect?

Mr. COURTNEY said, there had been a perfect understanding come to on that point.

Mr. HEALY said, he had asked the Prime Minister on a former occasion whether an opportunity would be allowed to the Irish Members to discuss the return of Mr. Clifford Lloyd to Ireland before the end of the Session, and the right hon. Gentleman had said there would be. In spite, however, of that, this Bill was brought in, and the Irish Members were not told whether Mr. Clifford Lloyd would return to the office he had vacated in Ireland or not. Would the Secretary to the Treasury answer that question in the negative? No; the hon. Gentleman declined to shake his head now. His declining to answer in the negative was a tolerably good indication that Mr. Clifford Lloyd was to return to Ireland. If it were not the intention of the Government to send him back, what was to prevent them from putting a clause in the Bill to that effect? For his own part, he believed that such a clause as that would have a very salutary effect. It would prevent the Government from bringing Mr. Clifford Lloyd back in spite of a pledge which might be obtained from them; but, as he (Mr. Healy) intended to move a clause to that effect, he would abstain from going further into the question now. He would content himself with merely informing the Secretary to the Treasury that it was the intention of the Irish Members to seriously propose a clause to that effect when the Bill got into Committee. When a measure of this kind was proposed, a measure for the purpose of increasing the salaries of Resident Magistrates, he would ask the House to remember that these five gentlemen were to have these increased and added salaries at a time when the peace of the country, as the Government had to admit, left nothing to be desired. They had, in Ireland, passed through three or four years of most remarkable excitement, and there had been a considerable amount of crime; but yet the Government had managed without a Bill of this kind. Now, when the country was quieting down and the crime was expiring, the Government proposed to add fuel to the flame by the giving of these increased salaries to Resident Magistrates. What construction was to be put upon that? Why, these gentlemen affected would put this construction upon it—that in order to earn these increased salaries they would have to keep up a requisite modicum of crime. If the Government paid these men these extraordinary amounts they must expect value for it. Even the Treasury, generous as it was to officials in the Irish Criminal Department, would, after a year or two, come forward and declare that the money was absolutely thrown away on these gentlemen if they did not get any crime for it. The Government, to justify themselves for passing Acts of this kind to increase the salaries of magistrates so extensively, must have a certain number of men hanged every year, and a certain number of men sent to penal servitude. At the present time the number of hangings was considerably reduced, and the number of men they were enabled to send to penal servitude for agrarian crime had almost sunk to zero; therefore, he (Mr. Healy) failed to see what value they were to get for these increased salaries. The magistrates would say—"If crime stood at the vanishing point there is no reason for our existence;" and, therefore, they would continue to get up false reports, which hitherto had succeeded in deluding the people of England. It was a very serious thing when they had a number of people preying on the country whose salaries depended on the amount of crime which existed in the community. The Government might be anxious to see crime diminish in Ireland, but they would never see any substantial diminution while men were paid high salaries on account of that crime. Crimes were invented, or, if they were not invented, bogus reports were sent in to the Government, and the country was blackened by stories of what was likely to occur. The Government, he thought, should proceed on the system which prevailed in China with regard to doctors. When the Emperor was well they got their salaries; but directly he was taken ill they were paid nothing. He would suggest that so long as crime existed in Ireland these highly-paid magistrates should get no salaries whatever; but that when crime was extinguished and the efficiency of these gentlemen became apparent, they should get substantial remuneration. Probably that principle would recommend itself to the economic mind of the Secretary to the Treasury. It was right for the hon. Gentleman to increase the salaries of those Civil servants who deserved substantial payment; but the Irish Members did not see the force of paying salaries for firebrands—of paying increased salaries to bring about a state of things such as that which existed under the régime of Mr. Clifford Lloyd. Statements would have to be made in Committee as to the lives and adventures of the various gentlemen connected with the Government of Ireland. He supposed it would not be out of Order for Irish Members to discuss the conduct of Mr. Clifford Lloyd in Egypt, as bearing on what would likely to be his conduct in Ireland if he came back. Those would be questions which it would not be desirable to go into in the month of August, or at the end of July; but if the Irish Members were bound to go into them the fault would lay not with them, but with the Government. He should like to know from the Government whether there was any prospect whatever of the five gentlemen to be appointed being drawn from any other class than that of the miserable half-pay officers, who had hitherto been the ruin of the paid Magisterial Service of Ireland—officers who had been scraped up from Bombay, Burmah, and North America? Hitherto they had had these officers forced upon them for no reason that they could make out other than that they happened to be the relatives of someone in high position in Ireland. They had had Mr. Blake, whom the Duke of St. Alban's had now managed to get off as the Governor of the Bahamas. They should like very much to know how Mr. Blake had managed to make that bound? Then they had had Mr. Clifford Lloyd sent to them from British Burmah, and he also had made a jump from Ireland to Egypt. This gentleman, after having imprisoned thousands of men in Ireland, went and wept salt tears over the imprisonment of the Egyptians, administering the courbash at the same time in a manner which the Irish Members would have occasion to refer to later on. Where it was possible, a clause would be inserted in some Bill to put a stop to the use of such an instrument as that by such officials as Mr. Clifford Lloyd.

MR. COURTNEY said, that, perhaps, with the permission of the House, he might be allowed to say a few words on the Bill, although it would only be to repeat what had been succinctly said in introducing it. He had referred on the previous occasion to what took place on the Civil Service Estimates. A discussion had occurred with regard to this class of magistrates, and he had stated that it was proposed to pay them a higher rate of salary than was mentioned in the Act of Parliament. The legality of that course was questioned by the hon. Member for Queen's County (Mr. A. O'Connor), and it was then explained that after notice had been given and the question discussed, and a Vote for the purpose subsequently incorporated in the Appropriation Bill, the payment would be thoroughly legal. That was the statement which had been made, and to which he now adhered. He had stated that a departure, under these circumstances, from the statutory limit, was perfectly legitimate, and that a note would be put into the Estimates calling the attention of the Committee to the fact that this was a variation from the normal salaries. Hon. Gentlemen opposite did not seem to recognize the force of the argument; this measure, therefore, would substitute for the Estimate, which exceeded, year after year, the statutory limit, another statutory limit of £1,000. There was no contradiction whatever between the present proposal and the last. The hon. Member had touched upon a great variety of topics, some of which, perhaps, might with propriety be discussed in Committee. He asked questions about Mr. Clifford Lloyd, whether that gentleman would return to Ireland? Whether he would do so or not was a question upon which he (Mr. Courtney) could say nothing; but he could say that that gentleman would not be one of the five gentlemen to whom these salaries of £1,000 would be paid, and so would not come within the operation of the Bill. Then the hon. Member referred to the present condition of Ireland, and he was glad to agree that it was one of quiet and order. But, at the end of his speech, the hon. Member introduced an illustration, which, if worth anything as an argument, told in favour of the Bill; for if, as he said, these salaries should be paid only when the state of things was quiet and orderly, then there was a good argument for the payment of the salaries, the position to which the hon. Member referred being realized.

COLONEL NOLAN said, the whole statement of the Secretary to the Treasury amounted to this—that he did not like the course of the Estimates to be interfered with by the necessity of voting a sum for these salaries year after year. As a general rule, Irish Members had been rather anxious to simplify the Estimates, and to do all they could to put them clearly and distinctly before the Committee, so, if they now resisted the Bill, it was not from any wish to cause any inconvenience to the discussion of the Estimates. The statement of the hon. Gentleman was altogether beside the real facts of the case. Irish Members looked at the Bill as a step in the direction of the French system, dividing the country into five great Police Departments, sub-dividing these again among other Resident Magistrates. Whether this was desirable, or whether it was more desirable to leave things as they were in Ireland, certainly it was no trivial matter. The position so long as the Special Magistrates depended upon special Votes in the Estimates was one of truce; but if once the Bill were allowed to pass, it would be the starting point for that system of division and sub-division to which he had referred. So, the principle of the Bill was of sufficient importance to be thoroughly discussed on its merits. He did not think they had had the history of the Bill. He had referred to the Library, and he could give the House the result of a Commission on the subject, after an inquiry, presided over by a well-known man, to which he would direct the attention of the House. What happened to the Bill last year? This Bill, or one like it, was then introduced—

MR. COURTNEY: No; a much larger Bill.

COLONEL NOLAN: Then it was a much larger Bill. It was manifest there was a considerable difference of opinion in reference to it. The Government found that they might or might not have the Conservatives with them, while they would have all the Irish Members against them, and there was a prospect of a troublous end of the Session, much to be deplored. He did not think they should separate with a feeling of division from English Members, the latter overruling the general opinion of Irish Members; that was a deplorable condition of things, much to be deprecated. And now came the Bill of last year in disguise. A good deal had been eliminated, they were told, by the Chief Secretary; but the essential money part was that there were to be five Resident Magistrates with salaries higher than those of other Resident Magistrates, and, if there was any meaning in the Bill, these five would be placed over the heads of the others. Last year it was found that the state of Business was such that it would be greatly facilitated by the withdrawal of a Bill so extremely objectionable to Irish Members; but now the Government appeared to take a different view, and there were two faults to be found with them for it. He considered it a violation of the promise of the Prime Minister that no contentious matter should be taken in the course of winding up the Business of the Session—his hon. Friend had touched upon that—and the other point was the unreasonableness of proceeding with such a Bill at 2 o'clock in the morning. To expect the Irish Members, then, after a long Sitting, to give all the reasons, financial and otherwise, against the Bill, was treating those Members extremely unfairly. There were enough English Members present to outvote the Irish Members; but, before they did so, it was right they should have a little information in regard to the subject. The proposition was to give salaries of £1,000 each to five Special Magistrates. Now, in reference to that, he would point out that a Commission which sat in 1872 drew a great distinction between consolidated salaries and salaries with allowances. The allowances were considerable for two horses for an ordinary Resident Magistrate, an orderly and a clerk, and stationery; but this last was a small item not worth taking into account. Now, he should like to ask whether the Secretary to the Treasury intended this to be a consolidated salary to include all expenses of horses, orderly, and clerk, or were they to understand that these allowances were to be in addition to the salary of £1,000 a-year? This was important; the Secretary to the Treasury should be aware of the difference. The Report of the Commission of December, 1872—a small Commission in numbers, but a strong one—Lord Monk, extremely well qualified to preside; Major Miles O'Reilly, well acquainted with Irish affairs; and Mr. S. A. Blackwood—these gentlemen made a Report in reference to the Irish Resident Magistracy, and it had relation to the subject of the Bill, and the question of the division of Ireland into Departments. But he would be glad if the Secretary to the Treasury would hold out some hope that this might be entered upon in the daytime, for it was extremely troublesome to ask the attention of the House to it at such a time.

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members being found present,

COLONEL NOLAN continued. It was an ungrateful task to enter upon figures at such a late hour, and he was sure Members would be glad to have the matter postponed to a more reasonable hour, say before midnight; but it was useful, as bearing upon the Bill, to touch upon the Report of the Commission he had mentioned. In 1872, when the Commission reported, they found that the Resident Magistracy of Ireland were divided into three classes—first, those with £500 a-year; secondly, those with £400 a-year; and, thirdly, the class with £300 a-year. £400 was the normal figure; but a certain small number received an extra £100. And then they came to the important question of allowances. If these were insignificant he would not trouble the House with them; but, as the Commission pointed out, they were considerable—two horses, £73; orderly, £42; clerk, £36; stationery, £8; a total of £159 a-year. Now, he asked the Secretary to the Treasury a few minutes since, did the £1,000 mean a consolidated salary, or was it exclusive of allowances? and he had been informed it was exclusive of allowances. So, then, the Bill would give £1,200 a-year, for he supposed the scale would be somewhat higher than that allowed for ordinary magistrates. Under some circumstances he might not object to providing this salary; but coupling with this the fact that the Bill was brought in between 2 and 3 o'clock in the morning, that there was going to be a revolution in the Civil procedure in Ireland, and that the Government would have, besides officials, only one Irish Member to support them, surely they might be allowed the benefit of speaking at a time when their words could find attention. However, as that was not allowed, he must go on, and he would point out that the Commission of 1872 did not recommend anything like this rise of salary of £1,000 a-year. They proposed an increase of £100, and the same scale as that of the Royal Irish Constabulary. In spite of this Report, the Government now wished not to make an increase of £100; but they wished to introduce a new class of magistrates, not raising salaries to £500 or £600, but to £1,000, plus allowances—an extraordinary increase of £400 or £500 over what was recommended by a Royal Commission composed of men thoroughly trusted by the Government, and who were at the time fair exponents of Irish feeling. Now, the Government were completely overruling their own Commission. Not only so, but there was no assurance that these would be inclusive salaries, as the Commission recommended; so very likely the increase would be £600 instead of the £100 recommended—an extraordinary increase in these days, when economy, though not practised, was advocated by every speaker with a view to the General Election; and it must bring considerable discredit to the Government. Not only was this extravagant sum to be paid, but the proposition was brought on at a time when protests against it on the part of Irish or English Members on behalf of the taxpayers could not be made known through the usual channels of information. As to the point of objection, other Members could treat it much better than he could. Why should Ireland be made the subject of this very extraordinary experiment in Civil administration? When he said extraordinary, he meant according to English ideas; he was aware that France was divided and sub-divided for Civil and Military purposes, all jurisdiction centralizing to one Department. Up to two years ago there was nothing of the kind in Ireland. So far as he understood from general knowledge, each Resident Magistrate reported directly to the Government, each Resident Magistrate in his own district was totally independent of others, though, no doubt, when a senior magistrate was at hand, his advice was availed of; but, in reference to his administration, the magistrate communicated with the Government direct, and this independent position was valuable to him in his position of Judge. But now all this was to be changed at 3 o'clock in the morning, without the country having an opportunity of hearing all about it or expressing an opinion; and, accompanied with an extravagant waste of money, it was proposed to put a group of from 10 to 20 magistrates under a Head Magistrate, with power of reporting upon and checking their action. Consequently, instead of dealing with a Central Authority, composed of men of position like the Chief Secretary, men who might fairly be supposed to represent English feeling and the power of England, instead of that magistrates would be put under gentlemen chosen from the Police, to whom they would be entirely subordinate, and who would have the power of reporting upon their conduct. So far as they acted as a Police Force in their administrative capacity, he found no fault; but part of the functions of a Resident Magistrate in Ireland was to act as a minor Judge. The Resident Magistrate held very much the same position as a Police Magistrate in England; and if in England four or five of these gentlemen were subordinated to a superior, it was not in human nature to suppose that they would not desire to please their immediate superior by the decisions they might be called upon to give. A great amount of injustice would result, not, perhaps, for the first 10 or 20 years, because English justice was founded very much on precedent; but there would eventually be a great amount of injustice, and certainly a want of respect for English law thus administered. This was what the Bill sought to do in Ireland. Not having their own Parliament and Ministry, Irish public opinion would not have the slightest influence on these magistrates, who would, of course, look to their immediate superior, and unless they were something more than men their judgment would be influenced by the wish to conciliate their superior. He thought he had made out a very fair case against passing the Bill now. He had not much faith in the efficacy of arguments delivered between 2 and 3 o'clock in the morning; but if resistance was hopeless, it was better than no resistance at all, and it was his duty to point out the injustice sought to be enforced against the wish of Irish Members. The Government were going to give an extravagant sum to a new class of Irish magistrates, and to make a complete change in the administration of Ireland—they were going to put one set of magistrates under another set raised from their own ranks. Magistrate after magistrate had spoken and written to him of the great pecuniary losses they had suffered a couple of years ago when there was the reorganization. A whole lot of magistrates had been placed on pension, and this was a state of things the Bill would perpetuate. A magistrate had written to him saying how he had kept his district perfectly quiet; he was then transferred to another district where a serious crime had been committed; he did all he could to pacify the people, and did so; but he was put out of the service—he was reorganized. Formerly magistrates had some influence with the Government; but now they were under the Special Magistrate and liable to be put on pension, not always getting the full-time pension. Thus Mr. Percival, who would have had one scale of pension at 15 years' service, and a higher scale at 20 years, was superseded at the end of 19 years' service. He said that the duties of the magistrates, who sometimes acted as Judges, and at other times acted largely as a sort of superior police, should be clearly defined if a Bill of this kind must be brought in; but he warned the Government that they were taking a dangerous step with regard to Ireland. He was of opinion that in their judicial functions the magistrates should be placed under the Judges; let them, at any rate, be placed under men of high professional position and of high character, and then the Irish people would have some guarantee of a fair result. But the Government were going to put them under five gentlemen, of whom the people knew little or nothing, who were not men of high professional or social position, who could not be looked up to as guides, and who he feared, moreover, would wish to make all their decisions uniform. They would, of course, say amongst themselves that they did not want one decision given in Kerry and another given in Cork quite different to it. They would say—"We want uniformity of decisions;" and in that case he thought the course of justice was likely to be somewhat interfered with. The system which the Government proposed to pursue must necessarily bring about that vicious state of things; and, therefore, he hoped that some Member of the Government would rise, either then or later on, and give them some assurance that these five magistrates were not to be placed over the heads of all the other magistrates in Ireland. The Bill had much more importance than the Secretary to the Treasury had attributed to it; and he thought the hon. Gentleman would be well advised either to withdraw it altogether for that Session, or, at any rate, put it off until it could be properly discussed.

Mr. WARTON pointed out that the Bill was against the spirit of the Act of 37 & 38 Vict., which provided that the Resident Magistrates in Ireland should be in certain classes—not more than 20 in Class 1, and not more than 32 in Class 2, and a certain number in Class 3, the salaries being for each class more than for the class below it. He contended that this Bill, which dealt with so small a matter, ought not to have been decorated with the title of "Money Bill," which had led many Members interested in the question to go away under the impression that it was blocked.

Mr. HARRINGTON said, he thought the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury could not have communicated with the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, because the views he had expressed in its justification were not embodied in the Bill before the House. He asked the hon. Gentleman how he could justify the insertion in the Bill of such a clause as that which began—

"Provided that no more than five of such magistrates shall at any time be entitled to receive by way of salary &c.?"

It seemed to him that if the statement of the right hon. Gentleman was true, and if, as was alleged, the argument of the hon. Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy) was not justified by facts, this was an idle provision to insert in the Bill. It also seemed to him that if they were to allow the Act to pass in its present form the Government would have an opportunity under the Estimates of further increasing the salaries of the magistrates in Ireland. He looked particularly to this question of salaries; and he considered that the action of the Government in introducing this Bill at a late period of the Session, and at a time when the public mind in Ireland had, to a great extent, settled down, as nothing short of a deliberate attempt to stir up strife in Ireland. No matter what might be the end and aim of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, it could not fail to stir up feeling, because the Bill was known to be an effort to reward men who had been established as a Directory in Ireland during the last few years, simply because they had done their duty towards their friends. Then, who were the men whose salaries were to be increased? Would the right hon. Gentleman give an assurance that Mr. Clifford Lloyd was not one of them? Again, he had to ask whether Captain Plunkett was included in the number? Mr. Clifford Lloyd, in the worst days, had never been so brutal or reckless of the feelings of the people of Ireland as Captain Plunkett had been; and, by this Bill, the Government were simply opening up again questions with regard to the conduct of this man which had already been discussed. He was astonished that hon. Members opposite should remain out of their beds to enable the Irish Executive to perpetrate a job for the administration of Ireland. If these men were entitled to reward there might be more reasons for the Bill. But when it was known that they were simply men of one or two years' standing, that they were not men of local position or experience, it was quite clear that it was only because they were the relatives of Lords and of certain gentlemen who could put the machinery of the Government in motion in Ireland that a Bill was brought in to increase their salaries. The hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Colonel Nolan) had drawn attention to the enormous salaries which these officials already received; and he had shown that, over and above their fixed salary, they received allowances for horses and orderlies, and that if they did not employ the police they received £20 or £30 a-year for orderlies to carry their messages. The right hon. Gentleman need not be at all incredulous on this matter; he had very little practical knowledge of Irish questions, and Irish Members had been brought into more intimate connection with the magistrates of Ireland than the right hon. Gentleman, and they could speak more correctly as to their duties and the manner in which they discharged them. One of the first debates of the present Session arose with regard to these extraordinary magistrates, and day by day Questions were asked in that House concerning their conduct. They had recently a statement read by the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell), signed by the members of the Corporation of Limerick, to the effect that their city had been kept in a state of turmoil from the moment Mr. Clifford Lloyd went there to the moment when he left, at which time every kind of disturbance disappeared. These magistrates did not belong to the people—they belonged to the landlord class, and they used their position to serve the class interested in oppressing the people; and, so long as the Government endowed them with enormous salaries, the Government might be assured there would be the element of continued disturbance in Ireland, and a source of trouble to the Government whenever Irish Members had an opportunity of addressing that House on the question. He thought that the Irish Government should have learned by experience in past years, by disturbances occurring in the country, and, above all, by the abominable actions recently brought to light, not to endow the magistrates with the enormous salaries proposed. By this Bill the Government proposed, in the first place, to divide the country into sections, and to put it under the charge of a certain number of magistrates. Now, that was entirely opposed to the feelings of the people, and was a system which the Government would not for one moment think of introducing into this country. How, then, did they justify its introduction into Ireland? It was certainly not for the purpose of keeping peace in that country; the object of the Bill could not be to further the interests of peace and order. Its effect would be directly opposite to that; and it was never in the interest of peace that such a proposal occurred to the minds of whatever Ministers were responsible for the Bill. It was simply to order a certain number of officials to be rewarded for their deliberate lying and slandering the people, and for the manner in which they had kept them in a state of excitement during the last few years. The persons he had mentioned had reduced the names of the magistracy and Government to a scandal. He thought it his duty to protest in the strongest manner against the action of the Government in introducing the Bill at that period of the Session. There was no necessity for the Bill; the people of Ireland did not want it, and the persons to be served by it were the small landlord class only. They were not men of experience, nor men of intelligence; nor were they men whose impartial dealing had commended them to the confidence of the people; on the contrary, the men who were to receive the advantage of the Act were the disturbers of the peace, men who would use their position to serve the class to which they belonged, and who were likely to be a continual source of strife and disorder.

Mr. KENNY said, it appeared that, owing to the "unfortunate conscientiousness" with which the Estimates were prepared, hon. Members had sometimes an opportunity of discovering very extraordinary breaches of the Orders of the House with regard to the Vote for the Irish Magistracy. So far back as last March a discussion took place in that House upon a Vote asked for by the Secretary to the Treasury. That Vote was one which was illegal in respect of its being in excess of the amount allowed by the State; but at the time it was argued skilfully by the Secretary to the Treasury, and also by the Attorney General for England, that the matter would be set right by the fact that the Votes had to be legalized by the Appropriation Act, and that the passing of that Act was sufficient in itself to legalize any Vote of money passed in that House. That was the opinion which the Secretary to the Treasury put forward in very definite language. He would quote from Hansard, because the expression made use of on that occasion by the Secretary to the Treasury, in replying to the hon. Member for Queen's County (Mr. A. O'Connor), seemed to him of importance. The hon. Member said that what he stated was that the terms of the Act would be superseded by the terms of the Appropriation Act. Now, he (Mr. Kenny) wanted to know, if the terms of the Act of Parliament were to be superseded by the Appropriation Act, what was the use of introducing, at that hour of the morning, a Bill which must be entirely unnecessary? It seemed to him that every argument advanced at the time by the Secretary to the Treasury tended to show that the House of Commons was now being asked to go through a mockery, and to waste the public time. He should now like to ask what were the functions of the five gentlemen whom it was proposed to pay under this Act?

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members being found present,

Mr. KENNY, continuing, said, he was, when he was interrupted by the counting of the House, asking what were the special functions of the gentlemen whom it was proposed to appoint and to pay enormous salaries under this Act? As well as he could understand, the functions of those gentlemen were to supervise the actions of the various Stipendiary Magistrates within their district, and to represent to Dublin Castle occasionally the result of their experience; but, beyond that, to take no active part in discharging any duties which were usually discharged by magistrates, or to serve any useful purpose whatever in Ireland. Now, it was proposed to pay these men £1,000 a-year, and it was proposed, in addition, to allow them a sum of £100 for expenses; in other words, they were each to receive £1,100 a-year. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary made, at one time, a great deal of the proposed saving on the allowances. The ordinary magistrates in Ireland succeeded in obtaining from the Treasury something like £460 for allowances, and these gentlemen were only to receive an allowance of £100 each per annum. The difference was very easily accounted for, because the men who were stationed in different districts had, practically, little or no work to do; whereas the ordinary Resident Magistrates had to travel from place to place for the purpose of proceeding to Petty Sessions Courts. He should like to hear from some responsible Irish official—the Solicitor General (Mr. Walker) was the only responsible official now in his place—and he (Mr. Kenny) should like to know from him what particular advantage there was in appointing a man like Mr. Reed to preside in the County Galway? How would that gentleman know what took place in a remote district of Connemara? The proposed appointments seemed to be entirely superfluous. He was not much in favour of centralization; but the species of centralization which was now proposed seemed to him to be the worst of all, because it delegated to minor officials the powers which at the present time were discharged by men in a more responsible position, and who had a check placed over them which the new magistrates would be entirely free from. He should also like to know what assurance the Government would be prepared to give that the men who were appointed would not be equally as objectionable to the people as Mr. Clifford Lloyd was? The Secretary to the Treasury made a great deal, at the beginning of the Session, of the statement that Mr. Clifford Lloyd was not duly appointed; but the Irish people had no guarantee that Mr. Clifford Lloyd would not be re-appointed at some future date. Anyhow, they were perfectly aware that one of the officials proposed to be made under this Act was Captain Plunkett, who, if it were possible, was even more obnoxious than Mr. Clifford Lloyd. Of the four Special Magistrates receiving these allowances, three of them were Protestants, and only one, Captain Plunkett, was nominally a Catholic, or he pretended to be something of the sort. They would like to know whether it was proposed to continue to appoint to these important positions men who were of the Protestant religion, men who were Freemasons, and who were probably appointed to these responsible positions because they were Freemasons? He did not think the Secretary to the Treasury was at all well advised in introducing a Bill of that kind at that period of the Session. It was perfectly clear that the Bill had very little or no chance of passing; and upon his (Mr. Courtney's) own showing, at an earlier period of the Session, and on the showing of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland (Mr. Walker), the Bill was entirely unnecessary and frivolous. He (Mr. Kenny) hoped that if the Bill was intended to proceed further, many very sweeping alterations would be made in it during its passage through Committee. He noticed in the Bill a great many points that required remedying; and he found that his Colleagues objected to many of the details of the Bill, short as it was. He supposed he and his hon. Friends could not very well prevent the Bill being read a second time at that Sitting; but there was one thing certain, and that was that, even at the risk of prolonging the Session for an indefinite period, they must demand that in Committee the Bill should receive full and ample consideration.

Mr. GRAY said, that if the Secretary to the Treasury was determined to take the second reading of the Bill that night, as he evidently was, he (Mr. Gray) took it that it would have to be by the exercise of those physical powers which the hon. Gentleman used to display with so much advantage when he sat upon the Opposition side of the House. He (Mr. Gray) remembered that at that time the hon. Gentleman thought nothing of sitting up till 5 or 6 o'clock in the morning when he wanted to elucidate the condition of the Zulus, or the South African problem; indeed, it was only about 5 or 6 in the morning that the hon. Gentleman used to get lively. This Bill was from every conceivable point most objectionable, and the manner in which it was being pressed forward that night was only characteristic of it as a whole. He could scarcely imagine what the House would think of a measure of this kind if it referred to any other portion of the United Kingdom, and it was being dealt with in the manner in which the Government was dealing with this Bill. In the first place, they had an exceedingly important measure introduced without any kind of explanation, and in the absence of the responsible Minister who ought to have charge of it, and who ought to be prepared to explain and defend it. In the second place, they had the vast majority of the Members representing that portion of the Kingdom with which the Bill dealt strongly opposed to it, and they had present a bare quorum of the House composed of English and Scotch Members, most of whom, happily for themselves, had been enjoying that repose here which they ought to have been enjoying, and which they would have been enjoying, more comfortably elsewhere, but for the action of the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury, and who were only remaining to force their opinions, or the opinions of the Secretary to the Treasury, upon the Irish people. Well, if such a procedure were applied to Scotland, the Scotch Members would resist it very determinedly, and probably very much more acrimoniously than the Irish Members were resisting this Bill. But the Government would never dream for a moment of attempting at 4 o'clock, or half-past 3 o'clock in the morning, of forcing a Scotch Bill through the House in spite of the determined opposition of the Scotch Representatives who happened to be in attendance; they would never dream of doing such a thing with reference to the smallest detail of English legislation. Of course, this Bill merely referred to Ireland, and as it was merely the Representatives of Ireland who objected to it, it was a good subject for a joke on the part of the Government. He had no doubt the Government would succeed that night in doing what they desired. Whether it would serve good government in Ireland, or serve the rapid advance of Governmental Business during the remainder of the Session, was yet to be seen. Now, what was the justification which the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary endeavoured to make out for the somewhat changed views of the Government with reference to this measure? The Secretary to the Treasury had denied that there had been any change of front at all, and that the introduction of a note in the Estimates was sufficient in itself to sanction the payment of these increased salaries, and that the legality would be quite covered by embodying the practical repeal of a former Act of Parliament in the Appropriation Bill. Now, for the sake of omitting a note in the Estimates, the hon. Gentleman did not hesitate, as the Representative of the Government that night, to contend with the entire body of Irish Members. The hon. Gentleman had not got one single Irish Member that night to say one solitary word in support of his Bill, and he evidently did not care whether he did or not. For the sake of omitting a note in the Estimates, the hon. Gentleman would keep the Irish Members there until their right of speech was exhausted, until their energies, which could not compete with those of the hon. Member himself—until they were exhausted, and until he had forced the Bill through a second reading. The Bill contained a vitally important principle; but if the contention of the Secretary to the Treasury were correct—namely, that the payment of these Resident Magistrates would be legally covered by an Estimate embodied in the Appropriation Bill, the position was very different indeed, if that method were adopted, than it would be if the method which they now proposed were acceded to—namely, the embodiment of the Estimate in a separate Bill. What was the case? The condition of Ireland for the last few years had been exceedingly exceptional. As had been pointed out by former speakers, in consequence of the distress and excitement and agitation which had prevailed, crime had existed in the country. Under similar circumstances there would be an unusual amount of crime in any country. The Government, however, found the necessity of taking extraordinary measures to deal with the state of affairs. One of the extraordinary measures they took—wisely or unwisely, he did not propose to discuss now—was the appointment of a number of gentlemen whom they were pleased to call

Special Resident Magistrates, and whom they endowed with exceptional powers. They wanted to pay these gentlemen, and they did pay them, special remuneration for their services, and up to this they had embodied the payments in the Estimates. From the explanation of the Secretary to the Treasury—he (Mr. Gray) had not looked at the Estimates himself, for he was not present when the subject was discussed some time ago—the Treasury put a sub-note to the Estimates calling attention to the fact that special remuneration was meted out to the Special Resident Magistrates in question. Now, if that procedure was followed in the future this fact would be clearly marked out—that this was an exceptional transaction which the Irish people might hope some day or other to see an end of, and it would be a legitimate subject for discussion on the Estimates whenever the Irish Members thought fit to raise it, until the time had come when an arrangement of a permanent character was made and the note for the exceptional demand disappeared. That would be proper and perfectly legitimate; but the Secretary to the Treasury wanted to get rid of the opportunity of discussion—he wanted to shelve this question once for all, and he wanted to obtain, not a Vote to reward five men for exceptional services rendered in exceptional times, but the power, in perpetuity, of selecting from the Irish Resident Magistracy five men to be specially rewarded for special political services. If there was one principle more dear to the average Englishman than another, and which was treated as absolutely a portion of the Constitution, it was that the Judges of the land, and the Judges in an inferior position to those in the Superior Courts, should be, in the first place, unapproachable, and should, in the second place, be placed above political temptation by having their position fixed, and should not be subject to have their judgments or actions warped by political rewards which might be held out to them. But that was all very fine and admirable for England; but for Ireland it was a mere subject of jest between the Attorney General (Sir Henry James) and the Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Courtney), who could not even conceal their laughter at the notion that principles which were sacred in England were at all applicable to Ireland. It was now proposed to leave the position of the ordinary body of Resident Magistrates in Ireland absolutely unchanged, and to pay those magistrates salaries varying from a minimum of £300 to a maximum of £500 a-year. But it was proposed to take power by this Bill to select, at the discretion of the Executive of the day, five of these magistrates to be rewarded with twice the maximum salary. He had looked over the evidence given before the Commission to which reference had been made, and he found that the first witness examined was the gentleman who signed the Memorial to the Lord Lieutenant, on which Memorial the Commission was issued. Mr. Edward Fitzgerald Ryan was examined, and said his salary was £500 a-year, and that he had held the post of Resident Magistrate since February, 1846—that was to say, that at the time he was examined he had held the office for nearly 40 years. This man had served the Queen faithfully for nearly 40 years, and he and such as he had done their duty to the satisfaction of the Crown, and the Executive, and probably also to the satisfaction of the people for 35 or 40 years; he and such as he were to be left at a salary of £500 a-year, while Mr. Clifford Lloyd, Mr. Blake, and Captain Plunkett, who only came over two or three years ago, who had made themselves extremely obnoxious, who had been the cause of great disturbances, of quartering extra police on many districts, and the effects of whose mischievous system would long be felt in the country, were to be picked out and rewarded with double salary of the men who had really done their duty faithfully. The Secretary to the Treasury proposed that they should give to the Executive, in perpetuity, the power thus to corrupt the entire Magistracy of Ireland, because the evil effects of the proposed system would not be confined to the five men who would be appointed in the first place. The Executive would have an improper and corruptive influence over the Resident Magistrates in the country; the Resident Magistrates would have constantly dangling before their eyes a reward of a double salary, if only they made themselves sufficiently obnoxious to the people. And that was the little Bill which the Secretary to the Treasury said was a mere formality. That was what the hon. Gentleman gave them to understand was the effect of the Bill, the second reading of which he proposed in the absence of the responsible Minister the Chief Secretary in a two sentence speech; and were he (Mr. Gray) and his Friends to be considered unreasonable or obstructive because they opposed such a Bill as that by all the Forms of the House? He did not hesitate to say that if the same principle were to be applied to the portions of the country represented by other hon. Members, those hon. Members would do precisely the same as the Irish Members were now doing, and it did poor credit to the good sense of English or Scotch Members to remain there at the dictation of the Government Whips for the purpose of crushing the Irish Members. Of course, the speeches that were made were of no interest to English and Scotch Members. Naturally enough they were not affected by the Bill, their constituencies would not be harassed or overtaxed by the action of the men it was proposed to create a special class by this Bill; but the people of Ireland knew by experience the mischief that such men had caused in Ireland. The Irish people knew perfectly well that if they gave power to override the ordinary law, and to hold out to Judges the prospect of exceptional and enormous rewards for what the Government called special services, but what the Irish people called special injuries, the effect upon the country would be most disastrous. What was the excuse for this proposal? A few years ago a Memorial signed on the part of all the Resident Magistrates of Ireland, complaining that their pay was fixed in the year 1836 at a figure which was altogether inadequate now-a-days, in view of the increased cost of living, was presented to the Lord Lieutenant. The Government, at the request of the Memorialists, appointed a Royal Commission to inquire into the grievances of the Resident Magistrates, and in the Treasury Minute appointing the Commission it was stated that they had written to Mr. Ryan to the following effect:—That his Memorial of the 17th instant, representing the insufficiency of the salaries received by the Resident Magistrates, had been brought under the notice of Her Majesty's Government, and that the subject would be included in the scope of the inquiries about to be made by the Commission into the salaries of the Civil servants of Ireland, and it was added that—"The present system of allowances to Resident Magistrates is considered to be open to objection, and that the attention of the Commissioners will be directed, not only to the amount of salaries received by magistrates, but also to placing their emoluments under more satisfactory regulation."

Was that done in this Bill? Why, there was not a single word to that effect. The whole body of magistrates applied to have a reasonable increase made to their salaries, which varied from a minimum of £300 to a maximum of £500 a-year. A Commission was appointed, evidence was received, and the Commission recommended various increases. The Government did not attach any importance to those recommendations, or, if they did, they did not act upon any single one of them. Instead of that they introduced an extraordinary Bill giving power to double the maximum salaries of five individual magistrates, and leave the condition of the Resident Magistrates in Ireland unchanged. The Government did not think it necessary to say one single word in justification of this measure, not even one word of explanation until it was wrung reluctantly from the Secretary to the Treasury by the opposition of Irish Members, though they did think they were quite justified in keeping a House until that hour (8.40) to compel the Representatives of Ireland to pass the second reading of the Bill. The Irish Members did not pretend to have the marvellous powers which enabled the Secretary to the Treasury to resist so long and so successfully on some previous occasions large majorities in the House of Commons when that hon. Gentleman found himself in Opposition. They were not able to speak for two or three hours at a stretch in the face of a majority who would not listen to one word they said, a feat he remembered the hon. Gentleman performing in speaking upon the question of Woman Suffrage. ["Oh, oh!"] Well, perhaps the hon. Gentleman only spoke an hour or an hour and a-half; but he seemed to speak two or three hours. If the Irish Members did not succeed in counting out the House on this occasion, the Government would exhaust them and succeed in carrying the second reading; but they would probably prolong thereby the debates in Supply for two or three days. The action the Government were now taking had caused the greatest discontent in Ireland, and it would still further demoralize the whole body of Resident Magistrates in the country; it would make the Resident Magistrates discontented; it would give to the officials of Dublin Castle further means of corruption, which undoubtedly they would use, as they always had used them, in opposition to the interests of the country; it would increase the difficulties of governing Ireland, and, personally, he failed to see what conceivable good object could be served by it.

MR. SMALL said, that as he listened to the progress of the debate he was reminded of one that took place in the House during the last Session, a short time after he had the honour to be elected a Member of the House. The debate appeared to be very similar to the one which took place upon the Bill for the reconstitution of the Constabulary Force in Ireland. As if it were to make the parallel more remarkable, the Irish Constabulary Bill also singled out five officers for special rewards. That Bill came to a more untimely end than its promoters wished, and he had little doubt that would be the fate of the Bill now under consideration. He listened most attentively to the speech which the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury made in introducing the measure, and from that speech he gathered that the principal reason for the introduction of the Bill was that the Treasury might be spared the trouble of putting some foot-note in the Estimates in future years. That argument he failed to understand; because if the payments which had been made in former years were legal, what earthly necessity was there for a special Bill providing for those payments? If the payments, however, were not legal, did the Government mean to say that it was coming to the House to ask for a Bill of Indemnity? He had taken the trouble to look into the accounts which had hitherto regulated the salaries of Resident Magistrates in Ireland, and he had observed with some surprise there had been a regular and constant rise in the salaries of those officials. Why that should be so greatly puzzled him, and it had puzzled him all the more because the population of Ireland had not increased during the last 30 or 40 years. As a matter of fact, the number of people in Ireland, over whom the Resident Magistrates had exercised jurisdiction, had very much decreased instead of increasing; and, therefore, he could not see why the pet officials of the English Government in Ireland should receive larger salaries with a smaller number of people to deal with and with similar duties to perform. In the year 1836 an Act was passed declaring that every magistrate appointed should receive a salary not exceeding £400 a-year; but the House must bear in mind that the Act did not declare that every magistrate should receive that amount, but that that should be the maximum, and a magistrate might have received only a nominal salary. In 1853 another Act was passed, by which the Lord Lieutenant was empowered to increase the salaries of not more than 20 magistrates to a sum not exceeding £500 per annum, and there, again, £500 was the maximum that any magistrate could receive. Since that time the salaries of these magistrates had been increased at different periods, until at last, by an Act 37 & 38 Vict., they were divided into three classes. The third class were, under that Act, to receive salaries of £300, or not exceeding £425; the second class were to receive salaries of £400, or not exceeding £550; the first class were to receive salaries of £500, or not exceeding £675. From that it would appear that the largest sum to be paid to any one magistrate was only two-thirds of the amount now proposed to be given to five Resident Magistrates in Ireland. Probably the hon. Gentleman in charge of this Bill was not so well acquainted with the personnel of the Resident Magistrates as Members on the Irish Benches were. He had had an intimate acquaintance with them. They were as ignorant as daws, and had no sympathy with the people. The hon. Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy) had referred to the class from which these Resident Magistrates were chiefly drawn—namely, from half-pay military officers. They were very objectionable in many cases; they knew nothing about law, but were martinets, familiar with martial law, and were therefore not suitable for Civil positions. But these military magistrates were not the most objectionable, for the Constabulary officers, who were also found in considerable numbers among these Resident Magistrates, were ten times more objectionable. They were ignorant of all law except police law; once policemen they were always policemen. Their principle was to get a conviction and reverse the old Constitutional maxim, and they took a policeman's word before anyone else's. He believed that when once a gentleman received an official position in England he remained in that position for the rest of his life; and promotion from one office to another in England was very rare; but in Ireland that Constitutional maxim seemed to be altogether inapplicable. The rule, and not the exception, was that every official should have inducements held out to him to be subservient to the Castle at Dublin. That was the case in the Supreme Court, and he had seen Judge after Judge promoted from Puisne Judgeships to seats in the Supreme Court, and to seats as Lords of Appeal here in the House of Lords. Consequently, it was no wonder that officials in Ireland were the tools of Dublin Castle. It was not enough that the ordinary officials should be corrupt, but corruption must be extended to the Resident Magistrates and to the County Courts. He had heard many reports that the Law Courts in Ireland were instruments of tyranny; but his experience was that no Courts were more really instruments of tyranny than the Magistrates' Courts. In some parts of Ireland there were no special laws in operation which were governed by the old Statute Law, and in some parts of the country he had seen how they could be turned into instruments of tyranny; and if that was so in those parts, what must be the tyranny exercised in those parts of the country where exceptional laws were in operation and exceptional powers were conferred on the magistrates? Members from Ireland had known for years what the Resident Magistrates were. They were bad enough; but the idea on the Treasury Bench seemed to be that they were not bad enough, but ought to be worse—that there were not sufficient inducements to them to remember that they were not intended to be judicial officers, but administrative officers. Ireland was a poor country, and yet it was proposed by this Bill to give an additional sum of £325 a-year to five magistrates. That might not seem a very large sum to Gentlemen on the Treasury Bench; but it would be a good deal to an Irish county magistrate. Now, he thought the House would understand that the Irish Members were perfectly justified in their opposition to this Bill, and he hoped the Bill would never pass into law. He was satisfied it never would; and it seemed an extraordinary thing that, after the solemn announcement of the Prime Minister that no more legislation or concessions for Ireland could be got from that House, this important Bill should have been introduced.

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members being found present,

Mr SMALL said, he also observed that in every little matter of detail this Bill was made as objectionable as possible. It might not be so objectionable if it declared that the five magistrates should be the five who were senior in office or in years; but what did it say?—

"It shall be lawful for the Lord Lieutenant, with the consent of the Commissioners of the Treasury," &c.

As a rule, the Treasury were averse to granting Ireland money; but, no doubt, in this case they would be quite willing. The Lord Lieutenant was to have absolute discretion as to who the magistrates should be, and he had some suspicion as to the mode in which they would be selected. He would, no doubt, select those who had been most obnoxious in the districts in which there had been most crime, and they would be the favourites of the Castle, and would receive these increased salaries. Taking the Bill in its entirety, and in all its details, he did not think it could be made more objectionable than it was; and he thought that perhaps the reason why the Bill was made so long, and was brought forward at this end of the Session, was that the Secretary to the Treasury thought that would enable it to slip quietly through. It seemed to him rather strange that this debate had not been favoured by the presence of a single Member of the Cabinet. He saw several hon. Gentlemen on the Treasury Bench, but not one Member of the Cabinet, and that was a circumstance that should be complained of. There ought to have been some more responsible Member of the Government present to defend the Bill; but not a single Member of the Government had risen to say a single word upon it, except the hon. Gentleman who moved the second reading. He had made two speeches, but not another Member of the Government had spoken upon it in answer to the speeches of his hon. Friends. He thought that was scarcely fair treatment, and he should therefore move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion made, and Question put, "That the Debate be now adjourned."—(Mr. Small.)

The House divided:—Ayes 11; Noes 38: Majority 27.—(Div. List, No. 191.)

Question again proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

MR. MOLLOY said, he rose to oppose this Bill, which was introduced by the Secretary to the Treasury, as far as he could ascertain, without any explanation, without any reason, and without any justification, but simply in that spirit of obstinacy of which the Secretary to the Treasury had already given some indications. It would be in the recollection of the House that only the other day, in the discussion which took place on the subject of Mr. Bolton's salary, some Irish Members had asked the Secretary to the Treasury whether, under the circumstances, he would consent to the adjournment of the debate; but the hon. Gentleman seemed determined to carry out the scheme he had placed before himself with that obstinacy of which he had already spoken, and which appeared to be a growing characteristic of the hon. Gentleman. The House would also remember that on that occasion, after the debate had proceeded for some time, the Prime Minister came in, and as soon as he had obtained a clear and accurate knowledge of what had taken place, and of the course pursued by the Secretary to the Treasury, indicated, with that generosity which distinguished him, his sincere regret at that course, and in the gentlest manner went on to blame the Secretary to the Treasury for having opposed his single will to the will of the country, and of a large number of Members who were specially interested in the subject. On the present occasion, the hon. Gentleman, desirous, no doubt, of scoring a little victory at the end of the Session, had brought forward the second reading of this Bill actuated by exactly the same feeling of obstinacy as that which distinguished him on the previous occasion. On the former occasion, the Financial Secretary could not be said to have scored any great victory, nor did he think the hon. Gentleman would score any victory on the present occasion. Few as were the Irish Members now present, the hon. Gentleman would, perhaps, at 9 or half-past 9 in the morning, succeed in obtaining the second reading of this Bill; but what would be the effect of that upon the course of Business? The Estimates were not yet finished; but the Secretary to the Treasury had that night thrown down the glove to Irish Members by introducing a Bill for which there was not the slightest necessity. He had endeavoured to envelop the subject in a veil of mystery in order not to show any reason for introducing the Bill, and those who heard his speech would admit that he gave no information whatever to the House as to the subject-matter of the Bill. He did not know that any information was particularly sought for by some Members of the House, for when sound and argumentative reasons were being given against the Bill he looked round the House, and on the Treasury Bench, and found three Members of the Government asleep on the Government Bench, seven Members below the Gangway asleep, and one distinguished Member of the Government asleep in a dark corner of the House. Those were the conditions under which this Bill had been brought forward that night. He, for one, took exception to any legislation introduced under such circumstances, and he took still stronger exception to any legislation for Ireland under those most extraordinary and exceptional conditions. The Members of the Government had not all spoken. They had heard the speeches made from those Benches, and although the Secretary to the Treasury was precluded from making any further observations, still there was the Attorney General, who was most capable of giving the soundest reasons and information upon any legal Bill affecting either Ireland or England; but the hon. and learned Gentleman made no sign of doing so. There were other Members of the Government present who might answer some of the speeches that had been made against this Bill. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland (Mr. Walker) had a great store of legal knowledge, and he might give the House his opinion of the Bill now under consideration; but he (Mr. Molloy) supposed it was contrary to the tactics of the Government that the hon. and learned Gentleman should afford hon. Members from Ireland any satisfaction. The hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Courtney) declined, in introducing the Bill, to give them any explanation, because, in point of fact, the foot-note argument, which on so many occasions had been the stock-in-trade of the Government, had come to grief. The Secretary to the Treasury introduced the Bill, and the hon. Members who, to the number of 41, consented to remain during the long hours of the night, did not care for any explanation; indeed, at one period of the debate more than one-half of the hon. Gentlemen who had rallied to the standard of the Secretary to the Treasury were asleep. Last year a Bill was introduced in the House by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary (Mr. Trevelyan) which dealt with the Royal Irish Constabulary, and with the Irish Resident Magistrates. On the occasion of the introduction of that Bill, he (Mr. Molloy) produced to the House a Report which had been made to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland and to the Chief Secretary upon the subject of the Bill. That Report was made by Mr. Jenkinson and three other Resident Magistrates. He (Mr. Molloy) only alluded to the Irish Constabulary Bill because this Bill was the outcome of that Bill. Mr. Jenkinson and the three other Magistrates wished to be considered disinterested persons, and they made a Report to the Lord Lieutenant and the Chief Secretary. They had previously resolved themselves into a Secret Committee, and Mr. Jenkinson officiated as Chairman. On behalf of this Committee, Mr. Jenkinson reported to the Lord Lieutenant that, in their own opinion, their salaries required to be increased. He (Mr. Molloy) stated these facts with absolute confidence, because he mentioned them last year, and the Chief Secretary admitted their correctness. He (Mr. Molloy) challenged the right hon. Gentleman to deny the facts as stated; but the Chief Secretary was silent. Mr. Jenkinson reported to the Lord Lieutenant that in future his own salary should be £2,000 a-year, with £400 a-year as forage allowance, and that, of course, in addition to his small pension of £1,000 a-year; and that the salary of each of the other magistrates who sat in secret with him should be, as well as he (Mr. Molloy) remembered, £1,500 a-year, with £200 a-year for forage. Now, that clearly showed whence the Bill which the Secretary to the Treasury had introduced that night came. The hon. Gentleman entered into no explanation, for the simple fact that he knew nothing about the Bill, or the circumstances connected with it. The Bill had been put into the hon. Gentleman's hand, he brought it forward, and there ended his task. But the Bill was born in the imagination of Mr. Jenkinson, and the three magistrates who were to benefit by the Bill. He should like to ask the Radical Members of the House, who were supposed to be friends of economy and liberty, what they would think if, instead of the words Ireland and Irish magistrates, the words England and English magistrates were used in the Bill? He saw one hon. Gentleman opposite who had often given the Irish Members considerable help in their endeavours to obtain in the House what they claimed to be justice; and he would like to ask his hon. Friend what he would think if such a state of affairs as that which existed in Ireland were presented to his mind in connection with his own country? What would his hon. Friend think, if the words were changed in the manner he had stated, and he (Mr. Molloy) and other Irish Members were, at the beck and call of the Whips of a Party, and knowing little or nothing of the circumstances, to sit there through the long hours of the night to support such a Bill—a Bill in which they did not believe, or had the slightest interest in? His hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Warton), who was the sole Representative of Her Majesty's Opposition now present, had also taken considerable interest in matters relating to Ireland. If the hon. and learned Gentleman could put himself in the position of an Irish Member, would he, having heard what it was proposed to do by this Bill, be prepared to rise in his place and support the Bill? If the Bill were one simply for the purpose of paying the magistrates who had done their work, and were doing it at the present moment, well, he (Mr. Molloy) would certainly not be found waiting there through the small hours of the morning to oppose it. But this was a Bill born in the mind of Mr. Jenkinson for the purpose of recompensing himself—for he (Mr. Molloy) would be able to show that Mr. Jenkinson was going back to Ireland—and others, and for establishing not only extensive payment under exceptional circumstances and peculiar conditions, but for establishing for all time these inordinate salaries for men who in Ireland were little better than superior policemen. The old Resident Magistrates in Ireland, who were men of position, men who had served in the Army or in the law, were satisfied with a salary of £500, which he thought was not too great a salary; but the importations from Burmah and other distant parts of the world, where civilization was certainly at a discount, thought they were entitled to much larger salaries than those which had hitherto been held to be sufficient for the ordinary Resident Magistrates. It was because the new and higher salaries were to be made permanent that he objected to them as he did that night. Now, one might look with some curiosity at the future course of the Bill. He supposed the Bill would go into Committee. They were all anxious to get away for their holidays and to prepare for the coming Autumn Session; but the introduction of this Bill would prolong the Session for at least two days, and he should be glad if his statement reached the ears of the superior Members of the Government; it might prolong the Session considerably longer, but that it would prolong the Session at least two days he was fully persuaded. [Mr. HEALY: Oh, a week.] The introduction of the Bill had created an irritation which would be felt in every debate which took place during the remainder of the Session; not that Irish Members would act in any childish or revengeful spirit, but simply in a spirit of fair and honest retaliation. Personally, he had no hesitation in saying that he entirely approved of such a spirit influencing his hon. Friends, and he should join them in whatever course they chose to adopt in the pursuance of such a spirit. Now, one was in the habit of making appeals in the House of Commons, and he might, of course, occupy the time of the House, if to occupy time were the only object he had in view, by making an appeal to the better sense of the Secretary to the Treasury to let the Bill now drop. But he did not make any such appeal, because the hon. Gentleman had set his heart upon the passing of this Bill, a Bill of which, as he (Mr. Molloy) had already said, the hon. Gentleman knew nothing. He could not help thinking that by his action the hon. Gentleman was very discourteous—of course, he meant politically discourteous—and it was for this reason he thoroughly endorsed the feeling of retaliation which he was sure would prompt the action of his hon. Friends during the remainder of the Session. He assured the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury that by the introduction of this Bill he had not facilitated the Business of the House; he had done no good to the Government of which he was a Member; he had done no good to anybody; but he wished to make himself and his Government the subservient slaves of Mr. Jenkinson, and those who, like Mr. Jenkinson, looked upon the positions they held in Ireland from the point of view of their own selfish interest, and not from the point of view of the good of the country. He did not like to make such a statement without giving some proof of it, and he would give proof. The year before last, when the Special Resident Magistrates were appointed, a friend of his came to him and asked him to recommend him as a Resident Magistrate. He (Mr. Molloy) said to his friend he had no sympathy with the system; but, even if he did recommend him, he would be sure not to get it. He added—"Personally, I wish you every success; but what in the world do you know about the duties of a Resident Magistrate? You have been in the Army; you are still in the Army; you have spent most of your time in India, and now you seek the position of an Irish Resident Magistrate. Whatever has put it into your head to apply for the post of Resident Magistrate?" His friend replied to him that Mr. So-and-so, mentioning one of the principal Resident Magistrates by name, had written to him and to two or three others in the same regiment, telling them now was their time, if they would come over to Ireland he would get them in. He (Mr. Molloy) need hardly assure the House that these were facts within his own knowledge. He asked Members of the House to put aside the ill-feeling usually engendered by these little competitions of strength on the part of Parties in the House, and to put this question seriously to themselves—Was this a system under which those onerous and responsible positions were given away, in the manner he had just described, one which they were there that night to uphold and support? He asked hon. Members if they thought that, by following the beck and call of the Whips of the Liberal Party, of which they themselves were Members, and in voting for a Bill of which they knew nothing, they were acting wisely? Did they not think that they would be acting more honourably in walking out of the House than in stopping there to vote for a system which was, on the very best authority, alleged to be pernicious in the last degree, and contrary in every way to the principles of the Party to which they belonged?

MR. DAWSON said, he was surprised to find on this Constitutional question Radical Members, and Members who had sworn—

MR. SPEAKER: Am I right in supposing that the hon. Gentleman seconded the Motion for Adjournment?

MR. DAWSON: I only raised my hat.

MR. SPEAKER: I thought I was right in supposing that the hon. Gentleman seconded the Motion for Adjournment; in that case, the hon. Gentleman has exhausted his right to speak.

MR. HEALY: May I ask, Mr. Speaker, whether it is not a fact that the hon. and learned Member for Brighton (Mr. Marriott), who was then sitting on the opposite side of the House, not merely spoke, but moved the adjournment of the House during the course of the debate on Egypt, and that you allowed him to speak subsequently?

MR. SPEAKER: That is not the question now before the House. The question is whether the hon. Member for Carlow (Mr. Dawson) seconded the Motion for the Adjournment of the House. The hon. Gentleman says he did do so; and I, therefore, rule that he cannot now speak upon this subject.

MR. HEALY: May I ask whether an hon. Member can move the adjournment, and then speak subsequently; or does your ruling only apply to a case of an hon. Member who seconds the Motion for Adjournment?

MR. SPEAKER: In neither case is the hon. Member entitled to speak again.

MR. HEALY: The hon. and learned Member for Brighton, on the occasion I refer to, did speak again.

MR. DEASY said, he was sorry that his hon. Friend the Member for Carlow (Mr. Dawson) had not an opportunity of addressing the House on this subject; because, on account of the position the hon. Member occupied for a very considerable time as the Chief Magistrate of the first City in Ireland, he would have been able to throw considerably more light on the question now under discussion than any Gentleman who had spoken up to this. But he (Mr. Deasy) however, ventured to say that before half-an-hour was over his hon. Friend would have an ample opportunity of discussing this Bill, and that the House generally would have an opportunity of hearing the Members of the Government who had not condescended, so far, to reply to the many speeches which had been delivered from the Irish Benches during the last few hours. He was not connected with any branch of the Legal Profession, and, therefore, he was particularly anxious to hear the opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown sitting upon the Treasury Bench as to the merits of the Bill now under consideration. He was sorry that the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Trevelyan), who would be mostly concerned in the administration of this Bill if it became law, had not put in an appearance that night. The right hon. Gentleman had not shown himself in the House since this Bill was introduced, and he (Mr. Deasy) did not suppose they would see him during the remainder of the debate. He was sorry for the Solicitor General for Ireland (Mr. Walker), who, together with other hon. Members, would have to attend an important Committee that day at 12 o'clock, for it was evident that the Committee to which he alluded could not, after so late a Sitting as this, carry on its inquiry in a manner which would at all be satisfactory. But, however that might be, he had no wish to dwell upon the matter any longer. He was bound to say he was considerably surprised when he found the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury rise in his place and propose the second reading of this Bill, because he understood the Prime Minister distinctly to lay down some few days ago that no Bill of this character would be introduced during the remainder of the Session; that no Bill of a contentious character would be proceeded with; and it was just by the merest chance that he (Mr. Deasy), and many of his hon. Friends, had not already left for Ireland. No matter in what way the pledge of the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister was intended, it certainly, in the opinion of the Irish Members, had not been kept. Now, the Bill amounted to a most serious innovation, and it was a Bill which, if it became law, would not conduce at all to the peace or contentment of Ireland. Already a very strong feeling existed against the police of Ireland, and a still stronger feeling existed against the police magistrates who had recently been appointed, and he could not conceive anything which would be likely to make the people more dissatisfied than the permanent appointment of these five Pashas. They knew in the South of Ireland, from personal experience, in what manner the five Special Resident Magistrates to be appointed under the Bill would be likely to administer the law. He knew how Captain Plunkett had been conducting himself as Resident Magistrate of Cork, and he supposed Captain Plunkett would be one of the gentlemen who would be appointed under the Bill. One of his (Mr. Deasy's) liveliest recollections of the scenes which had taken place in the House since he had been a Member of Parliament was that of the scene connected with the discussion which took place as to the conduct of Captain Plunkett, with regard to the way he treated people in public meeting in County Cork. The proceedings of that night reminded him very strongly of what took place upon the occasion referred to, because they then remained sitting until, he believed, 6 o'clock on the Sunday morning. They were now approaching the hour of 6, and he thought it was very probable that their deliberations on this occasion would extend beyond that hour. As to the manner in which Captain Plunkett was likely to conduct himself in the future, he (Mr. Deasy) could only judge by the past. During the whole of last winter Captain Plunkett, who was not responsible to the Irish Government, or responsible, in fact, to any Government at all, took upon himself the authority of the Executive Government of the country, and would not permit a single meeting to be held throughout the County of Cork. Not only that, but when this Captain Plunkett became a Special Resident Magistrate, the county was at once flooded with a large number of extra police. Those extra police still remained quartered upon the people, and had formed the subject of discussion several times in the House of Commons, and would form the subject of discussion many more times before the House adjourned previous to the Autumn Recess. At the present time Captain Plunkett's personal staff numbered 22 men. These men have nothing to do but to drive about the whole of the South of Ireland, and were a constant source of annoyance and of heavy expense to the people. He (Mr. Deasy) had hoped that in discussing a matter of this kind, and in bringing under the notice of the House the unconstitutional conduct of men of the character of Captain Plunkett, the Irish Members would have had the support of those Gentlemen opposite, who so often professed to be the advocates of freedom of speech, and, indeed, of freedom in all things. He was sorry to say that since he was returned to the House, he and the Party to which he belonged had not experienced very much sympathy from those Gentlemen. He assured the Radical Members that their conduct on the present occasion might have the effect of causing the Irish Members to withdraw their support from the agitation which the Radicals were now carrying on against the Upper House. As to that agitation he would not say more than that he did not believe it was sincere.

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member is not now speaking to the particular subject before the House—he is not speaking with any relevancy to the subject now in hand.

MR. DEASY said, he would endeavour in the remainder of his remarks to address himself to the subject. He would not say anything further concerning the hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway opposite, of whom he had entertained opinions which he did not think they themselves would be very glad to hear. He thought the House had a right to demand from the Attorney General for England (Sir Henry James) some explanation of his extraordinary conduct on this occasion. On the 16th of March a Supplementary Estimate for the salaries of Resident Magistrates in Ireland was brought in, and the hon. and learned Gentleman pointed out to the House that it was perfectly regular to introduce a foot note in the Estimate, explaining any increase which had been made in a salary. He was glad the hon. and learned Gentleman was now in his place, because the Irish Members would like to hear his opinion on the subject. The hon. and learned Gentleman defended, on the 16th of March, that mode of increasing the salaries of the magistrates in Ireland; but now the Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Courtney) said that the plan hitherto adopted was a very inconvenient, if not irregular, way of increasing the salaries of magistrates. The Attorney General (Sir Henry James), however, did not now get up and explain the position he had taken up on the subject. Now, a most important Report bearing on this subject was read by the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for County Galway (Colonel Nolan), than whom none was more fitted to deal with the question, because he had taken part in the investigations into the Irish Constabulary system. The hon. and gallant Gentleman had pointed out that the recommendations of the Committee of which he was a Member were greatly exceeded by this Bill; that it was proposed by the Committee that the salaries given to the magistrates of the special class should not exceed £600. Without any reason being assigned, the House was now asked to sanction an increase of salary amounting to £400 a-year each to five magistrates. Nothing had given greater dissatisfaction to the people of Ireland than the appointment of divisional magistrates. As he had already pointed out, they had considerable experience of one of such magistrates in the South of Ireland; but it was a well-known fact that whenever one of these magistrates had been appointed, the greatest irritation amongst the people had resulted from his action. Let him (Mr. Deasy) call attention to the debate which took place a few nights ago with regard to the quartering of an extra police force in Limerick. It was clearly proved that the extra police were only drafted into that city when Mr. Cliford Lloyd was appointed Special Magistrate. They had got a sort of understanding that Mr. Cliford Lloyd would not be brought back; but there were other men quite as bad as he. He did not see any difference between Mr. Cliford Lloyd and Captain Plunkett—in fact, he thought Captain Plunkett would make a far more objectionable and more severe magistrate than even Mr. Cliford Lloyd was. These men had the control of the police, all their sympathies were with the police, and it would be utterly impossible for any person brought before such magistrates to get his case dismissed, or to get a verdict against a policeman. That was always the way with the police magistrates. The word of a policeman was taken to the exclusion of the oaths of 20 respectable civilians, and it would be impossible for people to have any respect for the law, if these men had the administration of it. The police and these magistrates would have a direct interest in manufacturing crime, and getting all the convictions they possibly could against men charged with the commission of misdeeds. He had very little confidence in their consciences. He did not for a moment believe they would run the risk of sacrificing their incomes of £500 per annum, if that depended on the misfortune, or even the lives, of men. Whatever confidence he might have had in them was now quite shaken. They were quite as bad as those employed in Ireland by English Governments, who, in times past, were in the habit of gibbeting and pitch-capping men; and the present Government would countenance the same mode of dealing with political opponents in that country, but that public opinion was too strong for them. After all the speeches that had been made, he hoped they would now obtain some legal information from the Treasury Bench. They were fairly entitled to that information, and in order to give the Government a full and fair opportunity of replying to the many speeches they had heard, he should move, as an Amendment, that at that period of the Session the House was not prepared to proceed with a Bill of such importance involving grave considerations of Irish policy. He would say nothing on the Amendment, except that he moved it in order to hear the observations of hon.

Members on the Treasury Bench, because he was really at a loss to understand the position in which he and his hon. Friends stood with regard to this measure. He hoped, therefore, that they would at last hear the Attorney General (Sir Henry James), who took up a very different position three or four months ago.

THE O'GORMAN MAHON seconded the Amendment.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "at this period of the Session this House is not prepared to proceed with a Bill of such importance involving grave considerations of Irish policy,"—(Mr. Deasy),—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

MR. HEALY said, he hoped they would now have some observations from the Treasury Bench. They had no more to gain than the Government, and the Prime Minister had given a distinct pledge that they should not be kept sitting there, as they would have to come again for an Autumn Session. As the President of the Local Government Board (Sir Charles W. Dilke) was now present, he would ask him if the Prime Minister had not given that distinct pledge; and whether that pledge was now being kept in the spirit in which it had been interpreted when given? This matter was raised in March last; but the Government had waited until now to bring in this Bill. Four months had passed, and the Government had withdrawn the rest of their Bills; and surely this was not the right way in which to treat hon. Members. They had been told that the Session would wind up on Saturday week, and now they were required to go on with this Bill, which was certainly more contentious than many of those that had been dropped, simply because the Half-past 12 Rule did not apply to it. If there was to be any alteration in the Rules of the House, Money Bills ought to be brought within this Rule, except Exchequer Bills, making a distinct charge on the taxpayers. He appealed to the right hon. Baronet (Sir Charles W. Dilke) not to keep the House sitting longer. There were still a number of Votes to be taken, many of them being Irish, and would the Government get them the more easily by having this Bill? What excuse was there for having delayed this Bill, if it was of so much importance? Surely, since March there had been ample time to bring in the Bill, instead of waiting till the fag-end of the Session? If the Government simply wished to save their honour, Irish Members would have no objection to that, if they said they would then withdraw the Bill; but if they persisted with it, they would only prolong the Session. The Government had given a distinct pledge not to keep the House sitting longer than Saturday week; the Irish Members were not disposed to delay Supply; but they had some questions to raise on Irish Votes; and it would greatly help the House to close the Session if only they could get some distinct statement upon this measure from a responsible Member of the Government.

MR. DILLWYN said, he had supported the Government in this contention so far; but he must confess that he should like to see some explanation given of this matter. The statement, in the first instance, was not as ample as it might have been; there was a good deal in the appeal of hon. Members opposite; and he should support them in asking whether the hon. Gentleman really thought it worth while to continue this contention any further at the present time? He thought the Government would hardly gain much by doing so.

MR. COURTNEY said, the Government would certainly do their best to promote the early closing of the Session; but hon. Members knew very well that the Government had no desire to remain there to that hour in the morning. When this matter was raised in March last on the Supplementary Estimates, they were urged to bring in a Bill with respect to this subject, instead of proceeding by way of extra Votes, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer then distinctly stated that it would be dealt with by a Bill. It was, no doubt, true that the Bill had been brought in at a late period of the Session; but the subject had not been lost sight of, and it was only because of the pressure of other Business that this Bill was not introduced earlier. They had now sat to a late hour, in the hope of obtaining the second reading; but, under the circumstances, he would move that the debate be adjourned.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned."
—(Mr Courtney.)

Motion agreed to.

Debate adjourned till To-morrow.

EXPIRING LAWS CONTINUANCE

BILL.—[BILL 306.]

(Mr. Herbert Gladstone, Mr. Courtney.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

MR. HEALY said, he noticed that, for the first time, the Corrupt Practices Act was included in this Bill. Of course, that was the usual practice, and he did not wish to offer any opposition to it; but he should like to know whether it was the intention of the Government to put that measure annually into this Bill; and whether, if hon. Members desired to raise any points after the General Election, there would be any chance of revising the Act?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, he thought that the fact of this measure being put in the Continuance Bill would not prevent Members from raising questions as to its amendment on a future occasion—for instance, after a General Election. Although the Ballot Act was continued annually by the Continuance Bill, Amendments had been made in that Act, and in the same way all the corrupt practices that had been passed had been included in this Bill, so that he did not think there would be any difficulty in proposing Amendments.

PRIVATE BILLS—AMENDMENTS TO STANDING ORDERS.

RESOLUTIONS.

THE EARL OF REDESDALE (CHAIRMAN of COMMITTEES) moved that the Standing Orders relating to Private Bills be amended—(1.) All Bills (not being Estate Bills) seeking power, with reference to certain subjects (which are set out at length), are in their Orders termed Local Bills, and are divided into two classes, according to the subjects to which they respectively relate. (2.) Notices in reference to Street Tramways Bills; Subway Bills; diversions of water—deposit of maps, plans, and diagrams; deposit of Bills precedent to applications; estimates; proofs of consents; restrictions as to mortgage [and other particulars].

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN was understood to say that under the Standing Orders it was sometimes doubtful whether a Bill should be introduced as a private one or a public one.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, that on two occasions this Session the question had been raised—once when the Archbishop of Canterbury brought in a Bill to prevent the creation of charges on ecclesiastical lands, under any Land Improvement Act, without the consent of the Patron and Ordinary—there being a Company in the West of England in whose Private Act there were no such safeguards—when it was said that certain notices were necessary, though the Bill did not affect the vested right of any person, but would apply generally. It was said that it was a Private or Hybrid Bill; but he (the Lord Chancellor) objected to that view of the matter. The other instance was when his noble Friend (the Earl of Camperdown) brought in a Bill enabling all persons to know what charges of Water Companies they had to meet. That Bill took away no right whatsoever, and it did not come within the Standing Orders. It was to all intents and purposes a Public Bill, and not a private one; but it was objected to as being a Private Bill, and was not proceeded with. He hoped that next year his noble Friend would persevere in his efforts, and he would give him all the support in his power.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY pointed out that if any question arose in the House of Commons as to whether a Bill was a private or public one, it was decided by the Speaker, and in their Lordships' House by a vote. If there were any doubt as to the character of the Bill, the question should be decided by a vote of the House.

Motion agreed to.

Moved, "That the Standing Orders in relation to Labouring Class Dwellings be amended, and New Orders added."—(The Marquess of Salisbury.)

Motion agreed to.

The said Orders to be printed, as amended. (No. 224.)

EGYPT—THE CONFERENCE.

QUESTION.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: I beg to ask the noble Earl the Foreign Secretary, Whether he has any information to give the House with respect to the Conference?

EARL GRANVILLE: I have to inform the noble Marquess that the Plenipotentiaries met to-day; but they had not received an answer to the representations which they made to their different Courts, and, at present, I have nothing to add to what I stated yesterday.

LITERATURE, SCIENCE, AND ART— NATIONAL PORTRAIT GALLERY.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

LORD FORBES asked, Whether there were any funds available for the purchase of pictures for the National Portrait Gallery; and also when the catalogue was likely to be re-issued? He declared that it would be much to be regretted if the nation lost the chance of acquiring from the Blenheim Collection Raphael's "Madonna" and Van-dyke's equestrian picture of Charles I. The latter certainly should be purchased for the Portrait Gallery—one of the most interesting collections of pictures in the country. But, notwithstanding its valuable and interesting character, it was miserably housed, and almost unprotected against fire.

LORD LAMINGTON said, he quite agreed with the noble Lord as to the great value of the collection; but thought that the building in which the pictures were placed was unworthy of them. He also concurred in thinking that something ought to be done to guard these pictures against the extreme danger they were exposed to from fire. The Gallery was a most valuable one, and largely consisted of donations from various families; and yet the Government were content to see it liable to be burnt down at any moment.

LORD THURLOW said, that he was afraid he must confine his answer to the Questions on the Paper. It appeared that the funds at the disposal of the National Portrait Gallery Trustees were very limited, and consisted only of an annual Vote in the House of Commons of £750. As regarded this year, he might state that £500 of that amount had been anticipated by the Trustees in the purchase of important pictures in the recent Hamilton sale. Therefore, there remained available of this year's Vote only £250, and that had all been spent. The National Portrait Gallery Trustees would not be in a position to make any further addition to the collection until after March next, when they would come into the receipt of the usual Vote of £750. A new catalogue, he was informed, was in the hands of the printers, and would be available almost immediately. There would be also a supplementary pamphlet, which was in course of preparation, and that would be obtainable by the public for 6d. A brief list, for the price of 2d., would likewise be issued by the Trustees of all the more recent interesting acquisitions which had been made by them.

LORD FORBES again inquired whether the valuable Vandyke could not be secured for the collection?

THE SUEZ CANAL.

OBSERVATIONS.

LORD LAMINGTON, in calling the attention of Her Majesty's Government to the condition of the Suez Canal, said, he had received terrible accounts of the foul condition of that Canal; and when they reflected that 79 per cent of the vessels passing through it were British, their Lordships would see that the question was one of importance. The noble Earl (Earl Granville) stated, in answer to a Question recently put to him, that it was the duty of the Company to see to the condition of the Canal; but who controlled the Company in case they neglected their duty? The presence of the cholera in France made this matter all the more serious. This was the foulest cesspool that ever existed; there was no current through it at all, and unless some steps were taken by Her Majesty's Government, who in all these matters were virtually supreme, no remedy would be found against so dangerous a state of things.

EARL GRANVILLE: I am afraid I have not much to add to what I stated the other day. The noble Lord informs us that he has received the information he has stated to the House; but Her Majesty's Government have received no complaints, the Suez Canal Company have received no complaints, and the Commanders of Her Majesty's ships passing through the Canal have made no complaints. At the same time, I think it extremely likely that that narrow piece of water may not be free from some of the charges the noble Lord has brought against it. But the waterways in this country are not altogether free from these charges. The noble Lord has described the condition of things in Egypt, and I need not go into that. I would remind him that there is no doubt whatever of the position of the Government and of Parliament as to the waterways in this country, and yet I believe the state of the River Thames is not so perfect as we could desire. What I stated the other day was, that the Canal Company is responsible for the waterway; and I may add that the Egyptian Government is responsible for the towns on the shores of the Canal. The noble Lord knows that it is a very thinly-populated country, and that the only town there, except Port Said and Suez, is the small town of Ismailia, situated in the recess of a very considerable lake, and that the real difficulty we have to deal with arises from the small dimensions of the Canal. The noble Lord is aware that a Technical Commission is employed in considering a plan for the deepening or very much enlarging the Canal, and I hope the result of their labours will be known at the end of the year or the beginning of the next year.

Lord Thurlow

PRIVATE BUSINESS.

BRISTOL CORPORATION (DOCKS PURCHASE) BILL [Lords] (by Order).

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

MR. WARTON, in moving to leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words—

"This House declines to sanction a Bill which involves the principle of trading by a Corporation, which provides for the sale of Docks to the Corporation of Bristol at an excessive price, which is opposed to the interests of the ratepayers of that city, which is obnoxious to a large number, if not the majority, of those ratepayers, and on which those ratepayers have not had a fair opportunity of expressing their views," said, he felt it his duty, in consequence of representations made to him on behalf of a very large number of owners of property and ratepayers in Bristol—a very large number indeed—to try and get the passage of this Bill delayed, in order that the interests of some thousands of persons might be fairly considered. The persons he represented had not yet had an opportunity of having their case considered. Their agent and representative was Mr. Henry Brown, of Bristol, who was the owner of some 20 houses in that city, and ground landlord of 24 more; and Mr. Brown was prepared to show, from his own case, how the rates would be increased by the Bill. It was rather a difficult and complicated matter to deal with. If it had been the practice of the House to present Petitions before proceeding with Private Bill Business, he should have had an opportunity of presenting the very largely signed Petition he held in his hand, bearing the names of more than 15,000 owners of property and ratepayers in Bristol; but by the Rules of the House he could only refer to it in this indirect manner. He believed it was not competent for him to present the Petition then; but if it had been the practice to present Petitions before the time of Private Business, he should have been able to lay this upon the Table, and have it read by the Clerk. The Petitioners were apprehensive that their interests would be very much injured by the provisions of the present Bill. The number of signatures would have been very largely increased, as a great number of ratepayers were anxious to sign the Petition; but, owing to the accident of Mr. Brown now living at Eastbourne, a considerable number of the signatures had been sent there, and were not included in the Petition. Whatever the number of signatures to the Petition was, it should be remembered that the Petition itself followed a much larger one signed by 5,000 or 6,000 of the ratepayers of Bristol, which had been lodged in the Private Bill Office on the 19th of the present month. His objections to the Bill were of a two-fold character. He objected to it first on general principles, upon which point, however, he would not say much, as it was not necessary to do more than simply indicate his belief that it was a very unsound principle for a Corporation to buy up a number of Docks and become a private trading Company. Such action on their part must necessarily amount to undue interference with private enterprise, and certainly was not an economical way of carrying on a trade. He found that in London all the great Dock undertakings were in the hands of private individuals, and even in that wonderful Bill for the government of London, introduced by the Home Secretary, only to be withdrawn, there was no proposition to give power to the Corporation of London to take over the Dock undertakings of the Metropolis. Again, at Liverpool the same principle obtained, and the large Dock interests were kept quite clear and distinct from the business and functions of the Corporation. He knew that, owing to a serious accident, there had been no opportunity yet for the thousands of ratepayers of Bristol who were opposed to the Bill to be heard before in Committee. There was an attempt made by Mr. Brown to obtain a hearing before the House of Lords; but that hearing failed, because it was held that he had no locus standi, and that he was really represented by the Corporation, who were the promoters of the Bill. Now, it was quite evident, from what had recently taken place in that House, that it was the tendency of the feeling and wish of the House to give a fuller opportunity to all classes of persons who believed they were injured by a Private Bill to have a locus standi before Committees. Only a week or two ago, the House carried, by a small majority, but still by a majority, a Resolution affirming the principle that such Bodies as a Chamber of Commerce or a Chamber of Agriculture should be entitled to be heard before Railway Bill Committees in reference to a projected railway. Now, whatever value a Chamber of Commerce or a Chamber of Agriculture possessed, it could not be said to be of the same importance or to have the same interests as thousands of ratepayers in a large city like Bristol. Without wearying the House with details which might be somewhat difficult to follow, he would simply say that the present Bill was introduced for the purpose of sanctioning the purchase of no less than four different Dock properties—namely, the Avonmouth Company, the Avonmouth Warehouse Company, the Portishead Company, and the Portishead Warehouse Company. The confusion was made worse confounded by the proposals contained in the Bill for payment by instalments. Nothing appeared to be made quite clear until they came to the amounts that had to be paid. What was it that had to be paid? If they turned to the ninth and tenth pages of the Bill, they would find particulars of the enormous sum that was to be paid by the unfortunate ratepayers of Bristol in order to carry out the designs of the Corporation. Adding up the amounts to be paid to the different Companies by separate instalments, it would be found that they came to the total of £800,000. He altogether objected to these terms, quite apart from the general principle to which he had referred, on the ground that the price was excessive, because these Docks were an utter failure. Hitherto they had not been carried on at a profit; and, so far as the Corporation of Bristol was concerned, he contended that the ratepayers would be required to complete a purchase which would involve a considerable amount of loss. More than that, the people who advocated the buying of these Docks were also the sellers of the property, being holders of shares, and the consent of the Town Council to the purchase had been accorded in a manner that was highly improper. It was quite true that the statutory meeting was held; but the Mayor at that meeting induced the Town Council to leave the matter in his hands. He said, in effect—"Leave it all to me. There are certain difficult matters connected with the business which you will never understand; I can manage the whole matter myself." When the Mayor condescended to give an explanation to a few private friends, they ingenuously confessed that they were no wiser than they were before. The Mayor himself was deeply interested in the transfer, and probably that was the reason why all his proceedings had been shrouded in mystery. He (Mr. Warton) saw both of the hon. Members for Bristol present, and he thought they would not deny that they were also interested, the one to a large extent, and the other to a lesser degree. In fact, many of the would-be purchasers were vendors at the same time; and, therefore, there was no wonder that the matter was pressed before the House as the transfer of the Docks to the Corporation was the only way of saving the undertaking from financial ruin. According to the most common rules of equity, no man ought to be the buyer and the seller at the same time. Regardless of the interests of the ratepayers, the Mayor induced the Council to believe that he alone understood this complicated matter, and the Council acquiesced, although it was true they were given to understand that the annual cost to which the ratepayers would be subjected would only be £900 a-year. But at a subsequent meeting, last Tuesday, the Mayor admitted to the Council that there had been a miscalculation in estimating the expense, and that it would be £8,000 a-year. A meeting was held in May last of the inhabitants; but the agents and servants of the Mayor were able to overpower them by the admission of

Avonmouth roughs, who played their part somewhat in the same way as the hired men in the Hyde Park Demonstration last week. Thus the free views of the ratepayers was not heard. In order to show what might be expected if that free view could be heard, he might mention that in reference to the intention of the Corporation to carry out another scheme, having, however, no connection with the present Bill—and he merely gave it as an illustration to show that the Corporation had not the confidence of the ratepayers—the proposal of the Mayor and Corporation was defeated on a poll by 15,000 to 6,000. This afforded ample proof that the Mayor and Corporation did not possess the confidence of the great majority of the ratepayers of Bristol. All he claimed now was that there should be afforded ample opportunity for inquiry. In his opinion, it was eminently a case for inquiry. They were now getting near the end of the Session; time was precious, and the Bill was being pushed forward in a way which prevented it from receiving full consideration. It certainly seemed rather hard that the ratepayers of Bristol should be required to come forward and find out all that was being done within the week. He was satisfied that if the House would allow a full inquiry, and would give the ratepayers an opportunity, in some way, of acquiring a locus standi before the Committee, in order to ventilate the matter free from the hands of the Avonmouth roughs, the House would not consent in the end to pass the Bill. A Petition, largely signed, had already been presented; and he was assured that a very considerable number of ratepayers, who had not yet signed the Petition, were ready to do so. The manner in which the negotiations had been conducted by the Mayor certainly justified the suspicion that things were not altogether as they ought to be, and that, at all events, a considerable body of ratepayers who would be burdened with increased taxation ought to have their case heard. In regard to the price to be paid, he had already stated that these Docks were not worth buying at all; but if the House would analyze the provisions of the Bill they would find that no less a sum than £800,000 was to be paid for them. He contended that such a price was excessive. For the Portishead Dock £230,000 was to be given, added to which was £100,000 recited in the Bill as having been already advanced in some mysterious way by the Corporation, making £350,000 altogether, when, so far as the Portishead Company was concerned, their undertaking might have been purchased for £300,000. It was evident, therefore, that £50,000 were entirely thrown away by the Corporation of Bristol, and that the interests of the ratepayers, which they ought to have protected, had been altogether neglected. He strongly deprecated the manner in which the negotiations had been conducted. It was exceedingly improper for the Mayor to manage everything by himself; no attempt was made to obtain the views of the Town Council before the business was completed. Under such circumstances, it was most objectionable to hurry the Bill through the House, and it was in the interest of thousands of the ratepayers, who were anxious to obtain a locus standi in opposition to the Bill before the Committee, that he submitted this Resolution.

COLONEL KING-HARMAN seconded the Resolution.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "this House declines to sanction a Bill which involves the principle of trading by a Corporation, which provides for the sale of Docks to the Corporation of Bristol at an excessive price, which is opposed to the interests of the ratepayers of that city, which is obnoxious to a large number if not the majority of those ratepayers, and on which those ratepayers have not had a fair opportunity of expressing their views,"—(Mr. Warton.)
—instead thereof.

MR. SAMUEL MORLEY said, he had utterly failed in his attempt to discover the ground upon which the hon. and learned Member for Bridport (Mr. Warton) was opposed to this Bill. He was there to express his opinion that a more straightforward transaction had never been submitted to the House of Commons. He represented a city which he ventured to say, without any boast, contained about the usual average of men engaged in trade and commerce to be found in any large town; and as to the reflection cast upon the Mayor, in reference to his conduct in this transaction, it was utterly undeserved. The Mayor occupied that distinguished position for the fourth time, having been re-elected without opposition, with a view to carrying out the very scheme with respect to which the sanction of the House was now asked. In 1848, under the provisions of an Act of Parliament, the Corporation purchased the City Docks; and since that period there had been established two large Docks, and there had been carried on for some years a very foolish and a very ruinous competition, by which the trade of Bristol had been seriously affected. Owing to the bitterness of the controversies which it caused in reference to these Docks, it was thought most advantageous that the Docks should be secured under one management. The usual course was followed of calling a public meeting of the ratepayers. He might say that the Council of the Corporation, numbering 64, had, with perfect unanimity, without a division, sanctioned, on two or three occasions, the motions which had been laid before them for the carrying out of this scheme. A meeting of owners and ratepayers had also been called, at which the terms of the purchase were made known, the matter discussed, and the Bill passed in the ordinary way. Any owner or ratepayer could at the meeting have demanded a poll, and a poll was, in fact, demanded by one ratepayer, who was really the Petitioner on this occasion, and who was connected, as he understood, with the Liberty of Property Defence League. [Mr. WATSON: No.] He had had a paper placed in his hands yesterday which was headed "The Liberty of Property Defence League," and it had reference to a Petition to which, no doubt, a number of names had been attached. The Corporation had learnt that the signatures had been obtained to this Petition by canvassers who got so much a hundred for the names attached. It was said that the negotiations which had been carried on by the Mayor were in secret. It was perfectly well known that the individuals engaged in carrying on original negotiations in a matter of this kind must have confidence reposed in them; and he ventured to say there was no man in the City of Bristol in whom confidence had been more largely extended than in the gentleman who occupied the distinguished position of Mayor of Bristol. The meeting at Bristol was almost unanimous upon the question; and the only Petition which had been lodged against the Bill was one bearing a few hundred names, many of which were alleged to be fictitious, in a city of more than 200,000 inhabitants. He sincerely trusted that the House would give the Bill a second reading.

EARL OF DEVON'S ESTATES BILL.

[Lords.]

RESOLUTION.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That, in the case of the Earl of Devon's Estates Bill [Lords], Standing Order 235 be suspended, and that the Bill be read a second time."—(Sir Charles Forster.)

MR. PULESTON said, he rose to a point of Order; but he did not know whether, if opposition were raised to a Bill, it would be right to discuss the question then?

MR. SPEAKER: If the hon. Gentleman objects to the proposal, the Bill must stand over until to-morrow.

MR. PULESTON said, he had no objection to discuss the Bill now.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL said, that as the Motion had been made, and the hon. Member was desirous of discussing it, it must, as a matter of course, stand over.

MR. SPEAKER: That is what I intended to convey to the hon. Member.

Question again proposed.

MR. SPEAKER said, the Standing Order directed that when Notice of opposition was given a Private Bill must stand over until the following day.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL asked if it was understood that the Bill would not come on to-morrow?

COLONEL GERARD SMITH said, that in the case of the Hull and Barnsley Bill, where a similar Notice was given, it was put down for the next day.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL said, he apprehended that it would be competent to move that the Order stand over until Thursday.

MR. SPEAKER: The time for making that Motion will be to-morrow, until which day, under the Standing Order, the Bill must now stand over.

Mr. Samuel Morley

Ordered, That, in the case of the Earl of Devon's Estates Bill [Lords], Standing Order 235 be suspended, and that the Bill be read a second time To-morrow.

GREAT WESTERN RAILWAY AND BRISTOL AND PORTISHEAD PIER AND RAILWAY COMPANIES BILL.

[Lords.]

RESOLUTION.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That, in the case of the Great Western Railway and Bristol and Portishead Pier and Railway Companies Bill [Lords], Standing Orders 211, 236, and 237 be suspended, and that the Committee on the Bill have leave to sit and proceed upon Thursday next."—(Sir Charles Forster.)

Mr. WARTON said, he thought that a longer time ought to be given for the consideration of the Bill. It was all very well for the hon. Member for Bristol (Mr. S. Morley) to say that it was satisfactory to the Body which he represented. The hon. Member, in regard to a previous Bill, made a comparison between the population of Bristol, which was over 220,000, and the 5,000 or 7,000 ratepayers who petitioned against it. The comparison, however, was scarcely fair, because the inhabitants of the city included women and children; and it was a well known fact that when a poll was taken upon a recent occasion 15,000 ratepayers were on one side, and 6,000 on the other. It was, therefore, only fair to assume that the persons who occupied the position of ratepayers in the City of Bristol did not exceed 21,000 or 22,000, and out of that number 6,000 to 7,000 had already shown that they were in opposition to the Bill. Therefore, to say that the question they were dealing with affected 220,000 persons, and that the number who wished to be heard in opposition was consequently very insignificant, was hardly a fair comparison; and, in order to afford further time for the consideration of the matter, he would move that the Committee upon the Bill be not proceeded with until Monday next. He strongly objected to the wholesale suspension of Standing Orders in order that a Bill should be proceeded with which proposed to effect a purchase contrary to the interests of the ratepayers.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "Thursday," in order to insert the word "Monday,"—(Mr. Warton),—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the word 'Thursday' stand part of the Question."

Mr. SAMUEL MORLEY wished to make an appeal to the House. It would be fatal to the measure if this postponement were to take place; and he must, therefore, resist the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member.

COLONEL GERARD SMITH thought that the rule which had been followed in the Hull and Barnsley case ought to be followed in this instance. This was a case of emergency; and, as the Bill was opposed, the further hearing ought to be deferred until to-morrow.

Question put, and agreed to.

Main Question put.

Ordered, That, in the case of the Great Western Railway and Bristol and Portishead Pier and Railway Companies Bill [Lords], Standing Orders 211, 236, and 237 be suspended, and that the Committee on the Bill have leave to sit and proceed upon Thursday next.

QUESTIONS.

THE CONGO RIVER—THE INTERNATIONAL ASSOCIATION.

Mr. JACOB BRIGHT asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, What progress has been made in regard to the proposed International Commission for the Lower Congo; and, whether, with regard to the Upper Congo, Her Majesty's Government is prepared to recognize the International Association under the presidency of the King of the Belgians?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: Some further communications of a confidential character have passed in regard to the proposed International Commission. Her Majesty's Government have not decided to take any step to recognize the International Association.

SIR HERBERT MAXWELL: Would the noble Lord inform the House whether it is true, as has been stated, that the right of pre-emption of the territory under the control of the Association was offered to Her Majesty's Government in preference to France?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: I think any Question in regard to the pre-emption in regard to France had better be put on the Paper. If the hon. Baronet puts it down for Thursday, I shall endeavour to answer.

AFRICA (SOUTH-WEST COAST)—ANGRA PEQUENA.

SIR HENRY HOLLAND asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether he can now state the result of the communications with the German Government as to territorial rights and jurisdiction at Angra Pequena; whether it is intended to allow the annexation of that to the Cape Colony; and, whether, as Papers have been presented in the Cape Colony bringing up the Correspondence to 29th May 1884, Papers, including the Correspondence with the German Government, cannot at once be presented to the House?

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY: After careful consideration of all the communications which have passed, and of all the circumstances of the case, Her Majesty's Government have come to the conclusion that, in view of the definitions which have been publicly given by them of the limits of the Cape Colony, they cannot contest the claim of the German Government to afford protection to German subjects who have established themselves at Angra Pequena under concessions from Native Chiefs, though no doubt can be entertained as to Wallfish Bay and the islands adjacent to Angra Pequena being British. It is agreed, therefore, that the German Government shall protect German subjects who have acquired concessions or established themselves as traders at Angra Pequena; and the German Government have been invited to concur in appointing a Joint Commission to deal with claims of British subjects who have previously acquired concessions. It is proposed that the coast between the Orange River and the Southern Portuguese boundary, including the British settlement at Wallfish Bay, shall be brought under the control of the Cape Government; but this control will not be exercised within the territory at Angra Pequena, which will be under German protection. Papers are being prepared, and will shortly be ready; but it is advisable that they should include the Resolutions of the Cape Parliament and other Correspondence now on its way to this country, which will only be received in a few days.

SIR HENRY HOLLAND: Does German protection mean formal annexation and the hoisting of the German flag, or merely German protection of German subjects?

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY: As at present assented to by the German Government, it is merely German protection.

LAND LAW (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—CLAUSE 19—LOANS FOR LABOURERS' COTTAGES.

COLONEL COLTHURST asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether his attention has been called to the small number (eighty-nine) of applications for loans under Clause 19, Land Act, 1881, for the building or repairing of labourers' cottages, whereas the number of orders made by the Sub-Commissioners up to August 1883 are two hundred and sixty-eight; and, whether he will cause a Return to be furnished by the Local Government Board, showing the number of orders received by each Board of Guardians and the steps taken to carry them out?

MR. TREVELYAN: The tenants can build labourers' cottages either with their own money or with money borrowed from the Board of Works. It, therefore, does not follow that the Sub-Commissioners' orders have been obeyed only in those cases in which loans have been applied for. It is the duty of the Sanitary Authorities, under Section 11 of the Labourers' Act, to enforce compliance with these orders. The steps taken by each Board of Guardians to put in force the powers vested in them by that section can only be accurately ascertained by calling for Returns from each Union; and the Local Government Board have no objection to obtain such Returns if they are ordered by the House.

IRISH LAND COMMISSION (SUB-COMMISSION No. 8)—LAY COMMISSIONERS AT MONAGHAN.

MR. HEALY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Did the lay members of No. 8 Commission, who left their lodgings in Monaghan on Saturday the 5th July 1884, and went to sojourn at Lord Rossmore's hotel, managed by the estate bailiffs, while cases on the estate were being tried, do so without making application elsewhere; did they continue to remain there, contrary to the advice of their chairman, Mr. Foley, up to the 8th July, he remaining at lodgings; did the Lay Commissioners go back to Lord Rossmore's hotel on the 15th July, although their chairman returned to the former lodgings; did the latter inform them there was accommodation for all, and, in spite of his request that they should leave, did the Lay Commissioners refuse to do so; did the Commissioners adjudicate on a large number of cases on Colonel Lloyd's, the Westenra, and Lord Rossmore's estates, after they went to sojourn in Lord Rossmore's hotel; is the Government aware that their decisions are most unsatisfactory to the tenants; and, are any of these gentlemen to be re-appointed after the 31st of August?

MR. TREVELYAN: I fear I have no means of ascertaining the facts as to all the details which the hon. Member asks for in the earlier paragraphs of this Question. The Chairman of the Sub-Commission reports as follows with regard to them:—

"The communications which passed between me and my colleagues on the matter of their sojourning at Lord Rossmore's hotel were purely of a private nature, and I will not answer any inquiries in reference to them. Mr. Healy inquires whether, during the sojourn at that hotel, the Sub-Commissioners adjudicated on a large number of cases on Colonel Lloyd's, the Westenra, and Lord Rossmore's estates. On referring to the printed list, I find the numbers are—on Colonel Lloyd's estate, one; on Lord Rossmore's eight; and on the Westenra, about 41. Whether the decisions were satisfactory or the reverse the Commissioners have not heard."

In reply to the last paragraph of the hon. Member's Question, I may say that the list of gentlemen which I read to the House a few days ago as having been selected for re-appointment did not include the names of any of the gentlemen who constituted No. 8 Sub-Commission.

CRIME AND OUTRAGE (IRELAND)— ORANGEMEN AND ROMAN CATHOLICS—FIRING INTO A TRAIN.

LORD ARTHUR HILL asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he is aware that a train, conveying members of the Loyal Orange Institution, on the 12th instant, from Newry to Ballyronney, was fired into whilst passing through a Roman Catholic district, known as Tullyorien, near Banbridge; and, whether any, and, if so, what steps have been taken by the police with a view to discovering the perpetrator of the above outrage?
